

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

NEW ZEALAND.

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

First Session of the Seventh Parliament.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Wednesday, 24th September, 1879.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

THE SIXTH PARLIAMENT of New Zealand, which was prorogued on the 11th day of August, 1879, to the 1st September, was dissolved by Proclamation on the 15th August. On the same day writs were issued by Proclamation, which writs were made returnable on the 17th September, on which day Parliament was summoned to meet. Parliament was thence prorogued to Wednesday, the 24th day of September, on which day it met for the despatch of business.

The Parliament was opened by Commission.

The Legislative Council being met,

Three of the Commissioners—namely, the Hon. Sir W. Fitzherbert, K.C.M.G., the Hon. G. S. Whitmore, C.M.G., and the Hon. M. Richmond, C.B.—took their seats. The Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell, fourth Commissioner, was absent.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said,—His Excellency the Governor, not thinking fit to be personally present here this day, hath been pleased to cause a Commission to be issued, in order to the opening and holding of this Parliament.

The Hon. the SPEAKER commanded the Clerk to inform the members of the House of Representatives that the Commissioners desired their immediate attendance in the Legislative Council, to hear the letters patent appointing the Commission read.

Members of the House of Representatives being come,

The Hon. the SPEAKER said,—His Excellency the Governor, not thinking fit to be present here this day, hath been pleased, in order to the opening and holding of this Parliament, to cause letters patent to be passed, under the seal of the colony, constituting us, the several honorable members therein named, his Commission, to do all things in His Excellency's name and on his part necessary to be performed in this Parliament. This will more fully appear by the letters patent, which will now be read.

The letters patent were then read by the Clerk.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said,—Honorable Legislative Councillors and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, we have it in command from His Excellency to let you know that on Thursday, the 25th day of September instant, at half-past two o'clock in the afternoon, His Excellency will, in person, declare to you the causes of calling this Parliament together. However, it being necessary that a Speaker of the House of Representatives be first chosen, His Excellency requests you, Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, to repair to the place where you usually sit, and there proceed to the choice of a fit and proper person to fill that high and important office; and that, after having chosen him, you present him on Thursday next, at the Government House, at noon, to His Excellency for approval.

Then the members of the House of Representatives withdrew.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, 24th September, 1879.

Opening of Parliament—Speaker.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

The House met at two o'clock.

A message was brought by Leonard Stowe, Esq., Clerk of the Legislative Council, to the following effect: "The Commissioners appointed by His Excellency the Governor to do all things in his name in order to the opening of this Parliament, request the attendance in the Legislative Council Chamber of the members of this honorable House to hear the Commission read."

Accordingly the House, with the Clerk, went to the Legislative Council Chamber; and, a Commission having been read for the opening and holding of Parliament, the Commissioners directed the House to proceed to the election of a Speaker, and present him next day at noon at Government House, for His Excellency's approval.

Members being returned,

The Clerk of Writs delivered to Francis Eastwood Campbell, Esq., Clerk of the House, a list of the members who had been returned to serve in the present Parliament.

Francis Eastwood Campbell, Esq., Clerk of the House, a Commissioner appointed by dedimus potestatem for administering the oath to the members, did administer the oath to the members who appeared; which being done, and the members having subscribed the oath, they took their seats in the House.

SPEAKER.

Sir G. GREY.—Major Campbell: I move that Mr. George Maurice O'Rorke, member for Onehunga, do take the chair of this House as Speaker. I will briefly state to honorable gentlemen, in making this motion, that in the last Parliament it was my duty to move that Mr. O'Rorke should, in that Parliament, take the chair as Speaker. The motion was then made because it was generally known by the House that Mr. O'Rorke possessed qualities which peculiarly fitted him to fill the chair of this House—a knowledge of parliamentary law and custom, great impartiality, and the power of regulating debate. The proposal that I made on that occasion was seconded by the leader of the Opposition, and it was received, I may say, with unanimous approbation. During the whole of last session Mr. O'Rorke occupied the chair as Speaker, and I am sure that he performed his duties to the satisfaction of the late Parliament. Encouraged, therefore, by that precedent, and satisfied I am doing that which is best for the conduct of the business of this House, I move, That Mr. George Maurice O'Rorke, member for Onehunga, do take the chair of this House as Speaker.

Mr. HALL.—I have very great pleasure in seconding the motion which has just been made by the Prime Minister. Although I have been but recently elected to this House, it has been my good fortune to sit in this House previously for many years with Mr. O'Rorke. For a short time I have been on the same side of politics with that honorable gentleman; but for the greater part of the time it has been, if I may say so, my misfortune to be on the opposite side to him. During the whole of the time, however, of our sitting together, conscientious and wide as our differences on political matters may have been, they have never interfered with the most cordial relations subsisting between us in private life. What I have said for myself, I think I may also say for every honorable gentleman who has sat in this House with Mr. O'Rorke—that, however wide and great the differences that may have existed between them, they have never interfered with their private friendship. It is such a disposition and character which is essentially calculated to make an impartial Speaker; and it is one reason why I have very great pleasure in seconding the motion of the Prime Minister. I have also in former years, when a member of this House, known the manner in which Mr. O'Rorke discharged the arduous and important duties of Chairman of Committees, and I am glad to bear my testimony to the admirable manner in which those duties were fulfilled. I was not a member of this House during the time the honorable gentleman occupied the Speaker's chair, but I nevertheless had an opportunity of observing the fairness and impartiality which have deservedly won for him the encomiums which have been passed by the House. I have therefore great pleasure in seconding the motion. I feel sure honorable gentlemen will agree with me that in the hands of Mr. O'Rorke the character and dignity of this House, so far as they are in the keeping of the Speaker, will be entirely safe.

Mr. O'RORKE.—Major Campbell: It would ill become me to say anything in the way of complaint about the too complimentary terms in which I have been alluded to by my proposer and seconder, or the flattering reception which my name has met with at the hands of this House. I know very well the high qualifications which are requisite in a Speaker of this House. He must be patient, he must be prompt, he must be firm, he must be courteous, he must keep aloof from party politics, he must be ever on the alert to party tactics in debate. To these essential qualifications I can lay but slight claim; but it is the feeling that I do possess one important qualification, which encourages me to hope that I shall be able to discharge the duties of the office—and that is, the qualification of impartiality. Earnest politician as I am, and knowing there are some matters in which I must always feel a deep interest, I hope I shall not allow those feelings to interfere with the proper discharge of my duties as Speaker. I do not wish to make allusion to the brief period during which I had the honor of holding the office of Speaker last session, but I will speak of the lengthened period during which I had the honor of holding the office of Chairman of Committees in this House. During all that period it has been my good fortune that my decisions have never been challenged by any member of the House. If I am re-elected to the higher position of Speaker, I shall endeavour, to the best of my ability, to preserve order, to maintain decorum and the courtesies of parliamentary debate, to uphold the dignity of this House, and to merit the confidence which you feel disposed to repose in me to-day.

The honorable gentleman was then led to the chair by his proposer and seconder.

Mr. SPEAKER-ELECT.—I desire to repeat my humble acknowledgments to the House for the high honor they have conferred upon me in unanimously electing me to be their Speaker. I feel assured that in the discharge of the responsible duties of that high office I can always, in times of difficulty, calculate on receiving your cordial co-operation, which indeed must ever be the mainstay of the efficiency of one charged with a Speaker's functions; and I trust that during my period of office you will not have cause to regret the choice you have made this day.

Mr. READER WOOD.—Sir, will you permit me to congratulate you on your election to the office of Speaker? I think, if I recollect right—it is now many years ago—I moved that you should be first Chairman of Committees, and I have very great pleasure now in congratulating you upon the higher office which you have assumed by the unanimous wish of this House.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I move, That this House do now adjourn until two o'clock to-morrow.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, I beg to second the motion, and in doing so I take the opportunity of adding my congratulations to those already offered to you on behalf of this House by the honorable member for Waitemata. I am sure that, on whatever side of the House we sit, we shall always rest satisfied with the decisions you may feel it your duty to give.

Mr. SPEAKER-ELECT.—I desire to tender my grateful thanks to the honorable members for Waitemata and Egmont for the high compliments they have paid me when congratulating me upon my elevation to the Speaker's chair.

Motion agreed to, and the House then adjourned.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Thursday, 25th September, 1879.

Governor's Speech—Address in Reply.

The Council met at two o'clock p.m.

Shortly afterwards His EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR entered the Chamber and took the chair. A message was forwarded to the House of Representatives, summoning the attendance of the members in the Council Chamber, who being come, with their Speaker,—

GOVERNOR'S SPEECH.

His EXCELLENCY was pleased to deliver the following Speech:—

HONORABLE LEGISLATIVE COUNCILLORS, AND GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,—

In opening this, the Seventh Parliament of New Zealand, I am sure you will unite with me in an earnest hope that the new Parliament may be distinguished for the enactment of such measures as shall be most conducive towards promoting the happiness and welfare of the people.

We have reached what is, perhaps, as yet the most important epoch in the history of the colony; and the future will very much depend upon the impress which may be stamped upon it by the action of this Parliament.

It is matter for congratulation that, notwithstanding the severe monetary pressure and commercial gloom which have for some time past prevailed throughout the world, the position of this colony is thoroughly sound.

In accordance with constitutional usage, I recently allowed an appeal to the electors of the colony; and they have availed themselves of this opportunity to make manifest their wishes with regard to measures of great importance, which it was proposed should be enacted as part of the permanent constitutional law of the colony.

The elections having been completed, I have, at the earliest possible period, called you together to avail myself of your advice and assistance in considering these measures, and in carrying on the necessary legislation of the country.

My Responsible Advisers, following up the line of policy which was indicated during the last session of the late Parliament, have prepared measures giving effect to the views which were then made known to the country. Amongst these there will be submitted to you a Bill to amend the law relating to electors qualified to vote at the election of members of the House of Representatives. In this measure the broad principle is adopted that every man who pays taxes, and is otherwise affected by legislation, has a right to representation.

A Bill which will also claim your consideration is one which proposes to reduce the longest period for which the House of Representatives can sit from five to three years. This enactment will render each member more directly accountable to his constituents than he at present is, and will secure to the electors the power of returning members so frequently to the House of Representatives that public opinion, which often in young countries takes a new direction, from the rapidly-varying circumstances of such communities, will be fairly represented in every phase which that opinion may assume.

But these provisions will be of comparatively little value unless the constituencies are so arranged that, in as far as practicable, population in each electoral district respectively shall be duly represented. This right was assured to the people of New Zealand by the British Parliament, in the Act which originally gave them a Representative Constitution. The measure on this subject which is to be submitted to you will substantially secure a return, and an adherence for the future, to that important principle of the Constitution Act.

These three measures are, in the opinion of my Advisers, so equitable in themselves, and so accordant with the spirit of modern times, that, should they become law, there is, the Government believes, every prospect that a feeling of general contentment would be permanently established in the colony. The power of legislation would then largely rest in the hands of the people of New Zealand; and it is to be hoped that they will always maintain within its limits an equitable system of taxation, a just administration of public lands, and a sound system of local self-government. The alterations which will be produced in the Constitution Act by the proposed measures will be but slight, whilst they are evidently in accord with the popular wish.

A Bill will be submitted for your consideration to suspend plurality of voting in cases of elections of local governing bodies whilst those bodies are subsidized out of the general revenue of the colony.

Measures will also be submitted to you which will enable those desiring to occupy small farms or rural allotments to obtain possession of lands much more readily, and at a smaller cost, than they can be obtained under the present system.

GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,—

The estimates will be laid before you accompanied by financial measures calculated, in the opinion of my Government, to promote the interests of the colony, and to maintain its credit.

A very general desire appears to exist that consideration should be given to the best means of promoting and encouraging manufactures and local industries in this colony. With a view to give effect to this desire, you may probably think it advisable to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into and report upon the subject.

The public works in progress continue to be vigorously prosecuted, and you will be asked to make provision for the further prosecution of those works which have already been authorized by Parliament.

In pursuance of the intention of the Legislature in the session of 1878, considerable pains have been taken by the Public Works Department to ascertain the best route for connecting by rail the east and west coasts of the northern portion of the Middle Island; and also the best route from Amberley to Cook Strait. As these are works of great magnitude and importance, and must involve a very large expenditure of public money, it is deemed prudent, in order to take advantage of every possible means of ascertaining the best routes, that the relative merits of the various lines should be carefully considered. With that view you will be asked to submit the whole question to full and exhaustive examination and inquiry by a Select Committee.

HONORABLE LEGISLATIVE COUNCILLORS, AND GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,—

A measure will be laid before you by which lands the property of the Natives, not purchased by the Government for the public, will henceforth be sold in small blocks in the open market, on such terms as may be agreed upon with the proprietors. My Advisers are of opinion that by the adoption of this system great advantages will be secured to the whole European population of New Zealand; whilst the Natives will have the satisfaction of receiving the full value of their estates, and will no longer be subjected to those importunities and temptations to induce them to part with their lands which have hitherto proved a fertile source of misunderstanding and of evil to the two races.

The assurance which I was enabled to give to the members of Parliament at the opening of the last session, in regard to the peaceful and loyal action of the Native people generally, has been borne out by the results.

No further development has taken place of the fanatical movement on the West Coast, and the tribes concerned appear to be quietly awaiting the action of the Parliament and of the ordinary Courts of law.

Steps are being taken for the holding of a full inquiry into the existence and extent of the alleged unfulfilled promises in regard to lands.

Two intertribal disturbances, arising out of disputed claims to land, have occurred, in one instance attended with loss of life. The necessary measures are being taken to vindicate the law.

A Bill will be submitted for your consideration to regulate the immigration of Chinese into the colony.

A valuable interim report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the subject of higher education has been received and laid before both Houses. When the final report has been made, no delay shall take place in laying it before you, and in communicating to you the measures which the Government may recommend for adoption on the whole subject, which is one of paramount importance to educational interests in the colony.

Various other measures will be laid before you during this session. On each of these I am confident you will bestow your careful attention, exerting yourselves in all respects to promote the interests of this colony, the destinies of which Providence has in so large a measure intrusted to your charge. In all your efforts to attain this end you may rely on receiving my ready and earnest co-operation. I sincerely trust that a spirit of wisdom and of sound judgment may animate each branch of the Legislature.

His EXCELLENCY, having handed the Hon. the SPEAKER a copy of his Speech, withdrew.

The Council adjourned for ten minutes.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

On the motion of the Hon. Colonel WHITMORE, it was ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to prepare an Address in reply to His Excellency's opening Speech, such Committee to consist of the Hon. Major Richmond, C.B., the Hon. Captain Fraser, the Hon. Mr. Wilson, the Hon. Mr. John Johnston, and the mover.

The Council adjourned at eight minutes past three o'clock p.m.

Speaker—Opening of Parliament—First Reading—Governor's Speech.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at two o'clock.

SPEAKER.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have to report to the House that, on appearing before His Excellency at noon with the Hon. Sir George Grey, K.C.B., the proposer, and the Hon. John Hall, the seconder, of my nomination as Speaker, and soliciting His Excellency's confirmation of the choice of the House, His Excellency was graciously pleased to accord the confirmation asked for, and to confirm, on behalf of the Queen, all the rights and privileges of the House of Representatives, to the same extent as they have been granted hitherto, and to assure me that the House of Representatives would always have ready access to him, and that he would at all times place the most favourable construction on their proceedings. It is for me now to repeat my respectful acknowledgments to the House for the high honor they have done me in unanimously electing me as their Speaker.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

A message was received from His Excellency the Governor, desiring the attendance of members in the Legislative Council Chamber.

Mr. SPEAKER, accompanied by members, and preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms bearing the mace, proceeded to the Legislative Council Chamber, and, after a short absence, returned.

FIRST READING.

Imbecile Passengers Act Extension Bill.

GOVERNOR'S SPEECH.

Mr. SPEAKER informed honorable members that, when the House, in obedience to summons, attended His Excellency in the Legislative Council Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a Speech, of which he had, for greater accuracy, obtained a copy. He then read the Speech.

The House adjourned at half-past three o'clock p.m.

Education Reserves—Chairman of Committees—Sessional Committees.

EDUCATION RESERVES.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL, in asking the Hon. the Colonial Secretary, At what time the return will be laid upon the table respecting education reserves, ordered on 29th October, 1878? said the question which he had put to the Government would explain itself. It would be in the recollection of the honorable gentleman opposite that in October, 1878, the Council was pleased, upon his motion, to pass a resolution that the Government should seek from the heads of departments certain information with reference to the education reserves. The subject was one of very great importance, and some of these days it would have to be dealt with in a comprehensive way.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said that this was a very important report, and the honorable gentleman, when he moved for the return, must have been aware that it could not be compiled in a moment. The information had as nearly as possible been obtained, and had been in the Printer's hands for some time past, but, in consequence of the pressure of work, he had not been able to get it out yet. However, the return would be printed by next week, and it would be laid on the table, he trusted, that day week.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE, in moving, That the Hon. Captain Baillie be appointed Chairman of Committees for this session, said he thought the resolution would be unanimously supported.

Motion agreed to.

SESSIONAL COMMITTEES.

NATIVE.—Mr. Acton Adams, Mr. Allwright, Mr. Bryce, Mr. J. T. Fisher, Sir G. Grey, Mr. Hamlin, Mr. Lundon, Mr. McDonald, Mr. Moss, Mr. Ormond, Mr. Reeves, Mr. Rolleston, Captain Russell, Mr. Seddon, Mr. Sheehan, Mr. Swanson, Mr. Tainui, Mr. Tawhai, Major Te Wheoro, Mr. Tomoana, Colonel Trimble, Mr. Wakefield, and Mr. Whitaker.

STANDING ORDERS.—Mr. Speaker, Mr. Bunny, Mr. Gisborne, Mr. Hislop, Mr. Macandrew, Mr. Richmond, and Mr. Seymour.

MUSEUMS.

MR. MOSS asked the Government, If they will lay before this House a return showing expenditure of public money on each of the museums in the colony, and the endowments from Crown lands (with the revenue received from the same) which have been made to the said museums respectively?

Sir G. GREY replied that the return would be furnished so far as it could be procured, but he doubted if some portions of it asked for could be furnished.

AUCKLAND IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS.

MR. MOSS asked the Government, If they will lay before this House a return showing the expenditure of the Auckland Improvement Commissioners—(1) on streets, roads, and footpaths in the City of Auckland; (2) on the Recreation Reserve for the said city; (3) for all other purposes; also the amount of the debt due by the said Commissioners, and their present annual revenue and expenditure; together with a plan of the endowment administered by the said Commissioners, showing the sections leased and unleased at the present time?

Sir G. GREY said the return would be laid on the table of the House.

PARNELL BOROUGH.

MR. MOSS asked the Government, What steps, if any, they propose to take with reference to the petition presented last session by the Borough of Parnell, and referred to the Government by the Waste Lands Committee in their report thereon? Last session the Waste Lands Committee reported upon this petition, to the effect that the question to which the petition related was one of administration, with which the Committee did not think it advisable to interfere.

MR. THOMSON said the question asked by the honorable gentleman referred to rather an important subject. He might state that there were several municipalities in the same position as Parnell, in so far as endowments were concerned. The Government had the matter under their consideration, and he hoped they would be able shortly to state what steps they intended to take in reference to this and other matters of a similar nature.

CHEVIOT ELECTION.

MR. SAUNDERS asked the Postmaster-General, Whether a telegram sent by the Colonial Secretary to Mr. Henry Ingles, a Justice of the Peace at Kaikoura—and which Mr. Ingles reports in a letter to the Canterbury Press to be in substance, "Will you stand on policy as defined in Governor's Speech? If you will, you shall have the entire support of the party; even if defeated you will have claims to consideration;" but which a Government organ claims to have been sent in exactly the following words: "19th August.—Will you stand on policy of Governor's Speech in opposition to Saunders? Party will support you as far as possible, and consider you to have a claim upon it even if unsuccessful"—was franked by Colonel Whitmore as a telegram on public service, or was paid for as a private telegram? He did not think it was necessary for him to offer any apology for asking this question. He might simply say that, if this telegram stood alone, it would be a sufficient ground for the House to inquire as to the course the Government took with reference to influencing elections to that House at the public expense. From the accidental circumstances under which this telegram was discovered, he thought it would be found that it was but a sample of a vast number of others which had been sent, and with regard to which the House would no doubt like to have some information.

Sir G. GREY wished to ask the Speaker's ruling as to whether it was right for an honorable member, in putting a question, to use the words "a Government organ." He did not know what those words meant. He was not aware that there was any Government organ.

Mr. SPEAKER said he had asked the honorable member for Cheviot if he could substitute the name of the paper, and the honorable member told him he did not know the name of the paper. The honorable gentleman had used the words as a quotation, and he did not think the honorable gentleman was exceeding the latitude allowed to honorable members in putting questions. He did not think that the question as to whether or not the newspaper was a Government or Opposition organ was really involved in this matter.

Mr. J. T. FISHER replied that he had seen the original telegram. It was marked "Urgent," and the Hon. Colonel Whitmore's name appeared on the corner. He had seen the Hon. Colonel Whitmore, who stated that he intended it to go as a private telegram, but from the haste with which it was forwarded it was not paid for; but the Hon. Colonel Whitmore would have to pay for it.

THEATRICAL REPRESENTATIONS.

Mr. DICK asked the Government, If they have been requested to take any action to prevent theatrical representations of an immoral tendency in the City of Dunedin; and what steps, if any, they propose to take in the matter? Honorable members were no doubt aware that a company of players had recently been performing in the City of Wellington, and their theatrical representations had been condemned by the Press as improper and as having an immoral tendency. The company had since gone south, and the inhabitants of Dunedin had taken some alarm, and were anxious to know whether there was any power to stop such displays. There was an Ordinance of the Provincial Council which gave the Superintendent the power to prohibit immoral and indecent theatrical displays, and that power, when Provincial Councils were abolished, was transferred to the Governor. He desired to know if the Government were prepared to exercise that power, and if they would do so upon this occasion.

Mr. MACANDREW said that certain representations had been made to the Government on the subject referred to by the honorable member. The honorable gentleman was quite correct in saying that an Ordinance existed in Otago upon the subject, and it was still on the Statute Book.

The police had been directed to see that the provisions of the Statute were completely carried out in Dunedin; and it was to be hoped that would have the desired effect. He might say that the provisions of the Ordinance were very stringent. Not only the parties performing, but the owners of the building, were liable to heavy penalties; and persons conducting licensed houses in which such exhibitions took place were liable to have their licenses rescinded. He thought it might be well if the provisions of this Ordinance were extended throughout New Zealand. This was not the only measure passed by the Provincial Council of Otago that would be of benefit to the whole colony.

BRUCE POLLING-PLACES.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Government, If they will cause three additional polling-places for the electoral district of Bruce to be appointed—namely, the schoolhouses at Wanganos, Stirling, and Lovell's Flat respectively?

Mr. THOMSON said it was found previous to the last general election that there were many polling-places which were not at all suitable. It was the intention of the Government to make due inquiry, and to appoint suitable polling-places all over the colony, and the suggestions of the honorable member with regard to the polling-places mentioned in his question would then be taken into consideration.

GRAIN, FLOUR, AND TIMBER DUTIES.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Government, If they propose this session to reimpose the duties upon grain, flour, and timber?

Sir G. GREY replied that the Government would state to the House, when the Financial Statement was brought forward, what they intended to do in reference to these duties.

Mr. MURRAY would like to ask the honorable gentleman when there would be any chance of the Financial Statement being brought down. If it was not the intention of the Government to deal with this question, he intended to move in the matter himself.

Sir G. GREY said there was nothing to prevent the honorable gentleman from moving in the matter himself, if he thought proper. He would at the earliest possible period intimate to the House when the Financial Statement would be delivered, but he thought he could hardly be expected to do so on the second day of the session.

ELECTORAL ROLLS.

On the motion of Mr. BRANDON, it was ordered, That a return be laid upon the table showing the population and the number of electors on the electoral roll of each electoral district, and the number of electors who polled in each district on the occasion of the last general election.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

Sir G. GREY.—I rise to move that Mr. Seymour be appointed Chairman of Committees of the whole House. During last session a similar motion was made, and the unanimous approval of the House was given to the appointment of Mr. Seymour to the position which I now venture to propose he should again hold. The experience that we had during the last short session of Mr. Seymour's abilities in the chair, fully justified the step which the House then took. I therefore feel that I need not delay the House by making any lengthened speech on this subject, simply assuring honorable members that, if they agree with the motion I have made, they will find that they have acted wisely, and to the advantage and benefit of the House itself, as well as for the convenience of honorable members and the facility of conducting public business. I will now move, That Mr. Seymour be appointed Chairman of Committees of the whole House.

Mr. HALL.—I have very much pleasure in seconding the motion of the Prime Minister, and I am exceedingly glad that he has made this proposition, for I believe it is very desirable we should make it a rule to select for positions such as that of Chairman of Committees the best men we can find in the House, altogether irrespective of party considerations: and that the Prime Minister now proposes to do. I hope that as much as possible—I do not suppose it will be quite possible—these questions will, in the conduct of our business, cease to be decided on party grounds. I have reason to know that Mr. Seymour possesses almost every qualification which could be desired in a Chairman of Committees. He has had long experience in that office. In the discharge of his duties he has gained the respect and the confidence of this House. The House has found him to possess the patience, firmness, and courtesy which are so indispensable to the proper discharge of those duties. In fact, it occurs to me that Mr. Seymour was almost born to be a Chairman of Committees. I have very great pleasure in seconding the motion.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SEYMOUR. — Mr. Speaker, I greatly crave the indulgence of the House while I thank my proposer and seconder on this occasion for the very kind terms in which they have spoken of my past services as Chairman of Committees in this House. I have also most heartily to thank the House for having for the third time called me to that honorable and important position. This House very largely consists of new members, and, as to these gentlemen, they must perforce take my future performance of the duties of that office somewhat upon trust; but with respect to the older members of the House I hope I may be allowed to infer, from the unanimity of expression on this occasion, that my services during the past have gained their confidence and respect; and I may promise that no exertions of mine will be spared in the future to continue to earn that confidence. There are, I am aware, at times very difficult questions to decide while performing those duties; and, if you will allow me to say so, Sir, it is a source of very great satisfaction to me that I find you sitting in the chair—a gentleman who has had unlimited experience of these very duties which I am now called to perform, and to whose advice and assistance I feel certain I may have recourse in those cases where perhaps my more limited experience may fail to point out the direction in which my decision should be given.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Perhaps I may be permitted to observe that it affords me not merely satisfaction, but very great gratification, to know that my honorable friend the member for Wairau will be associated with me in the conduct of the business of the House of Representatives. And I feel sure I am expressing the mind of the House when I say I congratulate Mr. Seymour on his re-election as Chairman of Committees of the whole House.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir G. GREY.—I now rise to move, That this House do adjourn until Tuesday next.

Mr. HALL.—Before that question is put, I wish to make an observation or two. I presume that, when the House meets again, the Government will proceed with the motion of which the honorable member for Christchurch City (Mr. Andrews) has given notice—in fact, the Government has been courteous enough to inform me that such is the intention; and therefore I wish to take this opportunity of stating the course the Opposition will think it right to pursue when the Address in Reply is proposed. It will probably be for the convenience of the House that I should do so. We regret that the motion has not been gone on with this afternoon. We are anxious to get on with the public business with the least possible delay; and we were perfectly prepared to go on with the discussion, and to go to a division this evening, if such were convenient to honorable members opposite. It is possible that to some members this would not be convenient, and, to consult their convenience, we are not going to oppose the adjournment. However, we are quite prepared; and I hope we shall not be told again by what may be regarded as the Government organ in this city—the paper which gets the Government advertisements—that it is the duty of the Opposition not to throw obstruction in the way of public business. I now add that, when the motion is moved of which the honorable member for Christchurch City has given notice, I shall move this addition to the Address: "Whilst, however, we are prepared to give effect to the liberal measures desired by the country, we feel bound to submit to your Excellency that your Excellency's Government, as at present constituted, does not possess the confidence of this House." We shall be ready to go on with the debate on that question, and to go to a division at the earliest possible moment.

The House adjourned at twenty-five minutes to four o'clock p.m.

Mr. MANTELL.—Before the Council proceeds to the business on the Order Paper, I think it is my duty to call attention to what appears to me to be a serious breach of the privileges of the Council, which occurred during the recess prior to the last session of the Assembly. I should have drawn the attention of the Council to the matter during the brief session last past, but I was prevented by ill-health from doing so. I refer to a criminal case which was instituted by certain persons against a witness who had been examined before one of the Committees of this Council some seven or eight years ago for perjury alleged to have been committed in his evidence given before that Committee. The Committee is one which any honorable member who had a seat in the Council at the time would not have forgotten—the Select Committee upon Council Paper No. 97—and its inquiries were devoted to matters which were alleged to have occurred in connection with Native land purchases in the Hawke's Bay District. A Mr. Kinross was among the witnesses examined, and, in common with other witnesses, he was examined upon oath, in pursuance of the power given to the Committee at the time it was appointed by the Council. I mention this circumstance simply to make more clear what I shall have to say before I conclude. I will not detain the Council unnecessarily long. In the course of his evidence Mr. Kinross deposed upon oath that he never gave spirits to Natives as a consideration for land. The charge against him was that, in having sworn to that statement before the Committee, he had committed perjury, inasmuch as he was constantly giving spirits to the Natives in exchange for their land. Of course, in common with other members of this Council, I should be sorry if any encouragement were given to witnesses giving evidence on oath before Select Committees of this Council to forget the obligations of their oath and to perjure themselves; and therefore my inclination would be, in the event of witnesses being charged with perjury, and in the event of the consent of this Council to their prosecution being asked, to invariably vote for that consent being given. But upon this occasion, without the consent of the Council being asked to the prosecution—without even the cognizance of the Council—a suit was brought and pursued before the Resident Magistrate's Court with a view to the commitment of the defendant. Officers of this Council were summoned to give evidence—even to produce the records of this Council before the Resident Magistrate; and I myself, as a member of the Council, was subpoenaed, and, after attending Court six different times, eventually pleaded my privilege as a member of the Council, and was relieved from giving evidence. The same course was taken by officers of the Council; and consequently the case was dropped. At the same time, I think you will see, Sir, and the Council will see, that in the institution of this case without the consent of the Council there was a distinct breach of our privileges; and, though none of us would wish to pursue vindictively those who have been guilty of that breach, and though it must be recognized that the breach was not pressed to the extreme, still, this being the first case of the sort, we are bound to take some action, so as to draw public attention to the fact that witnesses who come before our Select Committees are privileged, and that the Council will not submit to the infraction of its privileges by the institution of such suits as this with impunity, where the consent of the Council has not been obtained. Of course the easiest plan for me to pursue would be to move that Paramena to Oneone, and possibly his legal adviser—for I see that in most cases of a similar kind before the House of Commons both have been censured or punished—be summoned to this Council; but I am hardly desirous of taking any such direct steps. I would rather, with the consent of the Council, move that the consideration of the whole question should be referred to the Committee on Standing Orders, or else to a Select Committee consisting of the gentlemen who compose the Standing Orders Committee, with instructions to inquire into the matter, to take such evidence as may be necessary, and to report thereon to the Council, with a view to our proceeding deliberately in the proper course. I might observe that the legal adviser in this case was a gentleman who could scarcely be ignorant of parliamentary privilege, inasmuch as he was only lately a very distinguished member of another branch of the Legislature, and, of course, by profession a lawyer. Therefore he could scarcely plead ignorance of our privileges in advising the institution of these proceedings without the permission of the Council. Subject to any suggestion which may be made, I will move the motion which I have indicated.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That it be an instruction to the Select Committee on Standing Orders to inquire into the proceedings in the case of Paramena te Oneone v. Kinross, in so far as those proceedings involved a breach of the privileges of this Council, and to report thereupon."—(Hon. Mr. Mantell.)

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—Before putting this question to the Council, I might state that this matter was brought under my cognizance during the recess, as Speaker. I had to reply officially to an application that I would consent to the attendance of officers of the Council, and my opinion on that point is on record. But I take the opportunity of stating that I believe there is no doubt a breach of the privileges of this Council has been committed.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL.—I would like to ask my honorable friend Mr. Mantell whether we are to understand he lays it down that, although a witness may commit perjury in the evidence he gives before a Committee of this Council, he is privileged from the punishment of his crime.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL.—Simply privileged to this extent: He is not amenable to punishment for his perjury unless the consent of the Council is given to his prosecution; which permission would, of course, readily be given. The honorable gentleman will find five cases in the House of Commons bearing out that. One case goes so far as to show that, although it was evident a witness had been guilty, the House of Commons, because proceedings had been commenced without its consent, absolutely refused to allow further proceedings to be taken.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—I do not desire to go into the merits of the case just now, although I believe there is something to be said on the other side; but I think we are indebted to the honorable gentleman for bringing this subject forward, because, if this privilege should be found to be an inconvenient obstacle in the way of justice—or if, in point of fact, it affords faci-ties for the committal of perjury in our Committees—it is manifest there ought to be some alteration in the law, so as to place any persons giving evidence before our Committees in precisely the same position as they would occupy if giving evidence before the ordinary Courts of law.

An Hon. MEMBER.—So they are.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—Yes; but there are obstacles in the way of their being brought to justice. For nine months in the year it is impossible to institute proceedings where perjury has been committed, and clearly it would be just as impossible during that nine months to prevent a person suspected of perjury from leaving the colony and escaping from justice altogether. The necessity for the protection of persons in England when that precedent was laid down happily no longer exists, and therefore it cannot be a right thing for this Legislature to keep up a mere form, when the result is that it affords persons freedom from the consequences of their perjury.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—I am unwilling to allow this matter to pass without making a brief remark upon the comments which the Hon. the Colonial Secretary has made upon the subject. I cannot for a moment admit that any circumstances of private convenience can be of such importance as to induce either this Council or the public in general to suppose for a moment that it would be advisable that a law should be introduced for the purpose of setting aside any of the privileges we have left. The privileges enjoyed by Parliament, of whatever character, are so sacred that I regret hearing the Hon. the Colonial Secretary suggest legislation for setting them aside. The truth of this matter is easily arrived at. In the first place the committal of perjury under any circumstances is an occurrence which is rarely contemplated; therefore, to contemplate exceptional legislation to cover such occasional cases as may occur would be a mistake. The only allegation that can be brought forward is that witnesses who commit perjury may escape. In the first place it is unlikely that witnesses will perjure themselves, because evidence given before this Council's Committees is given impartially, and is given by persons disinterestedly. And why? Because the character of the inquiry and the cross-examinations carried on by Select Committees are of that kind that witnesses are scarcely ever inclined to nail themselves down to any particular evidence which cannot on cross-examination be fairly sustained. But the great point is this: Perjury in evidence before Committees is an offence of extremely rare occurrence.

The Hon. Mr. P. A. BUCKLEY.—Sir, does not the resolution, as it now reads, beg the whole question, inasmuch as it declares that the proceedings which have been taken are in breach of the privileges of the Council? I am not aware that there is any privilege of this or any other Assembly which would protect a person from punishment the necessary result of an offence. That is the only point to which I wish to direct attention—whether any person who has committed the offence of perjury, which is only a misdemeanour, can be protected from punishment by the privileges of this House.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL.—I think, Sir, the Hon. the Colonial Secretary would have perceived, had he devoted the same attention to May as this case led me to do, that there is no necessary immunity for a person during the recess, because certain powers are vested in the Speaker; and, if his powers are defective in regard to such a matter as this, I should then suggest that they be extended so as to empower the Speaker, during the recess, to act for the Council in giving permissions for prosecutions. But I think it will be found that sufficient power already vests in the Speaker to meet the difficulty suggested. The Hon. Mr. Buckley seemed to be under some misunderstanding as to what I said. I have not the slightest desire to protect any witness in the committal of perjury. In fact, in this very case, which miscarried from the want of my evidence and that of the officers of the Council, I felt disposed to regret that I did not feel it within my duty to this Council to take upon myself to give evidence, because the point at issue had been fixed upon my memory by certain little circumstances which I will not refer to now. I have no doubt, however, that the matter will come up for discussion when the Committee brings up the report, and probably I shall then have something more to say. Our privileges are not intended to protect witnesses from the consequences of giving false evidence before Committees. I might mention to the Council, because it may have escaped the memory of honorable members, that at the last sitting of this Council petitions were presented by the prosecutor in this case, asking for leave to prosecute. Therefore I thought it was proper to lose no time in bringing these proceedings under the notice of the Council, so as to smooth the way for the impartial consideration of the petitions which have been presented. The complainant, being a Maori, can only be supposed to have been very ill advised by his lawyer; but the period which has been allowed to elapse between the committal of the supposed offence and the prosecution—seven or eight years—certainly afforded time for the prosecutor or his adviser to have discovered what the privileges of the Council were, so that he should not have interfered with our privileges by proceeding to institute a charge before the leave of the Council was obtained.

Motion agreed to.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The Hon. Mr. WOOD.—Sir, I rise with considerable diffidence upon this occasion to move a Reply to His Excellency's opening Speech. And I do so with a consciousness of the immense importance of the matters dealt with in that Speech, and also a deep consciousness of my own unfitness to deal with them in a proper manner. But I feel sure that I shall have the indulgence of this Council for a short time while I make a few remarks in reference thereto, and I feel that any shortcomings on my part will be looked on with very gracious eyes. The Council will doubtless heartily concur in the wish expressed in the opening paragraph of His Excellency's Speech, that the present Parliament may be distinguished by the enactment of such measures as shall be conducive towards promoting the happiness and welfare of the people of New Zealand. I am sure we shall all heartily concur in that wish, and I trust that at the end of the present session of this Parliament it will be found that the laws have been so amended as to make them meet the general wish of the people of New Zealand from end to end. Every honorable member of this Council will learn with great pleasure that the commercial gloom and severe monetary pressure which have for some time past been prevalent throughout the world, including New Zealand, have been clearing off. It is very gratifying indeed to learn from such high authority that that gloom is now passing away, and that New Zealand at least is thoroughly sound. A severe strain undoubtedly has been felt all over the country, and it is highly pleasing to learn that so few evil effects have resulted from it. I think it may encourage us to believe that a return to that prosperity which we have hitherto enjoyed will occur at no very distant period. His Excellency informs us that proposals will be laid before the Legislature for amending the electoral laws so as to bring about a better representation of the people in the House of Representatives. This Bill, we are told, goes upon the broad principle that every man who pays taxes, or is otherwise affected by legislation, has a right to representation. That is a subject which has occupied the time and minds of thinking men for many years past. Many of the deepest thinkers of the age have formed that opinion; while others, who have devoted much time and thought to the matter, have arrived at very opposite views. I think it would not be in good taste if I were to occupy your time by giving my own views on the matter at the present moment. It is one of those questions that will come before us during the session. I may possibly have some remarks to make then, but I certainly shall not detain the Council by going into the matter at the present moment. Another part of His Excellency's Speech informs us that a Bill will be laid before us for the purpose of reducing the time for which any Parliament shall sit, from five to three years. I have always been favourable—at least, for some years—to a change in this direction. Whether the term should be two, three, four, or five years, there are great differences of opinion; but I do think myself that five years is too long in this colony—whatever it may be in an old-settled country—where changes occur so very rapidly and frequently. I think that a shorter period would be far preferable. I think, if this system were adopted of a Parliament only sitting for three years, it would tend to do away—at least, very materially to do away—with that objection, that cry that is frequently raised, that the Parliament, or the representatives, do not truly represent the people. If the representatives can be brought face to face with their constituents more frequently, a better understanding will certainly exist between them. If it were found, when a good understanding did exist, that their representatives still persisted in misrepresenting them, it would be within the power of the constituents to change them for persons who would more truly represent their views. For that and other reasons, which I will not go into at the present moment, I think this is a step in the right direction. His Excellency is also pleased to inform us that the constituencies will be so arranged that, in so far as practicable, the population in each electoral district will be fairly represented, and that a measure for this purpose will be duly laid before us. Before passing on from this matter, I should like to say a few words. I will not detain the Council at any length, but more particularly I would wish to impress upon the mind of the representative of the Government in this Council the necessity for early steps being taken—if they have not been taken already—for the purpose of obtaining those data which will be necessary to enable them to prepare such a Bill, and lay it before this Council in such a form that it can be dealt with, and as it must be dealt with, before it can possibly take effect. It will be necessary to obtain plans showing the boundaries of the proposed electoral districts, and the population contained within such districts. These are matters that will necessarily take a very considerable time, and therefore I would venture to express the hope that the necessary steps have been already taken. I do not know whether the Bill has yet been printed; at any rate, I have not seen it. I suppose, as a matter of course, some considerable distinction will be made between town and country constituencies—I mean as to the number that shall have a right to a representative in towns or large constituencies, and also what number would be considered just in country constituencies. I think it will be admitted on all sides that there should be a considerable difference; but I am not going to suggest any number which I think would be the best in each particular case, or what should be the proportion. It is gratifying to be told by His Excellency that measures will be submitted to us which will enable those who desire to occupy small farms or rural allotments to obtain possession of lands much more readily, and at a smaller cost, than they can be obtained under the present system. I trust that well-devised measures for this purpose will be laid before us at no distant date. It is a matter which I have considered and advocated for a number of years past. In my position as a representative in the Provincial Council for several years, I advocated such principles. In my position as a member in another place I have also advocated the same principles. As a member of a Waste Lands Board I have carefully watched their operation for some years in the southern part of New Zealand, and I am thoroughly convinced—and the more I have seen the more convinced am I—that they are calculated to do substantial good to many thousands of people, by enabling them to settle, in the very best manner, many lands that are now comparatively unproductive; and I trust the small-farms system will be still further extended in such a way as to be a substantial benefit to the colony. I now come to the paragraph in which His Excellency is pleased to inform us that a measure will be laid before Parliament by which lands, the property of the Natives, not purchased by the Government for the public, will henceforth be sold in small blocks in the open market, on such terms as may be agreed upon with the proprietors.

"My Advisers are of opinion that by the adoption of this system great advantages will be secured to the whole European population of New Zealand, whilst the Natives will have the satisfaction of receiving the full value of their estates, and will no longer be subjected to those importunities and temptations to induce them to part with their lands which have hitherto proved a fertile source of misunderstanding and of evil to the two races."

I am not an authority on Native matters. The eighteen or twenty years I have spent in New Zealand have been at the extreme South, and therefore, beyond what I have read in the newspapers, and beyond the information I have gathered as a member of another branch of the Legislature, I cannot profess to any special knowledge of these matters. But the proposals contained in that paragraph seem to have the elements of fairness in them. I am inclined to think that, if that method is adopted, it will be calculated to remove many of the evils that are now complained of. I trust that the experiment will be made, and that it will prove as satisfactory as we could desire. There is another paragraph I should like to refer to before I sit down. We are told that no further development has taken place of the fanatical movement on the West Coast, that the tribes concerned appear to be quietly awaiting the action of the Parliament and of the ordinary Courts of law, and that steps are being taken for the holding of a full inquiry into the existence and extent of the alleged unfulfilled promises in regard to lands. I think we may congratulate ourselves that steps are being taken for this purpose. I trust that the greatest care has been exercised in the selection of persons to hold the inquiry about to be made. I trust that no loss of time will be allowed to take place. I trust that it will be a full and impartial inquiry; and, if it should be found that a wrong has been done, I trust that that wrong will be at once removed in such a way as to give satisfaction, and do ample justice to the Native persons concerned, and at the same time to confer honor on the Government. I do not think I should be justified in occupying the time of the Council at any greater length; therefore I shall conclude by moving that the Reply to His Excellency's opening Speech be agreed to.

The Hon. Mr. MARTIN.—Sir, my honorable friend has made a very long statement, and if I said a great deal more I could not improve upon it. Therefore I will second the Address in reply to the Speech of His Excellency the Governor.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the following Address in reply to His Excellency's opening Speech be agreed to:—

"MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY,—

"We, Her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Council of New Zealand, desire to return our thanks to your Excellency for the Speech with which you have been pleased to open the present session of Parliament.

"We cordially concur with your Excellency in the earnest hope that this Parliament may be distinguished by the enactment of such measures as shall be most conducive towards promoting the happiness and welfare of the people of this colony.

"We are gratified to learn from your Excellency that, notwithstanding the severe monetary pressure and commercial gloom which have for some time past prevailed throughout the colony, your Excellency has reason to believe that the position of this colony is thoroughly sound.

"We thank your Excellency for informing us that measures will be brought before us for amending the electoral laws, and for amending the laws for regulating the purchase of lands from the Natives, and also a Bill for regulating the immigration of Chinese into the colony; and we beg to assure your Excellency that these measures, and all other measures that may be brought before us, shall receive our best and most careful consideration.

"We are glad to learn from your Excellency that the state of Native affairs on the West Coast has assumed no more serious development; and we learn with satisfaction that steps are being taken to vindicate the law where it has been violated.

"Your Excellency may rely that we will bestow our best exertions in promoting the interests of the colony and the welfare of the people."—(Hon. Mr. Wood.)

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—Sir, I do not feel disposed to allow the Address in Reply to pass as a mere matter of course. I think there is an advantage frequently arising from a debate upon occasions of this sort; and consequently I purpose availing myself of what is the undoubted privilege of each member of this Council—namely, that of expressing his sentiments with reference to the motion now under consideration. I may say that I listened with a great deal of attention and a good deal of pleasure to the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Wood, and I felt rejoiced to find that the Government had succeeded in finding some honorable member cordially supporting their views, and having a thorough belief in the genuineness of their professions. If any stranger to New Zealand politics took up the Speech of His Excellency on opening Parliament, he could not avoid arriving at the conclusion—a conclusion altogether unwarranted by facts—that the late appeal to the constituencies had been upon subjects connected with a broad policy, and did not, as undoubtedly was the fact, arise from the other branch of the Legislature having, in the strongest terms, condemned the maladministration of the Ministry. The appeal was not, as one would infer from the Speech, upon broad principles of policy, but it was an appeal from a competent tribunal, who knew the proceedings of Government, and were in a position to give a reliable opinion upon its competency—it was an appeal from that tribunal to a tribunal not so acquainted with the circumstances, and which consequently was not so competent to give an opinion upon the matter at issue as the Legislature of this colony. It is true that during the course of those elections there were continually brought forward professions of what were called great liberal principles; but those who were well acquainted with the circumstances of the case were aware that these professions of liberal policy were not brought forward in consequence of an adverse opinion expressed in reference to them by the late Parliament, but merely as a blind to divert the attention of the public from the question at issue, which was the competence of the Government, and to raise a false issue. If there ever was a case in which the term "an organized hypocrisy" could be applied to a political party, it was in reference to the action of the Government in going forth to the public in these late elections upon a cry of political principles, when the question at stake was solely and entirely their own competency or incompetency to manage the business of the country. The Speech of his Excellency refers to the present session as likely to be one—if the proposed legislation is adopted—that will be memorable in the annals of the colony. Whether this will be so or not I cannot say—time only will show—but this I can say, that at any rate the late elections will be memorable in the annals of the colony. They will be memorable on account of the issues at stake, which were, broadly stated, whether the country should be under personal rule, or whether the country should henceforth be under constitutional government. That was the broad issue, I say. They will be memorable, likewise, on account of the manner in which those elections were conducted; and if the colony does not lay to heart the lessons to be learned from the late elections—if it does not by its action condemn those measures, and does not take steps to prevent the recurrence of such measures in the future, the late elections will be memorable as the first step to the downfall of liberal institutions in the colony; because, if elections are to be conducted in the future as they have recently been conducted, one thing is certain—that our institutions will cease to have the respect of the inhabitants, their power for good will thereby be affected, and we shall gradually sink lower and lower until we assume a position no higher than that of the Spanish States in South America. The late elections have, as we all know, been very closely contested; but, from the first, it has appeared to those who disinterestedly watched the campaign that the combatants were altogether unmatched. On one side we saw the Government, armed with the power of the purse, having at its command a treasury, possessing command over steamers placed at its disposal, capable of influencing the Press by the advertisements with which it had the power of favouring those papers that supported its views; having at its command the Telegraph Department, the Native Department, the Armed Constabulary Department; and having further at its command the power of recommending gentlemen to His Excellency for seats in this Council. We have seen, on the one side, the Government armed with all these powers, and prepared to use them to the fullest extent. We have seen, on the other side, the party in opposition to them deprived of those advantages, and labouring under the still further disadvantage of having a spark of conscience not altogether extinct, and of still possessing some regard for constitutional rule. These things were disadvantages, as compared with advantages possessed by the Government, which from the first rendered the combatants unequally matched, and which undoubtedly had a great influence upon the elections. The course adopted by the Government in the recent elections is a course unparalleled in the history of this colony—unparalleled in the practice of the mother-country—unparalleled and unprecedented in the practice of any constitutional country, with the exception, probably, of the neighbouring colony of Victoria—one whose constitutional history should serve, in my opinion, as a warning rather than an example to this colony. I refer to the course of the Ministry in stamping the country, with a view not only of forwarding their own interests, but likewise of damaging the interests of their opponents, and to get returned in their favour members pledged so thickly to themselves as to cease to be independent members of the Legislature. This action of the Government in stamping the country in this way I condemn in the strongest terms, as being not only objectionable in itself, but thoroughly unconstitutional. The Government, in their action, have not only availed themselves of their powers of suasion to influence the elections; but they have, in the most flagrant manner, used the powers of their office to influence the constituencies, and to influence the future constitution of Parliament. When the Hon. the Premier sent that telegram to the West Coast on the eve of an election, promising to the inhabitants of that locality a railway condemned by the officers of the Government, and which would involve the country in an expenditure of over one million and a quarter sterling—

An Hon. MEMBER.—Two millions.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—My honorable friend says two millions. Was the Premier, in promising that railway, not using the powers of his office with a view of influencing the elections of this country? When on the eve of the election he placed himself in communication with the Chairman of the County Council of the Thames, where he was about to stand as a candidate, and sent that gentleman back with £11,000 in his pocket, as what he was pleased to call the money given to him in fulfilment of unfulfilled promises—£11,000 given at a time when the Treasury notoriously did not possess funds at its disposal to enable it to pay, as they fell due, the current liabilities—was he not then using the powers of his office to control the elections? The Government went further. When, after a vote of this branch of the Legislature, condemning a certain railway as opposed to both the letter and the spirit of the law, and after the action of the Government had been condemned in one of the charges against them by the other branch of the Legislature—when in the face of these facts the Government upon the eve of the elections entered into two fresh contracts for two fresh sections of that railway, were not the Government exercising the powers of their office with the view of influencing the elections? When the Government took at their own disposal the service of the two steamers belonging to the country—the “Hinemoa” and the “Stella”—when one went north and the other south in order that facilities might be given to Ministers for creating an agitation throughout the country—when they availed themselves of the services of these vessels—services which were to be paid for at the cost of the country—again I ask, were they not availing themselves of the powers of their office to control in an improper manner the elections of the country? When the Hon. the Colonial Secretary, at a time when there were not in the Treasury sufficient funds to pay with regularity the claims falling due, and when the Government were obliged to postpone payment of claims due to their creditors—when, accompanied by the Native Minister, he hurried, on the eve of an election, to Napier, ostensibly to drive the first pile of a bridge, but really to create an opposition to the candidates who were then in the field as against the Government—I ask, were not he and his colleague availing themselves of the powers of their office to influence the elections there? And I will ask the same question with reference to a telegram that has created some sensation throughout the country. When the Colonial Secretary encouraged the opponent of a former sitting member for one of the constituencies, and when he promised him that even in case of defeat his interests should be regarded—and we know that the promise was a seat in this Council—when in this way, by holding out a promise of a seat in this Council, he endeavoured to influence the constituencies in the choice of a representative, was he not using the powers of his office improperly to influence the elections of the country? One might easily swell the indictment against Ministers, but I will refer only to one other point. That is in connection with the Native Minister. When he, at an expense from which many princes would have shrunk, for the purpose of starting an opposition to a member for another district, rushed through from Tauranga to Clive by special coach, was he not then using the powers of his office in order to influence an election in an improper manner? No person can have made himself acquainted with the circumstances to which I have referred without feeling that in these matters the Ministry have, in a most flagrant manner—and I might add, if the term were not unparliamentary, in the most unscrupulous manner—endeavoured to influence the elections. I ask whether such conduct is not calculated to strike a blow at the independence of the Legislature—whether such conduct should be allowed to pass without being condemned in the strongest terms possible. Nearly a hundred years ago somewhat similar conduct was adopted by the Ministry then in power in England; and the action taken by that Ministry called forth a resolution, which was passed by the Legislature, and which is so strikingly applicable to the proceedings of the Ministry in this colony lately that, although it has appeared in print elsewhere, I will not hesitate to read it to the Council. The resolution is as follows:—

“That it is highly criminal in any Minister or Ministers, or other servants under the Crown, directly or indirectly to use the powers of office in the election of representatives to serve in Parliament; and an attempt at such influence will at all times be resisted by this House, as aimed at its honor, dignity, and independence, as an infringement of the dearest right of every subject throughout the empire, and as tending to sap the basis of its Constitution.”

The action taken by this Ministry in the cases to which I have referred is action that ought to be resisted by Parliament. It is action which is calculated to injure the honor, the dignity, and the independence of Parliament. They have infringed the dearest right of every subject throughout the country, and have endeavoured, to the best of their ability, to deal a deadly blow at the basis of the Constitution of the country. We are, unfortunately, not in a position to efficiently punish the Government for its action, which deserves to have applied to it the term “highly criminal,” as it is applied in the resolution of the House of Commons which I have just read. There can be no doubt about it—their action has been highly criminal; and, though there may be no law enabling us to deal with such conduct as it deserves, still I think it will have the effect of eliciting condemnation in the strongest terms from every well-thinking lover of his country. We have, it is true, no means of punishing such proceedings here, but, nevertheless, there are constitutional countries where such conduct would be dealt with in a more decided manner than we are able to deal with it. The Colonial Secretary does not altogether approve of the references that I make from time to time to the experience of English-speaking communities like ours in America, but I will not thereby be deterred from again making reference thereto. There is in the Constitution of the State of California a distinct provision framed with the view of meeting crimes of the character to which I have referred; and it declares that if any person endeavour to influence the Legislature by promises of office, by promises of reward, or by threats and intimidation, he shall be liable to punishment for felony—liable to imprisonment for two years with hard labour. The conduct of Ministers, to which I have referred, is conduct coming within that law; and happy it is indeed for the members of the Government—for the Colonial Secretary and the Premier—that they live, not in the State of California, but in the Colony of New Zealand. I cannot but think that when the honorable gentlemen, in a moment of piety, thank Divine Providence for mercies received, they will include within these mercies the privilege of not having been born in a State like that. There are just one or two matters in the Speech to which I will refer. I cannot take the same view of the financial condition of the country that has been taken by my honorable friend Mr. Wood. I cannot think that the position is thoroughly sound, merely because Ministers have stated so. It will be time enough to give an opinion as to the condition of this colony when we cease borrowing. So long as we are borrowing as we are, it is utterly impossible to say what is the position of the colony. We are at the present time spending £3,000,000 of borrowed money every year. That is equal to the introduction into Great Britain of £200,000,000 a year. If such a sum were annually introduced into Great Britain, what would be the result? What inflation, what apparent prosperity! Yet that is our position at the present time; and while this expenditure is going on, while we are introducing borrowed money to the extent we are, it is premature to state that our condition is sound. When we shall have contracted our borrowing we shall be in a better position to judge of the financial condition of the colony. With regard to these three great liberal measures which are being displayed before the eyes of the eager public with such loud pretensions, we are told that if these were adopted “the power of legislation would then largely rest in the hands of the people.” What is the meaning of the phrase? At the present time, does not that power rest entirely in the hands of the people? We have no governing class in this community. If we have a governing class at all, it is a very small one—it is, in fact, the Premier himself, who wishes to govern the country as he pleases: but, so far as legislation is concerned, the choice of the legislation is entirely in the hands of the people of New Zealand; and, if the constitutional privileges which are promised in this Speech are granted, the benefit will be exceedingly small. There are already something like ninety thousand electors out of less than half a million people; and, surely, if this is the case, the power of legislation may be said to be entirely in the hands of the people. It is not my intention to refer to these three points of the great constitutional charter promised in the Speech, further than to say this: that personally I attach comparatively little importance to them, and their only importance in my mind arises from a desire to see them finally and effectually settled. I would far sooner see them at once and for ever settled than that they should be left in the present state, and that it should be in the power of stump orators to go round the country, raising class against class with the false assertion that one class is more privileged than another. I listened with a good deal of astonishment to two or three paragraphs referring to Native affairs. I must say, when I heard them I could not help thinking that it was impossible for the power of audacity to go further than it has gone in this matter. The Speech says,—

Why, Sir, what has been done? These Native matters have been simply going on from bad to worse. There has been no control over them at all. The Natives have by degrees learned altogether to ignore our Courts of law. They have learned to take matters into their own hands; and we have looked idly on, and, in fact, we have had to appeal to them to assist us in our difficulties, and have asked their unauthorized Courts to come to our help. When we last met we had but one Native difficulty—that was on the West Coast. That was bad enough, and I have no hesitation in saying that while it continues there can be no permanent peace in the colony. The Speech says,—

Alleged unfulfilled promises! As if there were any doubt on the subject! What the Natives ask—and they ask as a right—is, not that the Government will go into alleged unfulfilled promises made by persons of whom the Government are not aware, but that the Government will make inquiries as to what steps have been taken to fulfil the obligations entered into by the Proclamation of confiscation. That is what the Natives want. That Proclamation under the hand of Sir George Grey most distinctly reserved to the loyal Natives the lands they held, and distinctly declared that reserves should be set aside for those who had no land. This has never been done; and these are the promises that the Natives wish to have inquired into—not an inquiry as to what Sir Donald McLean or any one else promised, but the obligations undertaken under the hand of Sir George Grey. Until this is done there is no hope that Native affairs on the West Coast will become peaceful. That nothing has been done since Parliament last met is in itself disgraceful. But, while our difficulties on the West Coast remain as embarrassing as ever, we have now difficulties in many other directions. Events move on so rapidly that we are apt to forget the progress even of current history; and it is well sometimes to have matters recalled to our attention in order that the leading features may not be lost sight of. Now, there is the shooting of the surveyors at Te Aroha. We are in a position to form some judgment upon that subject. It appears that the Government had bought the interest or rights of certain Natives in some land before there had been sufficient inquiry into the ownership of the land. Nevertheless they ordered the surveyors to survey the land. There were contending claimants, and the land had never been passed through the Court.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—I think the honorable gentleman is wrong. The land had been passed through the Court.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—The honorable gentleman cannot be aware of the circumstances. The land had not been passed through the Court, and these claimants proceeded to stop the survey, and undoubtedly tried to take the life of one of the survey party. Immediately the news of this occurrence reached Auckland the Native Minister proceeded to the locality. He at once told us, in language to which we are somewhat accustomed, that there was no political significance in the matter, but at the same time he showed it was his intention to make political capital out of it, and he added he would avail himself of the opportunity of demanding from the Natives the right to make telegraphs, railways, and roads through the land. Although there was no political significance in it, he would avail himself of the opportunity of punishing the innocent for the guilty. On arriving at the Thames he ordered a detachment of police to proceed to the apprehension of the offenders. They had not proceeded far when they found it would be dangerous to go further, and they decided under the circumstances that it was desirable to retire to Grahamstown. The Native Minister seems to have been somewhat taken aback by this occurrence; but he spoke no less vigorously. He intimated that, in consequence of the fresh aspect of affairs, it might be necessary to confiscate this land. The Government possessed no power to confiscate an acre, yet the distinct statement was made and telegraphed throughout the colony that the Native Minister contemplated having recourse to this extreme and illegal measure. However, he proceeded no further. He seems to have been daunted by the opposition this step was likely to arouse, and he contented himself with enrolling and placing upon daily pay a number of the independent electors of the Thames, whose suffrages he was about to seek; and these men he kept at the Thames. It was found that they had little experience, that in fact they could not load their muskets, and that it would be rather dangerous to send them out against men who were at least able to handle muskets with considerable advantage. They were therefore detained at the Thames on daily pay, and there they still are on daily pay. If their services are not required to put down the Maoris, they will at any rate be available for the election shortly to take place. The next step taken by the Native Minister was to call together a tribunal altogether unknown to the law, and to place the matter in the hands of this body. The Native chiefs were summoned, and they were constituted a Court to inquire into the circumstances of the case. Even Government officers attended and gave testimony. The matter entirely passed out from the Native Office, and passed into the hands of the Native chiefs. I believe we might use with great advantage the services of the Native chiefs, and that it is a pity we do not put more power into their hands; but it is time enough to do so when our laws have been altered so as to give validity to any course that may be adopted. At this time this Court was unknown to the law, and it was highly improper that it should have been deputed by the Native Minister to try this matter. Well, the Court met, and the decision was much the same as might have been expected. It was decided that the action of the Government was wrong—that this land had never passed through the Native Land Court, and that the Government ought not to buy land before it had passed through the Court. The Court further decided that the action of the Natives would have been right, under such circumstances, in taking the matter into their own hands and shooting down the surveyors, had those surveyors been Maoris; but, seeing that the man shot was not a Maori, but a European, to that extent they were wrong, and had brought themselves within the law of the land; and it was recommended that the offenders should surrender themselves. This was the result of the Court—the men were recommended to give themselves up. And while the elections were going on it appeared that these men were going to surrender themselves, and flaming telegrams were sent about the country to that effect. One of these stated that this shooting affair was the best thing that could have happened; it was to be of immense advantage to the country. But what has been the result? The matter has been going on a long time, and this is the net result: The action of the Government has been condemned by the Court; and now we hear that two pias have been erected, and the Natives are openly defying the law. That is the upshot, while in the Speech we are coolly told,—

I have given a plain, unvarnished story of the state of affairs on the East Coast, and honorable members can judge for themselves how far that statement is in accordance with the view presented by the Government in that paragraph. And what is the other intertribal affair? It is a dispute among the Ngapuhi. Now, the Ngapuhi for the last thirty-seven years have been the most loyal Natives in New Zealand. We have always felt that the English law was reigning through the Ngapuhi's land—that a generation had grown up who had learned to respect the English law; but such has been the effect of the two years' power of the present Government that these people now ignore the English law. They take matters into their own hands, and fight amongst themselves; several men are killed, and others are wounded; and all about matters which, did we possess the confidence of the Natives, would have been adjudicated upon in our Courts of law. I wish we could believe these were the only cases in which there were indications of our having lost the confidence of the Natives. Only the other day, however, there was a telegram to the effect that a surveyor had been ordered off at another point, the Maoris telling him that the King refused to recognize the aukati line, and claimed the whole of the Island. One cannot see what is taking place all around without seeing that by the continuance of the present Administration in office the European mana—the European prestige—is being entirely destroyed; and with a race like the Maoris you cannot destroy that prestige without laying the colony open to great and serious evils. I will not occupy the time of the Council further, for other members will probably wish to say a few words upon the Address. I regard this session as likely to be one of great importance in the annals of this colony, and I must say I sincerely reciprocate the desire of His Excellency that in all our proceedings we shall be guided by a spirit of wisdom and sound judgment.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—Sir, the honorable gentleman has, in accordance with his annual custom, made an attack upon this as he does upon all Governments, of a singularly acrimonious description, the consequence of his well-known personal disposition and predilection for the extreme in criticism. I do not suppose the honorable gentleman really thinks one-half of what he says, or that his judgment really commends the superlatives he employs. If I am wrong, and if we may be said to judge others by ourselves, he must be a very unhappy man. The honorable gentleman began by stating that the appeal recently made to the constituencies was not an appeal from a condemnation on account of measures, but entirely on account of the administration of the Government. The honorable gentleman must be well aware that it is not only quite within what may be considered fair-play, but also within the strictest practice of parliamentary precedent, that a Government appealing to the country should take exactly its own ground in such an appeal. There are plenty of instances of Ministries being displaced upon personal grounds, but electing to go to the country not upon personal grounds, but upon political grounds. Of course the two things cannot be very well separated. The present Government believed that any excuse to remove a Government that proposed certain measures would undoubtedly be used in Parliament; and, even with the advantage of the hypercritical faculty which the honorable gentleman possesses, and that immense fund of invective he can always draw upon, he did not make out such a case as would justify the people of this country in rejecting the appeal of the Ministry from the dictum of the Houses on what their own common sense told them was the real question between the parties. In point of fact, our measures are distasteful to certain persons, and those certain persons take what, I admit, is a very fair political way to upset them, by endeavouring to turn the Government out of office for alleged faults of administration. I do not think the honorable gentleman need have put so much stress upon that; because he knows that what I say is the fact. When the honorable gentleman gets up and talks about organized hypocrisy, and indulges in language of that description, one can hardly avoid smiling at the unnecessary vehemence of his expressions. The honorable gentleman says that what is really put to the country is, whether personal or constitutional government is to exist in this country. If that were the question, there would be very few people who would hesitate on which side they ought to cast their votes; but the only personality in this case is the personality of the Premier, who is unpopular with the honorable member, as he is with some other persons. It is almost an impossibility for a man to fill a great place in public life for so extended a period of years as the Premier has done so without making a very great many enemies, and it is undoubtedly a drawback to his political position that these enemies rise up in times like these. The "snarling of the cur" theory is justified to a certain extent in our race, and when a statesman is supposed to be powerless there are plenty who bark at his heels. In no other way can I understand this "personality." I have seen nothing to justify that expression in the government of the last two years, except as regards Native affairs, in which I quite admit the Native Minister and the Premier have been allowed a greater latitude than would have been the case in any other branch of government; and in that we have followed the exact precedent of all Governments since 1869, when this paternal system of governing the Natives was introduced.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN.—No, no.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—I say Yes. When the honorable gentleman opposite himself went on a tour through the interior of the country he spoke in a way he could not have spoken without a Cabinet Council in respect of any other branch of administration. The necessity of things is such that, if affairs are to be managed in that way, the Native Minister must be allowed a great deal more latitude than any other Minister. And it becomes a speciality. Take any man and put him in as Native Minister for five years: why, in that time even my honorable friend would in the end be quite indistinguishable from the Native Office official. I do not accept the blame, on behalf of the Government, of the departmental policy of the Native Department. I consider that that has been forced upon this Government. The honorable gentleman charges the Government with having grossly misconducted the elections. The honorable gentleman has been speaking about matters of fact which he either does not know, or as to which his credulity has been imposed upon. He has either misunderstood what he has been told, or is ignorant of what he is talking about, or has been made the victim of very gross imposition; for there has been no such interference with the elections as he would lead this Council to believe. I have not any information about the £11,000. He tells me, and for the first time I hear it, that the Mayor of Grahamstown carried back the sum of £11,000. I entirely disbelieve such a statement. The honorable gentleman said the Government had not at that time in the Treasury sufficient to meet its current engagements. If that was the case, where did the money come from, and what on earth were the Auditors thinking about? Then came the Press advertisements, which are heard of at every session of Parliament. All the Press men on one side call out because they do not get enough, and when they change places you hear the same cry from newspaper men on the other side. That same thing has happened during the whole of the seventeen years I have been in politics. As a fact, the advertisements are distributed by the Government on perfectly fair principles, and on a perfectly defensible and easily-understood system.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN.—Oh, oh!

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—The honorable gentleman opposite no doubt sympathizes

Hon. Colonel Whitmore

with the Press. He is aware that in this town there are two morning newspapers. He understands specially about one of them. Well, every dog has his day. That dog had its day, and now the other dog has its day. I am sorry to say that there are a great many political gentlemen intimately connected with newspapers who do not think this too small a matter to growl about. The principle is one of open tender. One morning paper in each part of the colony got the provincial Gazette notices by tender, and the other advertisements are, generally speaking, given to the same newspaper: not in all cases, however, because some have to be more widely circulated than in the provincial Gazette—that is to say, a notification requiring to be advertised in Dunedin, Invercargill, and Oamaru would be published in each of those places. The choice is a fair one, when all things are equal; and I take it for granted that, should the Government—as I have no fear it will—yield its place to another, we shall see the newspaper outcry not lessened, but the papers which complain changed. That is the Press influence which the Government has had, and it is not at all different from the Press influence of all other Governments. It is by no means an invariable rule that the Government is supported by those newspapers which have the advertisements as the provincial Gazette. Then, as to the steamers, the honorable gentleman amplified things. He stated that the "Stella" went south, and the "Hinemoa" went north. All the "Stella" did was to go straight to the lighthouses in the South, after the prorogation; and she has not yet returned. The "Hinemoa," on the other hand, was never used until the Premier came back from Lyttelton to go to Auckland. He made that one voyage, and back as far as Wellington; and in doing that, even, there was a certain amount of requirement for that voyage, independently of his trip. I do not think the honorable gentleman is strictly correct in supposing that there is no precedent for a Premier speaking in two or three different parts of the country during an election. The honorable gentlemen will find that I am correct in saying that Lord Palmerston, when it was a matter of personal election, did speak in several different places. The Premier was the only member of the Ministry who took this sort of part in the elections. Most of the other Ministers were away at their separate electorates to be elected, but the Premier was the only one who went outside the actual constituency he was dealing with; and I conceive he was fully justified in doing so. Then the honorable gentlemen said that we had influenced the public by the use of the telegraph. There has been a great deal said about one telegram, but, so long as the telegraph is used in reason, and paid for, in election matters, I cannot see why, because the Government have less time at their disposal than their opponents, they may also not use the telegraph. That former Governments have been in the habit of using it the honorable member knows full well, because, in the proceedings of a Committee in 1871, he will find that Mr. Fox admitted he had both sent and received some seventeen or twenty telegrams on these subjects during the elections, and in a few mild words of the report the Committee rather deprecate that course for the future. So that it is not quite unheard-of. The Native Department, the honorable gentleman says, has been a lever during these elections. On the contrary, it has been a very great drawback to the Government, because it has been a point of honor with the Government not to commit the country to anything until Parliament assembled, so that our successors might have a carte blanche to begin with. If the Government had done anything which might have brought about hostilities, that would have been a very great embarrassment to the country during the elections. That is the only way in which the Native Department has affected the Government. Then, as to the Armed Constabulary Department. In what respect that has helped the Government I think the honorable gentleman will find it exceedingly difficult to show. He cannot say I used them for force, or that I put him in the guard-room to prevent his very active electioneering during these troubled times, or that I employed any voters in the Force. The honorable gentleman cannot prove political bias in a single movement, so far as the Armed Constabulary are concerned. He cannot show that I have given greater protection here or there, or that any changes or appointments of any kind were made during the elections. The honorable gentleman says there were the seats in the Legislative Council which also might have assisted the Government in gaining power. The honorable gentleman knows perfectly well that, by express memorandum of His Excellency, we were debarred from using that; and therefore he cannot justify that ground of attack. When he says that the other side were not only embarrassed from having no money, but through having inconvenient consciences, he really makes me smile. He knows that the money lay on the other side, and that it was wealth fighting against the people without wealth. And, secondly, as regards consciences, the less the honorable gentleman says about that the better, I think. Then the honorable gentleman talks about the action of the Government being unprecedented, except in the case of Victoria. I suppose he wished to show that the course of the Government has been gravitating towards the Victorian example. I only hope he is wrong. I see no indication of it, and I should very much regret it if it were so. The honorable gentleman says the Premier sent a telegram promising a railway to cost two millions of money, and he asked, was not that an abuse of his office? No doubt it would be if it were true, but the honorable gentleman knows that what he says is not true.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Order, order.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—I do not say it is not a fact that the Premier sent a telegram promising a railway, but I say that that was not a promise to induce support, because it was the gift of this Parliament, and of all who took part in the passing of the Railways Construction Bill, and the cost is estimated at £900,000. That is the exact position of that railway. The Premier, I presume, was asked by some public body whether he was not going to give effect to the wishes of Parliament. Parliament had decided that this work was to be done, and probably the Premier was asked whether the Government intended to give effect to that decision, and probably the answer of the Premier was that the Government would build that railway, as it was bound to do by law. If it is stated that the Premier endeavoured to influence support by beginning a new railway at a cost of two millions, that, I say, is an incorrect statement, and entirely wrong. I know nothing about the story of the Mayor of the Thames going away with £11,000. I will venture to say it is not the case. I am quite certain of this: either the Mayor was entitled to it, or else the Auditors did not do their duty, if he got money to which he was not entitled. That is the best answer I can give to the statement of the honorable gentleman. The honorable gentleman says that, the action of the Government in regard to the Thames Railway being condemned by the Legislature, they should not have continued making the railway. That railway was in the same position as any other railway. The understanding was that the railways were to be continued on a pro rata scale: a certain amount of money was voted for the quarter, and the rate of progress was to be kept up as before. There has just been the ordinary rate of progress on that railway, and no more.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN.—May I ask what railway you are speaking about?

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—I am speaking of all railways, including the Thames Railway.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN.—There never has been a vote of any kind for the Thames Railway.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—That is a statement the Government do not admit. That line stands on all-fours with all other railways. Having commenced the railway, the Government were bound to continue it like other lines. The honorable gentleman made great capital out of the circumstance that, when one piece of colonial expenditure in Hawke's Bay was incurred, I hurried up to take part in the ceremony of driving the first pile. I went up with the ordinary steamer, and was away the shortest number of days I could possibly be. I went to see a work inaugurated which, for two years, at all events, had been promised, and delayed all that time. When at last everything was ready, very much later than we had hoped for, I went up to a place where I had lived for so many years to see the celebration; and I cannot see how the honorable gentleman can make out that there was anything improper about that. The fact of the elections coming off about that time was the purest of accidents. I was up there three months after the session before last, and promised then that I would come up to drive the first pile shortly before the opening of the next session. It so happened that they could not get the plans ready until Parliament met. The time for receiving tenders did not expire until Parliament rose, and the work was immediately put in hand. I went up with no idea of influencing the elections any more than at any other time. The honorable gentleman said something about my telegram to Mr. Ingles. I am not at all ashamed of that telegram. I am ashamed to think that any one could have behaved in such an unworthy manner as to abstract it, garble it, conceal it, bring it forward when too late to contradict it, and put all sorts of constructions on the words it contained. It is true that there was a political promise connected with it; but there are persons who have minds to conceive something much lower than that, even of a high-minded gentleman like Mr. Ingles. Personally, for years I could have wished to see Mr. Ingles in this Council. Up to that time I had never had an opportunity of bringing his name before my colleagues; but I certainly did tell Mr. Ingles that, as I had been requested by the party to ask him to make a certain sacrifice for it, the party would consider his claims upon it if he complied. I should like to know what this Council would lose by having Mr. Ingles sitting on its benches. But I did not alone mean that I had another possible seat in my mind. I did not even ask Mr. Ingles to express himself very warmly in favour of the party. I just simply put before him what I thought was a very fair question in politics to ask—whether he would take a certain course to oblige a certain party—and added that if he did he would be very likely to have that party's support hereafter. As it happened, he refused. If all questions of future party support were dealt with in a straightforward way like that, I think we should have nothing to blush at. If nothing worse than that were said to candidates by Governments, I think no hypercritical person would find anything to object to in their behaviour. The honorable gentleman, referring to the Native Minister, speaks of expense at which princes would shrink. I suppose the honorable gentleman has been beguiled by something which he has seen in the newspapers. I believe the Native Minister came in the ordinary coach over a difficult journey, and, if he came by night as well as by day, I suppose it was all the more wearisome to the Native Minister. The honorable gentleman says he regrets that he has no power to punish those who do anything which displeases him, as the actions of the Native Minister appear to have done. When the honorable gentleman is speaking he always gives me the idea that he would like to have the power to punish. The honorable gentleman speaks with such a degree of earnestness that really one regrets he had not the birch in his hand. I observe that I am one of those whom the honorable gentleman would like to incarcerate for a term at hard labour. All the honorable gentleman says in conclusion I think could be accepted by persons on either side of politics. It is a fair question in what position the colony is financially; but, whatever that position may be, whether we have borrowed too much or not, whether the position of property-holders may become unbearable or not from taxation, still I believe that of New Zealand is essentially sound. The present property-holders might even pass away; but the land will produce as much as ever. It is possible that by the great public works policy, of which we have heard so much

said, or, rather, by the abuse of that policy, a reaction may be experienced by those who least expect it, and property may suffer very much from the extravagance of the past few years. But the colony will produce more every year. The productive power of the colony is of illimitable extent. The honorable gentleman says he thinks it is a very great thing to get these three points in the charter settled. I think nothing would be more desirable, because we must come to something almost more important immediately. We have to put our house in order, and we shall have to make a very great effort in the immediate future. The next year or two years will certainly tell upon our strength, and we shall have to practise, as well as to preach, economy. It is not at such a time as this that class should be arrayed against class, or party against party, when all of us, in so far as in us lies, should co-operate. Unless commercial affairs in Europe revive, we must all bear very heavy burdens for some time to come. I will not go into the question of Native affairs on the East Coast, for this simple reason: that it has been the study of the Government not to prejudice the Native position till the political question is settled. That it is unfortunate that this outrage should have occurred everybody will readily allow: still it is not a matter that even political hostility should entitle any one to exaggerate or gloat over. It is a misfortune that it occurred; but still nothing short of degrading ourselves, giving away our privileges, or allowing our persons or property to be violated by the Natives, should draw us into war while this loan is unsettled. It would be calculated to produce a very bad effect if it were supposed we were going to war. Moreover, I think it would be exceedingly impolitic, while Parliament is sitting, to take any steps that could be deferred which might lead to a conflict. During the sitting of Parliament the Executive is not free enough to attend to such a matter properly. Here I may state my belief that, even if an outbreak should ever again occur in this country, it would be put down within a short time; so that it could be easily stamped out during a recess. Then the honorable gentleman said that the Native Minister had employed a number of the electors of the Thames, and had placed them on full pay as a military force. Well, these men are at Ohinemuri, and are Thames electors. But the number is very small, and they are entitled to a capitation grant. They are a company whose services I at first declined to accept, but afterwards, when the Volunteer financial year commenced, I did accept them. They had hardly got their arms, and they had no drill instructor for a time, and consequently they had not been very well drilled; but there was no ground for the statement of some person in the newspaper that they could not fire their arms. Since then drill has been going on, and I saw a report a few days ago in which I was told they were making good progress towards efficiency. Their pay is but 2s. 6d. per day on the days they attend to drill, and that is not an unreasonable amount of pay, seeing that they live upon the frontier. It was not to be expected that they would leave their work and go to drill for nothing. I cannot conceive how any Thames electors could be influenced by that. I find I was in error in stating to-day that this land had been passed through the Court. The land was bought by the late Government, and the survey was therefore being proceeded with on land which was supposed to have been bought up a long time ago. Then the honorable gentleman said that this Court to which the Native Minister submitted the case was quite unknown to the law; and so on. Why, the Native Minister never submitted it to any Court. He never gave over the prisoners to be tried as regards their crime. He invoked the aid of the chiefs of Hauraki, in consequence of their having expressed sympathy with the Government, to find out these persons and induce them to submit themselves to the law; and, in doing that, he was only following the precedents in which the Hauraki chiefs have assisted the Government. It was not for a moment supposed that the men would be tried by their own semi-barbarous law, but by the strict law of England. I have not seen the judgment, so I cannot say whether it was so worded that the outrage was made to appear as a crime if directed against a European, but not if directed against a Maori; but in any case such a wording would not influence this or any other Government. I believe the Maoris shot that man in mistake for a half-caste; but there is no particular point in that. Whether they fired at a Maori or a European, to the Government it would have been the same. Then the honorable gentleman went on to the Ngapuhi dispute, and said that two years' tenure of office by this Government had turned that ordinarily law-abiding tribe into a set of men who care nothing for European laws. I should have thought the honorable gentleman had read our history enough to know that these tribes have been continually fighting among themselves. This is not the first time by two or three since I have been in the country that they have been engaged in such disputes. These tribal feuds between the two great sections of the northern Natives have occurred very frequently, and in times past have been very bloody. An outbreak among these people is nothing very new, and does not threaten any further disturbances of the country than we have seen at different times during the last twenty years. The effect is purely local. With regard to the telegram about which the honorable gentleman was so much concerned, and in which he says some surveyor was told he must go away because the King had established his aukati over the whole Island, I may say this: There has been sprung up lately a new and, no doubt, a very amusing kind of literature. Telegrams from the Press Agency and other associations are highly flavoured for the evening papers. They are sensational—that is all that can be said for them; but, as people like sensational telegrams, they are to be found in all the colonial newspapers. This telegram was one of that class. I may tell the honorable gentleman that the King has not attempted any such movement, but, on the contrary, the last we have heard of the King has been of a highly reassuring character, for he not only does not take any part in the affairs of the Bay of Plenty, but has expressed a strong opinion against the tribe which fired upon the surveyors. Well, Sir, last session we had this whole question out. These very measures which are now before us, and more especially this great Native question, were all fully discussed, so that it is hardly necessary to go into them again; but I must entirely repudiate the kind construction upon my political actions which the honorable gentleman has placed upon them, and assure him he has been very badly informed if he really believes in the existence of one-half the corruption which he attributes to the Government.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN—Sir, I should like to say a word or two before the mover replies. While agreeing with the first few paragraphs of the Address in Reply, I must take exception to that which states that we are glad to hear Native affairs are in a satisfactory condition. I differ from that altogether. I consider that Native affairs have assumed a very serious aspect, and, when we are told that steps have been taken to vindicate the law, I must say I fail to see that such has been done. I am very glad to see that the Government propose to bring in a Bill for triennial Parliaments. It is a step in the right direction. The Speech has the following:—

“A very general desire appears to exist that consideration should be given to the best means of promoting manufactures and local industries in this colony.”

I agree with that. I believe there is a very general feeling in favour of it, and that feeling has been expressed to the candidates during the recent election. I believe that a large number of the members of the House of Representatives are pledged to carry out these views. I know that in the North, and I believe in Canterbury also, it is the strong desire of the people that encouragement should be given to manufactures and local industries. The paragraph goes on,—

“With a view to give effect to this desire, you may probably think it advisable to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into and report upon the subject.”

I fail to see that the Government are going to give practical effect to this general desire; for, instead of any measures being proposed, the Speech goes on to say, as a sort of blind to the people, “You may probably think it advisable to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into and report upon the subject.” What does that mean? Nothing at all. The Committee may probably be appointed, and, if the Government approve of the encouragement of manufacturing industry, some effect may be given to its recommendations; but, if the Government do not approve of the principle of encouraging manufactures, the report of the Committee will fall to the ground, and its time will simply be lost. I say this much: From what I have gathered lately, in conversation with one of the members of the Government, I feel confident this paragraph is simply a blind to catch the support of many members of the other House.

The Hon. Mr. WOOD.—I desire to inform the Council that I have no wish to reply at length. My reason for arriving at this decision is that, although I listened with sorrow to the very strong charges brought by the honorable member opposite against the Government, yet I think those charges were so completely met and answered by the Hon. the Colonial Secretary that it is altogether unnecessary to take up the time of the Council by saying anything further on the matter.

Motion agreed to.

The Council adjourned at five o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, 30th September, 1879.

First Readings—Gaol Officials—Architects in Public Service—Hamilton-Te Aroha Railway—Canterbury Deferred Payments—Fire Brigades—Fortnightly Payment of Workmen—Deaf and Dumb Institution—Nelson Creek Bridge—East Coast Mail Service—Public Reserves Sales—Address in Reply.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Oamaru Waterworks Loan Bill, Slaughterhouses Bill, On-hunga Water Reserve Bill, Waiuku Recreation Reserve Bill, Ashburton County Council Waterworks Bill, Napier Church Lands Trust Bill, Special Settlements Bill, Land Bill, Resident Magistrates Bill, District Courts Bill, Napier and Manawatu Recreation Ground Bill.

GAOL OFFICIALS.

Mr. TOLE asked the Minister of Justice, If the Government will put on the estimates a sufficient sum to equalize the salaries of the officers of the gaols of the colony? He was fully aware of the difficulty which existed in a case of this kind, on account of the great variety in the remuneration of these officers all over the colony. It was not so much a question of money as one of general adjustment of salaries. The present inequality was considered a very great grievance. In the session of 1878 the Gaols Committee expressed a very strong opinion on the subject. They said, "It appears that the cost of official salaries at Dunedin is double that at Wellington and Lyttelton, and three times that at Auckland." The difference seemed to be more against Auckland than any other part of the colony, and, as an Auckland man, and the gaol being situated in his district, he had thought it his duty to put this question on the Order Paper. The Minister of Justice said last year that it would require about £700 to make an adjustment of salaries, and his (Mr. Toles) object in asking this question was to get, if possible, an assurance from the Minister that what was considered a very great grievance would be remedied.

Mr. SHEEHAN, in reply, said it was the intention of the Government to ask the House to sanction a scheme for equalizing these salaries; not necessarily making them the same in amount, but equalizing them in proportion to the requirements of the different establishments. When the House was in Committee on the estimates, the Government would lay all the necessary information before them for that purpose.

ARCHITECTS IN PUBLIC SERVICE.

Mr. STEVENS asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether, in the public service, there are at present any architects who are allowed to compete for private practice; and, if so, whether the Government intend to continue permission to those officers to undertake private practice?

Mr. MACANDREW said there were no architects in the public service who were allowed private practice. The regulations provided against their taking such practice. He was not aware of any instance.

HAMILTON-TE AROHA RAILWAY.

Mr. WHYTE asked the Minister for Public Works, Why the Government has not yet commenced the construction of any portion of the line of railway from Hamilton to Te Aroha?

Mr. MACANDREW said it was felt that it would be useless to commence this railway until the bridge over the Waikato was constructed, so that the plant could be taken across.

CANTERBURY DEFERRED PAYMENTS.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked the Minister of Lands, What blocks of Crown lands in the Land District of Canterbury have been set aside for sale on deferred payments under "The Land Act, 1877," and what is the estimated area of such blocks; the dates of the Proclamations setting aside such blocks; and the number of selectors located on such blocks?

Mr. THOMSON replied that four blocks of land in Canterbury had been set aside on deferred payments. The total area of the blocks was 7,393 acres. The Proclamation setting them aside was dated 8th October, 1878. He was sorry to say that only two allotments had been taken up, each allotment comprising 320 acres. But this was owing to the rather poor nature of the land. The free-selection system had all along prevailed in the Province of Canterbury, and the greater part—indeed, almost the whole—of the good land had therefore been taken up. The land now in the hands of the Government was of rather inferior quality; but it was hoped that, when the deferred-payment land was reduced in price, which he hoped would shortly be the case, these and other lands of inferior quality would be taken up.

FIRE BRIGADES.

Mr. RICHMOND asked the Government, Whether they will place the members of fire brigades in the same position with regard to capitulation as the Volunteer forces?

Sir G. GREY said the question was rather a large one. The Government would take the subject into consideration, and, when they had determined what course should be pursued, they would inform the House.

FORTNIGHTLY PAYMENT OF WORKMEN.

Mr. SWANSON asked the Government, Whether they will make provision, in any future contracts, for the workmen being paid at least every fortnight?

Mr. MACANDREW, in reply, said that there was a clause in the General Conditions of Contracts which provided that workmen of all grades should be paid once a fortnight. That condition was now made part of the specification. He would have a circular sent round calling special attention to it.

Mr. SWANSON would like to ask how long this clause had been in existence.

Mr. MACANDREW was not certain, but for some time past. He thought it was the 23rd clause of the General Conditions.

DEAF-AND-DUMB INSTITUTION.

Mr. FULTON asked the Minister of Education, What steps the Government propose to take towards the establishment of a deaf-and-dumb institution for the colony; and whether the services of a competent instructor have been secured by the Agent-General? The latter part of the question, he was aware, had been already answered in papers which had been printed and laid on the table by the Government.

Sir G. GREY said, as the honorable gentleman had already the information in his possession, he need state nothing more on the subject.

Mr. FULTON said he asked, in the first part of his question, what steps the Government proposed to take towards the establishment of a deaf-and-dumb institution.

Sir G. GREY replied that the Government intended to establish a deaf-and-dumb institution, and that the instructor who would manage the establishment was expected to arrive in December next.

NELSON CREEK BRIDGE.

Mr. MASTERS asked the Minister for Public Works, If he will lay before this House all correspondence, petitions, and telegrams relating to or connected with the construction or alteration of site of the proposed bridge over Nelson Creek, on the Greymouth and Reefton Road, in the Grey Valley, that have passed between the Government and the following gentlemen and public bodies—namely, the representatives for the Grey Valley, the Chairman or County Council of Grey, and the Mayor of the Borough of Greymouth?

Mr. MACANDREW said the Government had no objection whatever to lay this correspondence on the table. It was rather voluminous, and its production would involve a good deal of trouble. If it would answer the same purpose, he would be glad if any honorable gentleman who took an interest in the subject would step down to the office and peruse the papers. If not, of course the return would be prepared.

EAST COAST MAIL SERVICE.

Captain RUSSELL asked the Postmaster-General, If any steps have been taken to insure the more punctual delivery of the San Francisco mails on the East Coast of the North Island? Last session he asked if the Government would endeavour to take some steps to have the East Coast mails delivered a little more promptly. He found that the last English mail which arrived in Auckland had been to New Plymouth, Nelson, and Picton, had stayed three days in Wellington, and had just been started in a small steamer—to find its way to Napier, possibly, in due course of time. The Gi-borne mail would have to be sent up by some subsequent steamer, after having performed nearly the whole circuit of the North Island. He hoped to receive a satisfactory answer.

Mr. J. T. FISHER said the department had been in communication with the Union Company, who were not prepared to run a steamer along the East Coast on the arrival of the San Francisco mail. Every step had been taken to expedite the delivery of the Napier mail. Unfortunately, the Featherston Railway having been obstructed in consequence of the recent floods, it was not possible to forward the last mail overland from Wellington.

Captain RUSSELL.—Do I understand the honorable gentleman to say that under no conditions will the Union Company undertake to deliver the mails?

Mr. J. T. FISHER.—At present they are not prepared to run a steamer along the East Coast. They might be willing to run one from Wellington on the arrival of the mail at this port, but it would be at a cost of something like £2,000, which I think the department cannot afford to give.

PUBLIC RESERVES SALES.

Mr. WAKEFIELD asked the Minister of Lands, Whether he will lay before the House a paper showing the number of allotments offered for sale for cash or deferred payments under "The Public Reserves Sale Act, 1878;" the area of such allotments, and the price obtained; and indicating which purchasers on deferred payments have since abandoned their purchases? The answer which the honorable gentleman had given to a previous question had rather confused him as to this question; but the honorable gentleman would see that the two things were totally distinct. This question had nothing to do with deferred payments under the Land Act of 1877.

Mr. THOMSON said he hoped to be able in a few days to lay on the table a paper containing all the information asked for by the honorable member.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Mr. ANDREWS.—Sir, I move, That a respectful Address be presented to His Excellency in reply to the Speech which His Excellency has been pleased to make to both Houses. I fear that I may not be able to do justice either to the subject in hand or to the occasion; but I feel confident that, as a new member, anything I say will be looked upon leniently by the older and more experienced members. I do not intend to detain the House by delivering a lengthened address, but His Excellency's Speech embraces so many subjects that I shall necessarily have to dwell shortly upon them. I will take them in the order in which they appear on the paper, and will deal with them as carefully as I can. With regard to the first clause, expressing an earnest hope that the new Parliament may be distinguished for the enactment of such measures as shall be most conducive towards promoting the happiness and welfare of the people, I am quite sure that this House will be at one with me in its acquiescence in such a hope. I firmly believe that this House will agree with His Excellency that the present is one of the most important epochs in the history of the colony, and that the future will very much depend upon the impress which may be stamped upon it by the action of this Parliament. Referring to the next clause, dealing with the monetary pressure, every one must be convinced that a considerable amount of monetary pressure has occurred in the whole of the colonies, and not in New Zealand particularly. But I am pleased to receive and acknowledge the assurance of His Excellency that this colony of ours is commercially sound. That assurance cannot fail to be satisfactory to members; and no doubt details will subsequently be given in support of the statement made by His Excellency. Without attempting now to dwell upon that, I will simply pass on to the questions which, I take it, are at the present time of more vital importance. I will refer somewhat carefully to the question relative to the dissolution of the late House. I hope this House will show that the appeal to the electors of the colony has been conducive to the opening-up of very many important questions, which largely affect the destiny and prosperity of this colony. I would refer more particularly to one or two of those questions, and especially would I speak of that which relates to the extension of the franchise. There is also the question of the registration of votes, and, closely allied to it, the hours of polling. If the House will bear with me, I would like to say a word relative to the extension of the franchise, because I feel somewhat keenly on that subject. It is a question that from time to time has been dealt with and spoken of to some considerable extent. In my own district the question has from time to time excited a considerable amount of discussion; and a considerable amount of feeling has been manifested on the subject by several constituencies in and around Christchurch. I cannot say that many people ever expressed any great cause of complaint relative to the extension of the franchise, when we consider that every freeholder, every leaseholder, every householder, and now every lodger has the right to exercise the franchise in this colony. From His Excellency's Speech, I anticipate that there will be an attempt made on the part of the Government to somewhat extend the present franchise. I know that the franchise has been liberal in the past, but I think the House may go still further and make it somewhat more extensive than at present. I once advocated that every person amenable to the laws of the land should have a voice in assisting to make those laws. I have, however, somewhat modified my views in this respect, and I have come to the conclusion that nothing but manhood suffrage with a residential clause will now satisfy the people of New Zealand. That is the measure which I think the House will now be asked to pass; so that we shall have manhood suffrage with a residential clause, in addition to the other qualifications already in the Statute Book. I am not at all attempting to champion this particular measure, but I speak of it as one who know something of the feelings of the people. I believe that the people will never ask for more than is proposed to be given to them in the Electoral Bill lately brought forward in this House, and which will be brought forward again. I believe there will be no attempt and no desire on the part of any people to force their views upon the House, so as to cause the insertion of clauses in the Bill which would give to any but real residents and real colonists the power of taking part in the legislation of the land. It is quite a mistaken notion—if any one runs away with it—to suppose that the people of New Zealand are not sufficiently patriotic, and have not sufficient sense and liberty at their command, to see that no such attempt is made. There is no such attempt on the part of the people; and, if there was any such attempt, I would be prepared to oppose anything which would have the effect of permitting loafers, paupers, or prisoners to take part in the legislation of the country. I think that the Bill which will be introduced to Parliament will be an exceedingly satisfactory one to the people; because it not only provides for an extension of the franchise in the way I have mentioned, but it also, I may say, provides for a further extension of the franchise by simplifying the mode of registration. In this matter I think the opinions of the people of Canterbury are only an index to the feelings of the people of New Zealand; and they have frequently asked for, and expect the House at an early date to take, some measures towards simplifying the mode of registration. It is now, and has been for many years, one of the most extraordinary things to understand how it is that everything that requires to be registered throughout the colony can be readily and immediately done, except in the case of a man registering his claim to vote. When a man requires to register a birth, marriage, or death—or, taking almost a ridiculous case, when a man requires to register a dog—the form is so simple that he has only to go to the proper officer to make his statement, and the thing can be done immediately. But it is not so when a man wishes to register his claim to vote. With our present franchise, and under the present mode of receiving claims to vote only within a certain period of the year, a man might land here to-morrow with thousands of pounds, he might expend his money in the purchase of lands, but still he might be twelve months off from being entitled to record his vote if an election takes place, as the registration must be made before the last day of March in each year. But that is not the only case in which a difficulty arises. There is a certain form to be complied with; and in many instances, if I am informed correctly, that form has not been carried out, the consequence being that many persons have been disfranchised through a clerical mistake or error, or through an attesting witness not being an elector in the district. Closely connected with the registration of votes is the question of the hours of polling. If I express my own views on this subject I shall be expressing the views of the majority of the people of New Zealand. If there is anything that has struck me from time to time as being most ridiculously absurd, it is the present system of fixed hours for polling—from nine in the morning till four in the afternoon. In all cases where a poll has to be taken, the object of such a poll is that every person entitled to record his vote on that occasion shall have an opportunity of doing so. But when a poll is only taken from nine in the morning until four in the evening it prevents many people from voting who are entitled to vote. If I take the case of the City of Christchurch, for instance—it is only similar to many other cases during the last general election—on the Christchurch roll there are 4,200 electors, and, allowing for 700 who are ineligible through death, double claims, &c., there are 3,500 persons on that roll who are clearly entitled to vote. The result of last election shows that only 2,500 persons voted. What became of the rest? Where were they? That is easily accounted for. The hours of polling are the difficulty, because persons are debarred from voting in hours of their own. I believe there are hundreds of working-men in the country who are too independent to ask their employers for a quarter or half an hour, or for sufficient time to go and record their votes. But, if the position which I take up is the correct one—that the object of taking a poll should be to obtain a true and fair declaration of the will of the people—the hours of polling should be extended. That I believe will be done when the new Electoral Bill is taken in hand. If the hours of polling are extended to from eight o'clock in the morning until six, seven, or eight o'clock at night, I do not think we shall have reason to complain that so few people avail themselves of the franchise when an election takes place. I am quite sure of this: that, if we even alter the hours of polling alone, it will in itself make a completely new franchise for many persons who are working-men. It would be out of place on my part at a time like this to make any further comment on this matter. I am not prepared to attempt to define the terms "Liberalism" and "Conservatism," but I cannot help taking this opportunity of saying that the reason why the term Liberalism has been so very freely used as in opposition to Conservatism is this: that the law of the land permits all persons holding certain qualifications to take part in elections; but, on account of the surroundings, and many matters of detail which are almost impracticable, many persons are induced to declaim against the action of men and against many laws, and call them Conservative. This arises from the want of simple, plain, and practicable means of carrying those laws into effect. The most surprising thing is this, that these matters are not new. They have been from time to time before this House, and before many members now present, who have sat in previous Parliaments; but up to the present time no attempt has ever been made to alter or simplify this particular question—especially as to the simplicity of registration of votes, and the hours of polling. I would now refer to the next clause in His Excellency's Speech, which relates to the question of triennial Parliaments. I think that the rapidly-changing state of the colony and the changing opinions of the people demand this alteration in the law. It is not, perhaps, a subject upon which any new member of the House ought to express himself strongly. During three sessions a new member can hardly become intimately acquainted with the usages of the House unless he has had a training in some other legislative body. If this proposed measure should be adopted, by the time a new member becomes acquainted with the usages of the House his term is at an end, and he has again to seek re-election. But, if we take the dissolution of the late House and the election of this House as a case in point, it is one worthy of our consideration, because I think the last House sat for about a period of three years, and out of that House of eighty-eight members only three-fifths were considered by the electors to be of sufficiently-advanced opinions or sufficiently sound to possess the confidence of those whom they had previously served. We have two-fifths of this new House composed of new members. I think that this is a thorough and decided expression of opinion on the part of the people throughout New Zealand, that a change in this direction is required. I believe the people of New Zealand have asserted that we shall have triennial Parliaments, and that we shall have a change in the constitution of this House every three years. I am prepared to vote for such a measure as this, because I believe that the people of New Zealand require it. It is not, Sir, for me to attempt to express an opinion as to the superiority of this newly-constituted House over the old one; but it will be for honorable members to take up such questions as these, and it will be by the measures that are actually passed that the people will judge whether this new House is an improvement on that of the past. There is another question which I intend shortly to deal with, and that is the redistribution of seats. Great complaints have been made from time to time, in very many places, respecting this question, by people who consider that the system of representation should be fixed on a population basis. I was pleased to notice that a return has been called for showing the population and the number of electors on the electoral roll of each electoral district, and the number of electors who polled in each district on the occasion of the last general election, by one of the members of this House. I have taken the trouble to look at the Redistribution of Seats Bill, in so far as it relates to our present Constitution; and if the House will permit me I will read that portion of the Constitution Act which I think perfectly harmonizes with the view of the Government in proposing such a Bill, and of which His Excellency entirely approves. Clause 41 of the Constitution Act reads thus:—

such electoral districts, and the number of members to be elected for each district, regard shall be had to the number of electors within the same, so that the number of members to be assigned to any one district may bear to the whole number of the members of the House of Representatives as nearly as may be the same proportion as the number of electors within such district shall bear to the whole number of electors in New Zealand."

Now, it appears to me that the very knowledge of the existence of such a provision as that in the Constitution Act has been entirely, or seems to have been entirely, lost sight of by our legislators in the past. If I have made a mistake, I hope some member of the House will correct me; but that is the way I read the Constitution, and that a system of representation which is not based on population is not in harmony with that Constitution. I feel confident that the three measures alluded to in His Excellency's Speech—the extension of the franchise, the redistribution of seats, and triennial Parliaments—will be passed by this new House, and passed this session. After these measures have been passed, other matters of very great importance will come before this House. I allude, for instance, to a change in the system of taxation. It is my own impression, and that of my constituents, that the present is not a satisfactory or an equitable system of taxation. Again, we want a fair and just administration of the lands. We want to go further than this, and have something done which will better satisfy the people respecting the matter of local self-government. The people in the various provincial districts throughout New Zealand appear to be divided in opinion upon this matter; we are not in harmony with each other, and the question must be taken up by this House. Above all things do I desire, and I believe this House desires, that in all these matters there shall exist this great consideration—that of economy of administration. I will now say a few words relative to another matter which has been referred to somewhat prominently in His Excellency's Speech—namely, the plurality of voting for local bodies. I think some change is necessary. When we take into consideration the fact that something like £550,000 is being paid away annually to local bodies, I think that some change must take place relative to plural voting. It seems to me that, when such a large amount of the taxpayers' money is annually paid from the Consolidated Fund, something should be done in regard to this plural mode of voting. For instance, I will take the case of a man having five votes in my own constituency. He may possess property of sufficient extent to entitle him to five votes in each ward. There are four wards in the City of Christchurch, and this man would be entitled to possess twenty votes. He may have five votes for four different places outside these wards; so that in an election under the present system he may be entitled to record forty votes. The system may work in this way. I know of one case in particular where during the last election a person has taken advantage of this system of plural voting, and has recorded in the city and outside the city some forty votes, and yet he is simply a lodger, lodging in a public-house and enjoying himself in that way. He has no further status of any kind; he is nothing else but simply a lodger, and nevertheless, by the system of plural voting, he is entitled to record something like forty votes. On the other hand I can point to the case of an individual with a wife and ten children, making in all twelve persons, taxpayers of the country; and he has simply the power of recording a single vote. Surely there is something wrong here, and something that requires looking into. I feel pleased that His Excellency has drawn attention to this subject in his Speech. Sir, the question of small-farm settlements is one of great interest to the people of New Zealand, and especially to the working-classes. Without going into particulars, I may state that experiments have been tried from time to time. As to the satisfactory dealing with this question, much will depend on the character of the Bill brought before this House, and whether it will be an acceptable measure or not. In whatever shape the Bill may come before this House, if it sets itself to accomplish the end which is sought for in this particular direction, I am sure such action will be highly satisfactory to the people of New Zealand. What we want to look at—what this House requires to aim at—in dealing with this particular question is the creating of small-farm settlements, so as to provide homes for the people. It is homes for the people that we require; and in connection with these homes we want constant employment for the labouring classes. If these objects be accomplished, we shall then have colonists of the right stamp settled throughout the country—men who will grow up and identify themselves with the places in which they are located. Any person who has taken the trouble to look around in many towns in New Zealand will admit with me that the houses of the working-people are not what we should call homes. For instance, in the City of Wellington, if we look at the houses—it is hardly fair to call them homes—if we pass by the majority of the houses where the working-classes dwell in and around Wellington, we see that they are destitute of any flowers, shrubs, plants, or fruit-trees. The places where many of the working-classes dwell, and learn to dwell, are as a rule the kind of places fit only for lodgers. I think this House should earnestly take this matter into its careful consideration. By so doing it will confer a great benefit on the people of New Zealand, and on people living in the towns particularly. We should offer inducements to them to go into the country and settle there. If inducements were held out of the kind referred to, I am sure they would tempt many persons who are now hanging about the towns—if I may use such an expression. They would tend to remove many of those people who are now compelled to remain in the towns out of employment, and cause many of them to go to the country and make homes for themselves and homes for their families. I should like to refer shortly to the question of immigration, although it is not specially referred to in His Excellency's Speech. I take it that immigration is a question which must be very carefully considered in connection with the settlement of the land. Not that I think the introduction of a large body of immigrants would be desirable or beneficial to the interests of the country at the present time. We must remember, however, that we have to foster and encourage our local industries, and if we wish to see this colony of ours prosper and succeed we must do nothing that will in any way interfere with the permanent building-up of our local industries and manufactures. In every department of our manufacturing industries there is a great call for experienced and skilled workmen, and the want in this respect can only be supplied by immigration, and especially by the introduction of nominated immigrants. If we keep up that class of immigration we shall for many years have coming to our shores skilled and competent workmen—men capable of carrying on those manufactures which at the present time are but partially carried on. Our manufactures will thereby increase and become perfect, and works already commenced will be carried to a successful issue. If such be the case, I am sure this House will agree that it would be very injurious for the Government to interfere in any way with the introduction of nominated immigrants especially. I am not one of those who are led away by any sudden outcry. I believe, if we have a good harvest here, the time may come when there will be a great outcry for labour; but that is not a matter which would tempt me to move largely in the way of immigration. What I contend is, that if we are to have a settled and prosperous country here it must grow gradually. If men will bring out their friends it will not only be advantageous to themselves, but we shall obtain colonists of the right stamp, whose services to the country will be known before they are brought out. His Excellency refers to the estimates of expenditure. The House can scarcely be called upon to express an opinion with regard to them at the present time. As a matter of necessity they must be placed in detail before us before we can form an opinion as to their allocation in connection with the requirements of the colony. Of this, however, I am sure: The House is satisfied that, no matter what may be the position of our affairs, public works must be carried on, our trunk railways must be completed, the best routes should be carefully examined into, and Select Committees should be appointed to investigate these matters. Whatever else may happen, our public works must receive the fullest attention. It is only by taking advantage of our railways to move about from place to place that we can see the altered position of affairs since the old coach-roads were the only means of communication. Leaving that subject, I will next briefly refer to the question of Maori lands, which is also referred to in His Excellency's Speech. I think these lands and the unfulfilled promises made in regard to them should be dealt with carefully by the House. I believe that, above all things, anything connected with the Maori question should be dealt with in a constitutional manner. I have been grieved to hear from time to time of things being done as matters of expediency. I am convinced that expediency should be entirely removed from our dealings with the Maori question, and they should be carried on only in a constitutional manner. This question is not one of such vital importance in the South as it is here in Wellington, or farther north. There are in that part of the colony persons known as Maori land agents. That name of Maori land agent is a horrible name down south. A person who bears that title is looked upon there as almost a traitor—a disseminator of all discord and discontent. I am sure the House will take this matter into its serious consideration, and will be better able to deal with it than I can pretend to be. When dealing with the question of immigration I ought, perhaps, to have referred to Chinese immigration, as notice has been given that a Bill will be introduced to deal with it. I would not prevent a Chinaman landing here, but I say the House should take such steps as will prevent an influx of a class of persons who are not likely to prove a desirable acquisition to us in morals, habits, and dispositions. Having gone thus briefly through the various measures contained in the Governor's Speech, I would ask the House to assure His Excellency that all matters submitted to it during this session shall receive the careful and earnest consideration of the House. I have no doubt the House will carefully consider all these matters, and the result will show whether this House is an improvement on the last, or whether it is going to follow in the old track. In conclusion, I would ask the House to assure His Excellency that the great liberal policy shadowed forth in his Speech will receive our cordial support. I take it, it is a great liberal policy. It comes before us as the only policy that can respond to the wishes and sentiments of the people throughout New Zealand. It is such a policy as the people will have carried out, and the achievement of which will form one of the grandest epochs in the history of New Zealand. It affords me great pleasure to think that every part of this House—every district throughout New Zealand—has expressed itself entirely in favour of this policy. It now only remains for the House to carry these measures into practical effect, and above all things I hope we shall be able to do so as early as possible. If there is one point more than another in which I feel I have the confidence of my constituents, it is this: that they believe I am a man who will do my utmost to have these measures brought into practical effect. I therefore would earnestly press upon the House to set itself to work as speedily as possible and make the measures shadowed forth in His Excellency's Speech the practical laws of New Zealand. When that is done, we may confidently look forward to a future of prosperity. It is not necessary for me to say anything more on an occasion of this kind. I think I know sufficient of the feeling of the House to feel that, if I were to prolong the expression of my opinions, I should be only wearying honorable members. Still I feel myself somewhat hampered, because it is a new occasion for me, and I am, as it were, bound between two straight poles. Not being personally acquainted with many members of the House, I am hampered somewhat in expressing myself as freely as I might do, while I do not wish to go beyond the ordinary rules of the House. If, however, I had trespassed on the House, or departed from its usual forms and customs, I am sure that you, Sir, would have expressed your opinion in the kindest manner to me, and would have checked me. In conclusion, I may say that I am willing to help the House, in every reasonable and constitutional way, to carry out the measures shadowed forth in His Excellency's Speech; and I trust the House will assure His Excellency that it is willing to support him in passing those measures into law.

Mr. W. J. HURST.—Mr. Speaker, I will commence by asking for that consideration which I believe it is customary at all times to extend to members who address this House for the first time. I may say, at the outset, if you will pardon my doing so, that it affords me infinite pleasure to see you, Sir, occupying a position in this House which I have on previous occasions seen you occupy in another Assembly of a somewhat similar description. That fact inspires me with a greater degree of confidence, and it was a source of great gratification to me to see the unanimity with which this House elected you to a position which you are so fitted to adorn. After the long and able speech of the honorable gentleman who has just sat down, it would be highly inexpedient for me to travel over the same ground which he has so well travelled over. I may, however, refer to one or two points in the Speech of His Excellency, and particularly to that paragraph at the outset in which he says,—

"We have reached what is perhaps, as yet, the most important epoch in the history of this colony; and the future will very much depend upon the impress which may be stamped upon it by the action of this Parliament."

Who dares deny that very important announcement? There are three matters which I think particularly demand the serious consideration of honorable members. First, there are these important liberal measures which have been before the country—and it is idle for some honorable members to deny that during the late elections they have been before the country. Secondly, there is the important question of our financial affairs. And, thirdly, there is the not less important question of our Native affairs. All these things, I say, demand at the present time the utmost patriotism at the hands of every honorable member of this House. When the Prime Minister did me the honor to ask me to occupy the position which I unworthily do on the present occasion, I told him I held very strong views on the financial question. What do you think, Sir, was the reply of that honorable gentleman, who has been termed the "common enemy"? He said, "Hurst, we want nothing but what is right; express your views freely." I am persuaded that the honorable gentleman does desire nothing but what is right, and in the interests of posterity in this colony. I have said there are three matters: There are, first of all, these important liberal measures which have been before the country. Let me refer somewhat to them. It is idle to say that they have not been before the country. I maintain that they have been before the country; and I consider that the country has pronounced in no equivocal terms in favour of the carrying of some such measures as those about to be proposed by the Government. I have always understood that an Opposition is as much a part of the Government as a Government itself, and I should have been very greatly pleased if the present Opposition in this Assembly, instead of at once attacking the honorable gentlemen on those benches, had seen their way, with the large and powerful party of which they are composed, to assist the Government in carrying the great liberal measures which they propose, and thus aid in securing that which the Government say would ensue from the adoption of their proposals, namely—that, when they had once become law, a general feeling of contentment would be permanently established in the colony. Is not this a desirable end to achieve? Instead of struggling for office, which, unfortunately, is a practice that is beginning to be a blot on this colony as it is on others, I should have been glad indeed if the Opposition had been content to aid the Government in carrying these desirable measures, and in enabling the country to enjoy the rest and peace which would ensue from their adoption. The amendment to the Address which has been tabled by the Opposition does them credit for the manner in which it is drafted; but I should be glad if I had power to persuade some honorable members who in all probability propose to join the Opposition to look at that amendment in its proper light. It says, "Whilst, however, we are prepared to give effect to the liberal measures desired by the country." Who are to be the interpreters of the feeling of the country? Those honorable members who now form the Opposition, who for a long time held the reins of government in this country, who have never shown the slightest disposition in the direction of liberal measures? All of a sudden we find that the whole colony is liberal from one end to the other. What do these honorable gentlemen intend to do? They intend to follow the example set by the Conservative Government in England when Lord John Russell in 1868 went to the country, and afterwards met the House of Parliament in a minority. What did the Conservatives do then? They passed the liberal measures of the previous Government simply because the country demanded them. I say that, if the Opposition consult their own interests and those of the country, they ought, instead of attempting to wrest their offices from the Government, to join in the endeavour to bring these liberal measures to a successful issue. If you want to ascertain the feeling of the country, take the published addresses of honorable members to their constituents. I say, taking those addresses, that the country has indorsed the policy of the Government, and has sent members here who represent the bulk of the inhabitants of the colony. I will take the return of the honorable gentleman who has moved this Address and of myself, who am seconding it, and will quote the number of electors who polled for us. The honorable member for Christchurch City polled 1,250 votes; in Auckland City West I polled 1,010; making a total of 2,260. Now I will show the House what eleven members of the Opposition represent: Nelson Suburbs, 112; Cheviot, 137; Collingwood, 145; Wallace, 166; Hutt, 177; Waikato, 215; New Plymouth, 227; Wellington Country District, 241; Geraldine, 247; Rangitikei, 284; Bruce, 245. There are eleven members representing only 2,186 voters. This is not the first time in this House that honorable members have been told that they represent sheep and barren hills; and I say that the country will not stand it. If the Opposition do not at once accept the position and go in for a reasonable and fair basis of representation, the result will be unfortunate to themselves and detrimental to the interests of the people. I mean to say that for eleven members to represent fewer votes than the number represented by two members is altogether out of proportion. I observed in the Hansard of 1875, Vol. XIX., that the honorable member for Newton endeavoured to snatch a member for his constituency, which at that time was one of the largest in New Zealand. While Hawke's Bay could get a member, that large and intelligent constituency of Newton was refused adequate representation. This question is of burning importance, and ought to be dealt with at once. I will now pass on in my remarks to the financial condition of the colony, which, I will at once say, is very grave and serious. I cannot speak now in reference to any position the present Government hold, but I take leave to say that the responsibility for the present financial state of the colony rests upon the honorable members of the Opposition, and particularly upon the honorable and gallant member for Egmont. When that honorable member entered this House, did he do so as a supporter of Sir Julius Vogel? No; he entered the House as an opponent of that honorable gentleman and his party. What did we see shortly afterwards? That "continuous" Ministry, which landed this colony in a debt the difficulty of which we are only now beginning to find out. Therefore I hope honorable members will not connect my observations on the financial condition of the colony with the present Government. They have a deeper significance than that. We have sown to the wind, and we are now beginning to reap the whirlwind. I was in favour, to a modified extent, of the policy that was enunciated in 1870; but I consider that this House has been most reckless and precipitate in the manner in which it has dealt with that question. I contend that this House and the country have been demoralized in connection with the public works policy, and that it demands serious consideration at the hands of every honorable member holding a seat in this House whether we are eternally to go to the very brink of what I call almost bankruptcy, before getting further money to carry on the public works of the colony. I do not want to say anything to damage the credit of the colony, but am aware that no words of mine would have any effect of that kind. I am merely indicating considerations which have influenced me in coming to this House, and ask what position would the colony be in if intelligence were to come from England that a monetary crisis had occurred, in consequence of which we could not raise the five-million loan? It is a serious consideration, and on the heads of the Opposition rests the responsibility. — (No.) — I say that in 1877 the present Government came down with the proposal to borrow the modest sum of four millions. And how did the Opposition meet that proposal? The loan was reduced to a million and a half. These are either facts, or they are not; and I cast upon the Opposition the responsibility of placing the colony in its present disadvantageous position. I have no doubt as to the future of New Zealand. I believe that, if wisely invested, double the amount that has been raised could be safely borrowed. I agree with Governor Du Cane, who visited this colony, and with Sir James Fergusson, both very impartial men, who are of opinion that it entirely depends on the money being judiciously and wisely expended. But none know better than the members of the Opposition how much of the borrowed money has been expended in a way which will never return interest or sinking fund, or anything of the kind. The only good investment has been the money expended on railways, which, I am thankful to say, is beginning to yield a return that will meet, to some extent, the interest and sinking fund in connection with it; yet it is very far short indeed of the amount required: I think the total return only comes to about 2½ per cent. There is one question which the honorable member for Christchurch City failed to notice, but which, in the North Island, at any rate, is attracting an immense deal of attention, and it is one in the settlement of which, I think, the Opposition would do well to assist. I refer to the question of dealing with the Native lands in the North Island. Now, I do not suppose that honorable members from the Middle Island have the same knowledge of this question as those honorable members living in the North Island, because the latter are constantly having it brought under their notice. The policy of the Government in reference to this question, as indicated by the Native Minister in a speech which he recently delivered in Auckland, was such as to give universal satisfaction. It is quite clear to my mind, and to that of every colonist who has carefully marked the progress of events, that the cause of our difficulty has invariably been the fact of the Government having had to do with these Native lands. It was proposed, in order to create a Land Fund for the northern provinces, at a time when they were in deep water, that a sum of money should be voted by the Assembly in order to buy a landed estate for the North Island; and a large amount was voted. Of course on the death of the provinces this became a colonial matter, and successive Governments have gone on desiring to barter with the Natives. I think that proposed remedy is the wisest and the best—that the Natives should look up to the Government, whoever they might be; and I do not wish to express any unkind remarks relative to the members of the Opposition. I mean that it would be a capital thing if we could induce the Natives to look up to the Government for the time being with thorough confidence. It would end this cry about "land-sharkism," and all that sort of thing; and let land be put up to public auction, so that rich and poor alike may get the land they require. At present the public have a grievance, and I am quite sure that honorable members on both sides of the House must regret the difficulty which exists—namely, that the person who is buying a large tract of land can afford to fee land-purchase agents with large sums of money. While they can do that, the small man who wants a couple of thousand acres has no chance of competing against them. That is really the difficulty, and I am sure honorable members will view it reasonably and fairly. Whether they like it or not, the time will come when the public will compel them to view the present system in the light of an evil; and it is far better for honorable members to accept the position and meet it in some such way as that indicated by the Native Minister. Before concluding, there is one question which I know a little about, and to which I should like briefly to refer. I allude to the Native disturbances. I will now refer to the two disturbances which have taken place since the House last met, as I happen to know something of the circumstances connected with them, and may be pardoned for referring to them. I will refer, first, to the Bay of Islands case, where, unfortunately, loss of blood was occasioned. That was a mere family dispute, with which the Government had nothing whatever to do. No act of omission or commission can be charged against them; nor can they in the most remote degree be blamed for what happened there, although the Opposition Press, throughout the length and breadth of the Island, conveyed the impression that the Government were to blame. The dispute was strictly an intertribal dispute, and it is not right to put upon the Government the responsibility of any occurrences of that description, any more than it would be right to blame them for the Thames matter. The more honorable members understand about these matters the better they will be able to estimate the amount of responsibility which should attach to the Government. The surveyors were sent, in the ordinary course of business, to survey this land, and, without the slightest notice, a small section of the tribe came down upon them. They were angry and annoyed, not at the surveyors, but at the people who had sold the land away from them. Before they fired they called out, "Pakeha, go away; we don't want to shoot you." That was the sound that met the ears of the surveyors, and they fired at a person who, in appearance, is darker than an ordinary half-caste. I can assure the House that the chiefs in no way identified themselves with this movement, nor does it in the slightest degree possess political significance. No doubt some honorable members, such as the honorable member for Egmont and the honorable member for New Plymouth, would urge the Government to take active measures to arrest these men; but there are difficulties in the way of which honorable members are probably not aware. For instance, I had a conversation with one of the commanding officers who would probably have been sent up to cope with the difficulty, and he said, "If Mr. Sheehan had given us permission, we would have gone up." I said, "I suppose, if you had gone up, you would have secured these two people;" and he answered, "No; we should have shot every one of them." But under present circumstances the Government could not interfere. It is impossible to tell what troubles may not arise out of a small circumstance like that; and I think the Government were prudent in coming down to this House before taking any decisive action in the matter. I have been reading some of the speeches delivered last session upon the position of Native affairs, and I quite agree with the honorable member for Geraldine, who well expressed the principle so generally admitted in the House when Sir Donald McLean held the position of Native Minister—namely, that Native affairs should never form the subject of party discussion. The question is too serious to be treated in that manner. It is a continuous question, which should be treated by successive Governments in the manner its importance demands, without being made a party question. I regret to see that there is a disposition to interfere with that excellent principle, because, let me ask, what would be the effect of a Native war? It simply means ruin and destruction of all our hopes for some time to come. We are not prepared for such a war as the Natives can wage against us. And then the Native Minister is held up as heretical because he paid a high tribute to the chief Rewi. Why, Sir, I think that was a very creditable act. What did Sir Donald McLean do? If my memory serves me right, he waited six weeks at Alexandra to see this chief, and then only had the pleasure of shaking hands with Rewi, who did it in a very sour way. But what did Rewi do when the recent outrage at the Thames took place? He mounted his horse and went to the Thames in order to assist in arresting the people who had committed a breach of the peace. That is an important fact in connection with Native affairs at the present time, and Rewi further gave instructions that if these people attempted to pass the frontier they were to be arrested and handed over to justice. Now, all these steps having been taken, I fail to see how the Government can be held responsible. I think they have done an enormous amount of good in the interests of the North Island; and, whatever his faults may be, I hold that no member of this House has done more than the Hon. the Native Minister towards securing that much-desired object of completing the railway to connect the north part of the Island with Taranaki. Once get that railway carried through, and we shall not only advance the commercial interests of the colony, but its civilizing influences will for ever set at rest all possibility of a Native war. I appeal to honorable members to assist in arriving at this great object. The Native Minister cannot, at the present moment, openly state everything that has been done. The moment he did that, many influences would be brought to bear against him, because there are jealousies amongst the Maoris as well as amongst the Europeans. Rewi is endeavouring to get the railway made, but there are many other subtle Maoris who would throw impediments in the way if they were made aware of all that is being done. I find that I have exceeded the time I had allotted myself, and I will now conclude by thanking honorable members for the kindness and consideration they have shown me. As a new member, I feel a degree of diffidence in placing my views before the House, surrounded as I am by honorable members of much greater age and experience than myself, whose names form part and parcel of the history of the colony; but, although they may surpass me in ability—as they do in eloquence to enforce their arguments—I yield to none in the patriotic desire to faithfully discharge those duties which the constituency I represent has placed in my hands, to advance the best interests of the colony, and promote the happiness and prosperity of its people.

Mr. HALL.—Mr. Speaker, although myself in one sense a young member of this House, I cannot forbear addressing a few words of congratulation to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply on this occasion. The mover is a gentleman with whom it had been my privilege to sit in the Provincial Council of Canterbury for many years. I am sure he will not object to my saying that he is essentially a working-man. He is a man of whom his class may indeed be proud. He has worthily represented their interests elsewhere, and I am sure will do so here. During the time I have sat with him in the Provincial Council he has always shown the same fair, calm, and temperate spirit which he evinced throughout his speech this afternoon. As for the honorable gentleman, the seconder of the Address, I think the old members of this House will agree with me in saying that we have seldom heard a better maiden speech than was delivered by that honorable gentleman. I only hope that the speeches which will be made throughout this debate may breathe the same moderate tone and the same patriotic spirit as were evinced by the honorable member for Auckland City West. While stating this, I am unable to agree with some of his statements, but, speaking generally, I really find very little to differ from in the speech of the honorable member. There are one or two points with regard to which I am not able to agree with him. The honorable gentleman referred to figures to prove that the party with which he is connected really represent the large mass of the people of this country. I think there was a discrepancy between his figures and his arguments. He stated that the honorable members for the City of Christchurch and Auckland City West, the mover and seconder of the Address, represented a certain number of votes—as many in fact as eleven members of the Opposition. Well, that is a very partial view of the case. In the first place, I contend that the number of votes recorded is not always a correct test of the population represented, because, owing to accidental circumstances, some of the electoral rolls may not be complete; and in centres of population, like Auckland and Christchurch, it is much easier for the electors to record their votes than it is in country districts. The honorable gentleman also lost sight of the fact that the number of votes he mentioned did not represent those who voted for himself alone, but three other members.

Mr. W. J. HURST.—One other member; there is only one other member for Auckland City West.

Mr. HALL.—And two for Christchurch. The large centres do not begin and end with Auckland City West and Christchurch; there are other large centres of population in the colony. For instance, there is the City of Wellington, with a population of 19,000. What does the population of Wellington say? It is represented by two members. One thousand one hundred and eighty-five votes were polled for Mr. Levin, and his honorable colleague obtained only 880 votes. I say that the voice of the population of the City of Wellington was decidedly in favour of the Opposition. Then, with regard to the City of Christchurch. It has a population of 23,000. The number of voters on the roll is 4,202, and of this number only 2,500 polled. Of those who polled, the Premier obtained 1,315 votes; Mr. Stevens, 1,250; and Mr. Andrews, 1,250. It is a remarkable fact that, in that large constituency, there was only a difference of sixty-five votes between the number polled for the Prime Minister himself and for the member who represents entirely different political opinions. In that large centre of population public opinion was therefore pretty fairly divided. Then we come to the City of Dunedin, the population of which is 22,490. How does it stand? With regard to the City of Dunedin, the Minister for Public Works, than whom, I suppose, no man could have stronger personal claims upon any Otago constituency, thought it prudent to retire from the representation of the City of Dunedin.—(No.)—Well, I think events justified my honorable friend's calculations. Every one of the members returned by that populous city belongs to the Opposition. I think my honorable friend the member for Auckland City West evidently did not go far enough in his calculations. To put the matter fairly, in the centres of population in the North there is a preponderance of opinion in favour of the Government; in those in the centre, opinion was pretty evenly divided; and in the South, public opinion was strongly opposed to the Government.

An Hon. MEMBER.—What about the West Coast?

Mr. HALL.—We do not know rightly yet how the West Coast votes are to go. Then the honorable gentleman stated that the Opposition had adopted a somewhat unpatriotic course in at once bringing forward this vote of want of confidence—that we should rather have gone into the consideration of the Government measures, and endeavoured to mould them into a shape in which we could pass them. If the Opposition had desired to act in such a manner as would give them the greatest party advantage, that is precisely the course they would have adopted. They would have waited until the Government had submitted their programme, and no doubt they would have found in it a great deal to condemn, a great deal with which many supporters even of the Government would have found fault. The Opposition would have found it exceedingly easy to embarrass the Government to a very considerable extent. If we had sought a party advantage, that is the course we should have adopted. But I say, for myself and those who are acting with me, that that is not the spirit in which we approach the consideration of this question. Sir, what is the position in which we stand? The last House of Representatives, by a very large majority, had declared that the Government had deservedly forfeited the confidence of the country. The Government, by the permission of His Excellency, appealed from this decision to the country at large, and we, the members of this House, are the result of that appeal. I say, altogether irrespective of party considerations, it was our bounden duty, at the earliest practicable and convenient moment, to bring to an issue the question of whether or not the Government does represent the opinions of the people—whether or not the Government does possess the confidence of this House. Sir, I have now to move, as an amendment, the following addition to the Address in Reply: "Whilst, however, we are prepared to give effect to the liberal measures desired by the country, we feel bound to submit to your Excellency that your Excellency's Government, as at present constituted, does not possess the confidence of this House." In speaking to this amendment, I cannot avoid going over ground which, during the last session and also during the elections, has been travelled over before; but I assure the House that I will do so as briefly as possible. And I only do so because I should not be justified in submitting an amendment of this importance without placing on record, as briefly as possible, some of the grounds why I think it should be adopted. The first charge against the Government is this: Whereas they came into office with—I may say, to a certain extent, "got" into office by—large professions of economy, they have failed to give effect to those professions. I remember the terms in which the Prime Minister indulged in regard to the extravagant cost of the Civil Service of this colony. On several occasions he declared in his place in this House that he could, without prejudice to the public service, reduce the annual expenditure by no less a sum than £100,000. He stated that, so satisfied was he of the truth of that statement, he would be prepared, in half an hour, to bring down a scheme which would, without prejudice to the public service, reduce the cost of it by £100,000. That statement will be in the recollection of every honorable member who had then a seat in this House. The honorable gentleman and his colleagues have now been in office for two years; and have they fulfilled the promise which the honorable gentleman then made? During the first year of their tenure of office, it has been shown most distinctly, by figures quoted by my honorable friend on my left (Major Atkinson), that the cost of the Civil Service of this country was not only not reduced, but was actually increased by a sum of about £8,000 a year. There might have been some excuse for this the first year. Next year the cost, instead of being diminished, was again increased, and the estimates were £15,000 more than they were when those gentlemen came into office. It is not only, however, by their general failure to perform their promises, but by extravagance within their own personal control, that I say the Government have forfeited the confidence of this House. The Prime Minister stated, at a meeting in this city, that they were prevented from reducing the salaries of Ministers by the refusal of this House to agree to the proposal. It will be recollected that a very great point was made of that proposed reduction. The Prime Minister said the Government, being anxious to reduce the cost of the Civil Service, would commence with themselves. But what was the nature of their proposal to this House? How was it made? We all know that a Government can submit a proposal to Parliament in a variety of ways. They can submit a proposal in such a manner as to show the House that they are determined to carry it through—and the Government could have carried that proposal through if they had chosen to do so. They may, on the other hand, throw a proposal down on the floor of the House, and leave the House to do what it likes with it; and I think I shall be speaking the conviction of all those members who were present when this proposal was submitted if I say the latter was the mode in which this Government dealt with the proposal to reduce their salaries. The proposal was no sooner made than a very steady supporter of the Government, whom I have the pleasure of seeing in the House at the present time, rose and moved an amendment that the proposition should be rejected. That amendment was seconded by another steady supporter of the Government. I do not say that those gentlemen had had any previous communication with the Government on the subject, but the fact remains that the amendment was moved and seconded by supporters of the Government, and was carried against the Government. And what was the result? Did the Government bring that proposal down again? No; we have never even heard of it since. But in what way did the Government deal with these gentlemen who had thus inflicted a grievous defeat upon them, and effaced one of the best features of their policy? Why, Sir, as soon as ever the session was over, those two gentlemen were punished by being made Justices of the Peace. Does that show the great desire of the Government to effect that piece of economy? I next complain of the expense to which Ministers have put the country by the unreasonable use they have made of the Government steamers. I do not mean to say that, occasionally, in cases of emergency or urgency, it is not justifiable and proper for the Government to use such steamers for the conveyance of Ministers. But that is not what has been done. It has been a systematic thing, and almost a matter of course, for the Government to constantly use these steamers to convey them from one part of the colony to another, when they could just as well have gone by private steamers, at one-tenth the cost. That, I say, is a piece of extravagance utterly unjustifiable. Then, as to the expenditure in relation to Native affairs. What may have been the total amount of that expenditure we do not exactly know; but I hope we shall know it before long. In fact, I feel sure, this House is determined to know it. This, however, we do know: that the Native Minister acknowledges that he has over-expended the votes for his department by £20,000 during the last year. Has there been anything in the circumstances of the country to justify such an enormous expenditure? We know that large sums of money have been consumed upon Native gatherings and Native feasts, and—what shall I say?—miscellaneous expenditure, to an extent which I believe to be without precedent, and certainly without excuse. And what have we got for all this large Native expenditure? What is the result of it? Is the condition of Native affairs better at the present time than it was when those gentlemen came into office two years ago? Is the condition of Native affairs even as good now as it was then?

An Hon. MEMBER.—Yes.

Mr. HALL.—I admire the sanguine disposition of my honorable friend, who, in the face of what we read day by day in the columns of the newspapers, can say that the condition of Native affairs is even as good now as it was two years ago. Two years ago the Native question was—to use a common expression—to be the great card of the present Government. The great personal influence of the Prime Minister and of the Native Minister was to bring about such a settlement of the Native difficulty as could be obtained in no other way. I do not mean to say that when those gentlemen came into office Native affairs had arrived at that condition in which we should wish to see them; but I do say that, under the wise, careful, and prudent management of the late Sir Donald McLean, they had been improving from day to day and year to year, and, had he been spared to us, I have no doubt they would now be in a most satisfactory condition. But this Government were not content to go on in the careful and prudent manner in which Sir Donald McLean dealt with the Native question. They wished to raise up for themselves a great reputation for having settled off-hand the Native difficulty, and being able to announce that “at last” peace was established throughout the colony. And what is the consequence? So far as I can gather, the Maori King is now in a condition of more distinct and pronounced antagonism to the Government than he was when those gentlemen came into office, and there will be more difficulty in getting him to recede from that position than when those gentlemen obtained the reins of power. A great deal has been made of the concessions which are said to have been obtained from the great chief Rewi; but I want to know what those concessions are, and what advantages have really been obtained. We have heard nothing officially about them, and I cannot but think that, if great success had attended the efforts of those honorable gentlemen, we should have had papers placed on the table giving us official intimation of the fact. The absence of such papers makes me believe that the Native Minister has really obtained no considerable advantage. Then, with regard to the west coast of this Island: Have the Government been successful there? I will not dwell at length on this subject, because it has already been gone into, but I may say this much: that the very protection of the farms and the homesteads of the settlers has been devolved upon themselves, and, if it had not been for the determination and courage, mixed with self-control to an extent beyond all praise, on the part of those settlers, very serious and disastrous results might have ensued. Then the Government's own servants—their surveyors—were turned off the land which they were surveying on the Waikato Plains, and the Government have not been able to vindicate their authority or restore those surveyors. It has been said that the Government are not to blame for the state of affairs in that district—that the real persons with whom the blame rests are their predecessors. That excuse we might, of course, expect. In fact, as soon as any of us heard of the occurrences we knew that that would be said. We knew some reason would be found to exonerate Ministers. Of course some previously undiscovered promises were found, and they were advanced as the reason for all this trouble. But I will call a witness who will give us some information on the subject—a witness, too, who is favourable to the Government. He is a correspondent sent to that part of the country by a newspaper favourable to the Government—which at any rate receives Government advertisements. He describes an interview he had with Te Whiti, and gives a true account of the whole affair. He also very wisely endeavoured to obtain information from the settlers themselves. This is the account he gives of part of an interview between Te Whiti and Mr. James Mackay:—

“A long discussion then took place, in which Te Whiti asserted that the reason the surveyors had been turned off the Plains was because the Government had promised that the Native cultivations should not be touched, and that reserves should be set apart for their use.

“Mr. Mackay said the Government intended that that should be done.

“Te Whiti replied he did not believe anything of the kind, or the Government would not have ordered the surveyors to cut up their cultivations in the way they had done. Even Titokowaru's garden, he said, the surveyors had been through, and had put pegs in close to the door of his house.

“Mr. Mackay tried to explain that the survey of the Plains did not mean that Government intended to take it and sell it, but it was necessary to mark the land off, so that each person should know what portion of it belonged to him.

“Te Whiti said he could not credit that; they had not consulted him in any way about the land or the survey, and he felt that the Government were going to leave them destitute.”

Then Te Whiti goes on to complain of broken Government promises. That is the account given by a witness who is by no means unfavourable to the Government, and it is manifest from it that it was the blundering of the Government itself which first led to the surveyors being turned off the land. I will not go further into this Native question. I hope honorable gentlemen from the North Island, who must be better acquainted with it than I can possibly be, will take up the subject; but this I assert—I will not say without fear of contradiction, for of course I shall be contradicted—that there is a state of discontent, and even of lawlessness, amongst the Natives at the present time which did not exist when this Government came into office. In one respect we are certainly indebted to them for what they have done. They have tried the experiment of governing the Natives by means of the personal influence of the Native Minister more than it has ever been tried before, and the colony is utterly tired of the attempt to govern the Natives in that way. The whole colony demands that an end shall be put to the darkness and mystery which hangs over the Native Office—that it shall be put an end to, and that, as far as possible, the Natives shall be governed in the same way as Europeans. The people demand that the system of Native management by the personal influence of a particular Minister shall not be stereotyped, but that the Natives shall be gradually trained to understand and appreciate our institutions, so that they may be made one people with us, living under one Government, and obeying one set of laws. That I believe to be the feeling not only of the Europeans, but of the Natives themselves; and I believe that, if the Government had availed themselves more than they have done of the services of leading Natives, they would have found such a system most beneficial to the country. If they had made these leading chiefs the means of communication with the Natives generally, and so had conveyed to them the intentions of the Government, they would, I believe, have secured great advantages. I will now come to the question of finance. Now, what is the condition of the finances of the colony? That is what everybody wants to know, and the general complaint is, that we have so very little information on the subject. All we do know is, that there is a very large deficiency. I do not blame the Government because of the fact that there is a deficiency, but I do blame them for making an utterly imprudent estimate of the revenue that was likely to accrue, especially from the sale of the waste lands, and for turning a deaf ear to the warnings, which were poured in upon them from every side, that there was not the slightest probability of the land revenue yielding the sum which they had put down. While on the subject of finance, I will refer to the Loan Bill of last session. I have been present at the passing of many—I may say of almost all the Loan Bills which have been passed by this Legislature; and honorable members who have been placed in the same position will bear me out when I say that it has been the invariable practice, when a loan was proposed, that it should be preceded by a review of the financial position of the colony—a statement setting forth our expenditure, our income, our resources, our indebtedness, how that indebtedness had been created, how the money was spent, how it was proposed to spend the new loan, and what our ability was to bear the burden of it. And if ever there was a time when it was desirable that such a statement should be made, it was when this House was asked to pass a Loan Bill for a larger amount than had ever been passed before. But what actually took place? I do not mean to say that under the peculiar circumstances of the last session it would have been reasonable to expect so copious a Financial Statement as is usually presented to the House. The Minister for Public Works did not give so full a Statement as he gave the previous year, but he gave a satisfactory summary of the proposals for the ensuing year; and I certainly expected that we should have had placed before us some intelligible statement of our financial position, either when the Loan Bill came down, or afterwards, when the House went into Committee of Supply. But what took place? The Colonial Treasurer held a few papers in his hand. He read part of one, and I think he read a clause of what was intended to be an Appropriation Bill, and then, to my amazement, the honorable gentleman sat down. I thought I must have made some mistake in the matter, and when I received Hassard I turned to the place where the Financial Statement is invariably to be found, and there I saw this strange announcement:—

“As the honorable member was apparently reading the Statement, and as Financial Statements had always previously been supplied to Hassard, the reporter in the gallery did not take notes. The Statement not having been supplied, and no report having been taken, there is no record of it.”

I am not surprised that honorable members should laugh, but really this is no laughing matter. We are going to the London money market, where the amount of our indebtedness is already attracting very serious attention, to apply for a larger loan than we have ever applied for before. Prudent men, before lending their money, will require to be fully informed of the condition of the colony, and when they know that it has been customary to send Home a printed copy of the Financial Statement, they will naturally look to Hassard for it; and this is the only mention they will find of the subject. Now, I ask this House whether such a proceeding as that is not enough to shake the confidence of the House and the country in the capacity of the Government to deal with the question of finance. The next complaint I have to make against the Government is, that they have tampered with one of the most valuable institutions which any free country can possess—and that is, the public Press. I am but repeating a truism when I say that the public Press is the bulwark of our liberties, and that without a free, independent, and honest public Press you can have no security for the honesty of the Government or for a diligent and honest administration of affairs. The Government, it is true, cannot take money from the public chest to openly subsidize particular newspapers, but they have the right of giving Government advertisements to newspapers; and gentlemen connected with the Press will bear me out in saying that the advertising is the most lucrative part of their business. Now, the Government has, in the most unblushing manner, endeavoured to influence the public Press by means of Government advertisements. In Wellington a Government newspaper was established about eighteen months ago, the principal shareholders in which were members of the Government themselves; and no sooner was that done than the Government advertisements were taken away from the oldest newspaper in the city and given to the newly-established newspaper. I would ask whether that is the way to encourage a free and independent Press. This practice, of course, was not confined to Wellington. In Christchurch exactly the same kind of thing was done. The Government advertisements were let by contract up to a certain date, and after the contract had expired the Opposition paper applied for a share of the Government advertising. It was refused; and to this day the Government advertisements are given to the Government newspaper, and absolutely refused to the newspaper which does not support the Government. That is not only unfair as between one newspaper and another, but it is grossly unfair to the public, for whose benefit these advertisements are inserted. Why, Sir, what is the object of advertising? It is that the matter advertised shall become known to the public at large, and not to one section only. If economy is the object, the Government should give the advertisements to one paper to-day and to the other to-morrow. In that way people of both sides in politics would have a chance of knowing what the Government advertisements contained. The last copy of the Press I received contains very nearly two columns of Government advertisements, which are inserted gratuitously in order that its readers may not be deprived of that information which these Government advertisements contain. And what has been done in Wellington and in Christchurch has been done all over the colony. I will only briefly allude to the way in which the Government has influenced the public Press—I will not say bribed, although that term would not be too strong—by means of the advantages which the special-wire arrangement gave to certain newspapers. In Christchurch the proprietors of one newspaper have to pay £1,200 a year for what the Government newspaper gets for £300. Really it seems difficult to believe that a free people should so long have tolerated such a gross and scandalous abuse of power. My next complaint against the Government is their arbitrary treatment of the Civil servants. This subject was referred to by Sir William Fox in introducing the vote of want of confidence last session, and, amongst other instances, he mentioned the case of Mr. Booth, who had been put on trial and dealt with in a very harsh and unjust manner. The Native Minister, in reply to the charge, said that not only had Mr. Booth been reinstated, but that he had been placed in a higher position, with a higher salary. These are the honorable gentleman's own words: "Mr. Booth is now occupying a higher position, with a higher salary, and I have his own personal assurance that never, since he has been in the service of the Government, has he had such consideration and fair-play as he has received from me." And this statement, in regard to the higher salary, is repeated further on in the honorable gentleman's speech. Now, that was an important statement for a Minister to make to this House; but I am informed on good authority, and in a manner so circumstantial that I cannot doubt it, that the first intimation Mr. Booth had of any increase in his salary was his reading that statement in Hansard. I would not repeat that assertion if I did not believe it to be true; if the Government can deny its truth I shall be glad of it; but I think it is a matter that ought not to be lightly passed over. Then, Sir, the Government have dealt harshly with the Civil servants by giving to Mr. Luckie one of the most desirable appointments in the gift of the Government. The Civil servants are not overpaid, as we know; the inducements for them to remain in the service are the permanency of their appointments, and the prospect, as years go on, that they will rise to the top of the tree. Therefore, when a valuable appointment becomes vacant the older members of the Service who are competent to fill it have a fair claim to the promotion, and it is a great injustice—a wrong to the colony—to discourage the Civil servants, and pass them over in order to appoint a gentleman who had no claim to the appointment except that he was a political writer who had supported the Government. I hear several honorable gentlemen say, "Oh, oh!" I shall be glad if those honorable gentlemen will mention what other claims Mr. Luckie possessed. When I hear that he had had anything to do with life insurance before, or was in any way an expert in the business, I shall be ready to withdraw the statement which I now make, that in their action in this respect the Government did a great wrong to the Civil Service. The next complaint I have to make against the Government is the extraordinary neglect which has pervaded the administration of the Department of Justice. I will only cite two cases out of very many which I might mention. Down at Lyttelton a change has taken place in the Resident Magistracy. The former Resident Magistrate was about to retire upon a pension. He gave the Government notice months beforehand of his intention, and the people of Lyttelton looked forward very naturally with great anxiety for the appointment of a successor. Week after week and month after month went by, and no person was appointed, until at last the Resident Magistrate had to go away, and leave the office vacant. Now, Lyttelton is a seaport town. I have filled the position of Resident Magistrate there myself, and know the great necessity for a Magistrate being constantly present, as shipping cases have to be dealt with summarily which cannot well be postponed. Not only did the Government neglect to make the appointment until after the Resident Magistrate had gone, but, even then, week after week and month after month went by, and, in spite of applications from the Town Council, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Harbour Board, and of telegrams and applications to the Government of all kinds, the appointment was left vacant for nearly six months, to the great inconvenience of everybody connected with the place. I hope we shall not be told that the Government could not find a person to fill the office of Resident Magistrate. If there is one kind of appointment for which there are a greater number of candidates than any other, it is that of Resident Magistrate; if a person is not fit for anything else, he often applies for the situation of Resident Magistrate. It so happens, unfortunately, that Lyttelton is perhaps the one place in the colony in which there are not a large number of Justices of the Peace. Generally speaking, they are as thick as leaves in Valambrosa; but my honorable friend the Mayor of Lyttelton, and, I believe, one other gentleman—a medical man—are the only Justices of the Peace resident there. The medical man is, of course, very often absent on his professional duties. There are a great many cases in which a single Justice cannot act by himself; and the consequence was, that cases had to be put off day after day, and I am told that even lunatics had to be confined day after day when they might have been released. In other cases prisoners had to be taken to Christchurch. And all because the Government could not find time to select, from the many candidates whom, no doubt, they had at their disposal, a gentleman to fill the appointment of Resident Magistrate at Lyttelton. Sir, I say that that was gross and culpable neglect. Then I will allude to a case which came under my own personal knowledge—the case of the Addington Gaol, near Christchurch. That gaol, when not overcrowded, has accommodation for twenty-nine prisoners. The average number for the last eighteen months has been forty. Now, in the session of 1878 I personally brought this matter over and over again under the attention of the Minister of Justice. Applications were also made to the honorable gentleman from the gaoler and others, until at last he did say he would have a sum of money placed on the estimates; and he kept his promise to that extent. But in spite of my repeated applications that sum has not been spent to the present day. Standing side by side with this gaol, in which there is such insufficient accommodation, there is a large concrete building capable of affording room for fifty or sixty prisoners, and which only requires to be fitted up to provide most ample accommodation. Yet week after week and month after month have elapsed, and, although the money is on the estimates for the purpose, and though the Government have been repeatedly applied to, we have not been able to get out of them the simple authority which was required to enable the accommodation to be furnished. These are samples of the way in which the Department of Justice has been carried on. My next complaint against the Government is one which has made perhaps a more painful impression on me than any other, and it is as to the scandalous manner in which the lunatics of this colony have been treated. If there is one class more than another who, I think, have a strong claim upon our sympathies, it is those poor creatures bereft of their reason, who are quite unable themselves to make their voices heard. The Government have had their attention drawn to the case of the lunatics, not only in my part of the colony, but in other parts, year after year, by the Inspector of Lunatic Asylums, who, with a courage worthy of all praise, has in the most forcible language set out the culpable and scandalous inefficiency which exists in this respect. In a report laid on the table only a day or two ago by the Premier, this is the way in which the Inspector speaks of the accommodation at Christchurch:—

"The overcrowding of the male department is such that it is in a very dangerous condition indeed, and its proper management is quite impossible. Every day-room is used as a dormitory, and excited, discontented, and violent patients are strewn about in all directions as thick as they can lie, on the floors, on the tops of tables, and underneath the tables; and the atmosphere is disgusting in spite of open windows. The building is in an advanced state of decay, and the flooring in many rooms is dangerously rotten, bending freely beneath one's tread. In two places I put my foot right through it. It is patched right and left with boards or large plates of zinc, to keep out the rats."

Now, after the present Government have been in office for two years, after the matter has been pressed upon them, not only by their own officer, but by the newspapers, from which I could quote columns and columns on the subject, this is the state in which the Christchurch Asylum is found at the present day. When the Prime Minister was in Christchurch about eighteen months ago he was appealed to by the chaplain of the Asylum—I dare say he will recollect that—to have some remedy applied to this horrible state of things. He requested that gentleman to write to him. The letter was written, but I think no answer was returned. He was then telegraphed to by the honorable member for Avon. That was eighteen months ago. A contract is now in hand, it is true, but up to this day there has been no alleviation of that most cruel state of things. The contract, I say, is now in hand. I am told by the manager of the Asylum that he requires accommodation for one hundred and forty patients, and yet this contract is only for forty. Even now, at the eleventh hour, they are only providing accommodation for forty patients. And, Sir, the Government cannot say that the House would not give them the money, because, when this very vote was under discussion, the honorable member for Avon entreated them to increase the amount proposed; but they turned a deaf ear to his request,—and here are those poor lunatics, who cannot tell their own tale of woe and misery, still kept in this horrible condition entirely through neglect on the part of the Government. I could cite other cases. I believe the Wellington Asylum is in a condition almost as bad, if not quite. I have now wearied the House, I am afraid, with instances of misgovernment. I will not go further in this direction. I have had too much to do with Governments not to be aware that no Government can be in office for two years without laying itself open to attacks upon its administration. Every Government must make mistakes; and I am also aware that in many cases Ministers are blamed through being officially responsible for the acts of their subordinates. But I submit that of the instances which I have given there is not one in which the neglect is not directly traceable to the Ministers themselves. They are not only officially responsible, but they are personally responsible. I admit that all the Governments we have seen have made mistakes and have given a handle to their opponents; but I also submit that we have never—I certainly have never—known a Government which, in two years, was guilty of such a catalogue of gross blunders and so much culpable neglect as the present Government. Now, what is the secret of this? The secret of it is in the practical abandonment of that system of constitutional government which prevailed in this colony up to the time when the present Government came into office. I wish to speak with every respect of the Prime Minister—of a gentleman of such distinguished antecedents as his are. But the character of those antecedents themselves furnishes just the reason why the honorable gentleman is ill-qualified to occupy the position of Prime Minister of a constitutional colony. What are those antecedents? The honorable gentleman occupied for lengthened periods, and with great distinction, the position of Governor of Crown colonies, where his will was law. He filled those positions during that time of life when a man's character is forming; and it is therefore not at all surprising that the honorable gentleman has become what, I understand, he objects to being called—decidedly autocratic.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Oh, oh.

Mr. HALL.—If honorable gentlemen deny this, they have only to carry back their memories to the manner in which the Prime Minister has dealt with various measures which have come before this House. What did the honorable gentleman do with the Land Bill, which had passed both Houses of Parliament, and which his own colleagues had assented to? What did he do with the Electoral Bill of last year? What did he do—passing from this House to the Cabinet—to one of his own colleagues? What did he do when one of the most able of his colleagues refused to obey him in a matter in which he had no right to expect any obedience? He drove that gentleman out of his Cabinet under circumstances of indignity which not only reflect discredit upon himself, but which, if passed over by us, will reflect discredit on the colony. It has been said that party government is essential to the proper conduct of parliamentary government. That is perfectly true, and, during the many years that I have been a member of this Legislature, there have nearly always been tolerably well-defined parties. The causes of that definition have now, to a certain extent, passed away. The old question of Centralism versus Provincialism is dead, and no bond fide dividing principle, as opposed to the pretended distinction which is being constantly dinned into our ears, has since taken its place. But, Sir, a bond fide honest difference has now arisen around which, I think, parties are grouping themselves at present, and that is, as to whether we shall have a “personal” Government—that is to say, a Government in which the personal will of the Prime Minister is to be the supreme law—or whether we shall have a Government on the lines of the Constitution, under which gentlemen shall occupy those benches not because they are ready to declare themselves supporters of this or that particular man, but because, by their character, by their services, and by their antecedents, the country believes them to be the most capable, the most efficient, and the most desirable men for the position. That is the question around which I think parties are now grouping themselves—whether we shall have personal government in this colony, or whether we shall have constitutional government. Before I sit down I must refer to what has happened since this House last met, in respect to the manner in which the Government have thought themselves justified in attempting to influence the elections. The people were invited to say whether this Government did or did not possess the confidence of the country. If ever there was a time when that question should be fairly and honestly put to them, upon which they should be allowed to form a judgment by a truthful statement of facts, and by fair arguments and reasoning, and nothing else, this was the time. But have they been allowed to do that? Have both the Government and the Opposition been allowed to go to the country, as they should have done, on equal terms? Certainly not. I recollect many elections, but I cannot recollect any previous occasion on which Government property and Government privileges were used for the purpose of influencing the elections, except to a very trifling extent in 1871, and in that case the House at once put its foot on it. In this election the Government had, of course, the control of the Government steamers, and the Opposition had not. Consequently, no sooner was the House dissolved than one Government steamer started for Auckland with one set of Ministers, and another Government steamer brought the Premier to Christchurch. When the Premier got to the south end of the Island, a cry of distress came down from the constituency represented by the honorable member for Eden, and it was understood that the Prime Minister was called to the rescue. The “Hinemoa” was sent down post-haste to Lyttelton, the railroad employés were told on a certain Sunday they must not go to any place of worship or to their homes, but that they must all be on duty, in order that a special train might take the Prime Minister from Dunedin to Lyttelton, where he went on board the “Hinemoa,” and posted away to the “Garden of Eden.” I do not think that was fair. When the elections in Auckland were secured, the “Hinemoa” was put into requisition again, and came full speed down to Lyttelton; but, as unfortunately she had been run off her legs, she could not get any further than Wellington, and after that the journey was completed in an ordinary passenger steamer. The Government had the full use of the "Hinemoa" and the "Stella" to rush from one part of the colony to another. If the Government had been fair they would have said to the Opposition, "We will take one steamer, and you can take the other." It so happened that the election for Wanganui came off before the election for Heathcote. Now, if we had had the use of the telegraph and the Government steamer, and if my friend Sir William Fox had been willing to come down in the steamer to Heathcote, there is no rational doubt that the portly presence of the Postmaster-General would have disappeared from this House, and we should have had Sir William Fox here instead. But we had no chance of that kind. We had to trust to the ordinary passenger steamers, and before any communication could be made or steps taken my honorable friend the Postmaster-General was put into the seat for Heathcote. Then, with regard to the electric telegraph, we do not quite know all that has been done. We know that the Government has been telegraphing to a very extraordinary extent, and we have had one ray of light thrown upon that telegraphing in connection with a telegram from the Hon. Colonel Whitmore to Mr. Ingles. We "wanted to know, you know," whether that was paid for. We were told that it had not been paid for, but that it would be paid for. Well, now we "want to know, you know," with regard to the other telegrams. We want to know whether they have been paid for. I have a strong suspicion that they have not been paid for, and that the Government felt themselves justified in using, for electioneering purposes—which are private purposes, and not public—the electric telegraph. This is not the first time this question has arisen. The question arose in 1871 whether certain telegrams had been franked by Mr. Fox on election business. It turned out that there had been a few—I think under twenty. I then stated—and I only intrude this upon the House for the purpose of convincing honorable members that I am not inventing a doctrine for the occasion—"If they [the Government] wished to use the telegraph for political purposes, they ought to pay for it." A Committee inquired into the whole case, and this is part of their report:—

"The charge of Ministerial misuse of the department resolved itself into a charge of Ministers having franked telegrams which should have been paid for. The Committee examined Ministers in respect to the practice of franking telegrams. It appears, from the evidence given, that during the late elections a few telegrams were franked by Ministers on matters relating to the late elections. For the future, the Committee recommend that such telegrams should be considered of a private nature."

I hope it will be found that all the telegrams from the Government have been considered to be of a private nature, and have been paid for accordingly, although it is rather suspicious that the only telegram regarding which we have information has not been paid for. This is not the whole catalogue of the misdeeds of the Government in the matter of the elections. They seem to have had a knack of recollecting the particular public works which were required for particular places at which candidates favourable to themselves had to be elected. It is a curious fact that the time for commencing these particular works coincided with the time of these elections. It was quite accidental, of course. With regard to Napier, no sooner was the House dissolved than the Colonial Secretary and, I think, the Native Minister posted off to Napier, and there they remembered that a bridge which was an object of great desire to the inhabitants of Napier ought to be commenced. Shortly before the elections one of those gentlemen drove one pile. I do not remember whether the other gentleman drove a second pile, or helped to drive the first, of this bridge over which the Government candidate was to pass to the floor of this House. There was very great enthusiasm, and, if the election had come off immediately after the driving of that pile, there is no knowing what might have happened. But some little time elapsed, the enthusiasm evaporated, and the bridge did not carry over the Government candidate.

Mr. MACANDREW.—We shall know better next time.

Mr. HALL.—No doubt. Because Napier has been so very ungrateful, the honorable gentleman will know better next time. My honorable friend the Minister of Mines represents a constituency on the West Coast which is not one of those large constituencies which the seconder of the Address in Reply referred to. I believe that, when the measure for the adjustment of the representation comes into force, there is considerable danger of that constituency suffering. But the chief centre of population in that constituency is a place called Ross. Ross is in a less flourishing condition at the present time than when I knew it, some years ago; but there are supposed to be large stores of mineral wealth beneath the Town of Ross and its immediate neighbourhood. All that is required to develop that wealth is water-power, which could be brought in by the Mikonui Water-race, and this has been the object sought by the people of Ross for many years. Now, the heart's desire of the people of Ross was to have the Mikonui Water-race; and the heart's desire of the Hon. the Minister of Mines was to be the member for Totara. When two hearts can mutually accommodate each other in that way, a happy union is very often the result. So it came about that my honorable friend proceeded to Ross; and I have got—in a paper which also receives the Government advertisements, and therefore can hardly be unfavourable to the honorable gentleman—a full, true, and particular account of the day's proceedings, or, rather, of the two days' proceedings. It contains a statement of the arrival of the honorable gentleman, of his election, and of all that took place. There is rather more than a column of it; but the political views of my honorable friend are summed up in four lines. I can have no doubt that this letter fairly reflects the state of the public mind at Ross on that occasion.

This is what it says of the honorable gentleman's address: "He briefly enunciated the principal points of the Ministerial policy, and stated his intentions on various local matters." I do not say that the honorable gentleman did not state his political views more fully, but this very brief mention of it is evidence of the state of mind at Ross. The rest of the letter is filled with an account of the turning of the first sod of the Mikonui Water-race. There was a procession, in which the Mayors of Ross and of an adjoining town took part, along with the honorable member, a band of music, and a large number of school-children. So considerate were they that the sods had been cut beforehand, and even then the honorable gentleman did not give satisfaction in turning them. The letter says,—

"I cannot say much for Mr. Gisborne's style of digging. . . . The pick he used he used in a slightly better style, but there was room for improvement even in that. However, no doubt he did his best; but I fear that he would not be able to earn a day's wages at pick and shovel work."

After that, there was the curious fact that Mr. Giles, the Returning Officer—who, one would think, would have kept quiet on such an occasion—made a very neat speech. He said he thought this was the most successful "race meeting" of the season. He also brought the agreeable news that the Premier stated that there was no intention of giving up the East and West Coast Railway. With all these influences brought to bear upon the people of Ross, what possible chance would any Opposition candidate have had there? They had a dinner, they went to hear the Zulu Niggers, and afterwards had a ball. After all that, what possible chance could an Opposition candidate have had? What Opposition candidate would have the temerity to contest a seat against my honorable friend? I am very glad to meet my honorable friend on the floor of this House, but I wish he had not floated into it on the bosom of the Mikonui Water-race. Well, then, the Prime Minister has distributed gifts of a different kind. He went to Christchurch, but he could not give the people there a water-race or a bridge; but here was a clock, bought years ago by the Provincial Government, and which had passed to the General Government as part of its property. I do not know what right the Premier had to give away that clock any more than any other public clock, as it was public property. The Prime Minister graciously made a present of that clock to the Mayor and Corporation of Christchurch. I believe I am right in saying that they have owned it a "white elephant," as it will take from 21,500 to 22,000 to build a tower to put the clock in. That was on the first occasion of his visiting Christchurch. The honorable gentleman came a second time. I suppose the Corporation of Christchurch thought that was a good time or them to get what they wanted. Before the honorable gentleman came the second time the subsidies for the past financial year had not been paid. The Borough of Sydenham had, I believe, received its subsidy. I think my honorable friend the Postmaster-General had not neglected his constituents. The Borough of Sydenham is, to a large extent, in his constituency, and the Christchurch people, finding that the Borough of Sydenham had got its subsidy, immediately telegraphed to the Prime Minister asking when their subsidies would be paid, and a prompt answer came back that they would be paid next day. I have the honor to be Chairman of a large county embracing a great many Road Boards and road districts, and we said that we wanted to know why our subsidies had not been paid. We found that town districts which returned members favourable to the Government had their subsidies paid, and country districts which generally returned members opposed to the Government had not their subsidies paid. Both Christchurch and Sydenham had received their subsidies, whilst the subsidies due to the county and to certain Road Boards had not been paid. I do not think that is a fair way of dealing with the finances of the colony. There are some Road Boards no doubt which have considerable sums at their disposal, but others have none, and are unable to complete the works in hand, because they have not the money to do so. I say, therefore, that on account of their maladministration, on account of their unjustifiable interference with elections, and of their making use of Government property, the Government deserve to be condemned by this House. The "Hinemoa" steamer is Government property, and the captain and crew are Government servants. If it is justifiable for the Government to use one description of Government property and to use one set of Government servants to influence the elections, upon what principle can we deny them the right to use other Government property and other Government servants? If they may use these Government steamers, and the captains and crews of the steamers, why may they not use Government offices? Why not use Government clerks? If this House does not put its foot upon these practices, that is what we shall come to. If a Government that has used special trains for electioneering purposes is not to be condemned by this House, we shall have all kinds of abuse growing up; and it is our duty to put our foot upon it at this very early stage. This is the first time within my knowledge that these influences have been exerted.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh, oh!

Mr. HALL.—Honorable gentlemen can speak after me. Of course they will be able to show, if they can, how very bad other people have been. Whether other people have done this or not, I say it is a gross abuse; and if this House does its duty it will put its foot upon it and put an end to it. What did the House of Commons do just one hundred years ago, when the electors of Middlehurst petitioned against undue Government influence having been exercised by Lord North? The House of Commons passed this resolution:—

"It is highly criminal in any Minister or Ministers, or other servants under the Crown of Great Britain, directly or indirectly, to use the powers of office in the election of representatives to serve in Parliament; and an attempt at such influence will at all times be resented by this House as aimed at its own honor, dignity, and independence, as an infringement of the dearest rights of every subject throughout the empire, and as tending to sap the basis of this free and happy Constitution."

What the House of Commons did, then, a hundred years ago, I hope the Commons of New Zealand will do now, in regard to the improper use which has been made of Government property. As I have said, I shall not have an opportunity of speaking again. I can therefore only anticipate to some slight extent what may be said in defence of the Government. I shall not be surprised if these charges of maladministration are passed over very lightly. At the elections—in my part of the colony, at any rate—judgment has in these matters been allowed to go against the Government by default. There has been really no attempt at defending the Government in this matter; but there is an attempt made to cover the Government offences by a cloak, which is called the Liberal programme: this is to be the mantle to hide a multitude of Government administrative sins. There may be an attempt to induce honorable members to believe that, in order to pass certain measures of electoral reform, the present occupants of those benches must remain there. To that I give the flattest possible denial. While I do not agree in the description which the Premier gave of the character and probable result of his measure; while I rather agree with the honorable member for Christchurch City, who moved the adoption of the Address in Reply, that the present franchise is a liberal one if proper facilities for registration were placed within the reach of the electors; while I deny that this proposed measure will enable much larger numbers to be put on the rolls than could be put on the rolls under the present law,—still I agree that it would be a great improvement. It would be an improvement, because it bears the character given to it, not by the Prime Minister in this House, but by the honorable gentleman who represents the Government in the other House. It is a measure for consolidation and simplification; and for that reason I shall vote for it. I do not believe it will really enable 10 per cent. more of electors to be put on the rolls than can be put on the rolls at the present time. With regard to triennial Parliaments, I am not going to say that I do not believe in some alteration being made in the duration of Parliaments. I told my constituents that I believed Parliaments should be elected every four years; that I believed five years to be too long. The people appear, however, to have set their hearts upon having triennial Parliaments. I believe also that, as a matter of course, it is necessary to have a readjustment of representation. In many cases the representation is unequal and unfair. I speak feelingly, because I come from a part of the country which is worse off in this respect than any other part of New Zealand. Canterbury is worse off than any other part of New Zealand. I may remind the honorable member for Auckland City West that my honorable friend the member for Coleridge represents ten thousand persons, all country people,—all people engaged in the cultivation of the soil, and who contribute largely to the revenue. That is a state of things which requires to be remedied. Canterbury has not its fair share of representation. It is perfectly true that the representation must be readjusted, and that population should be the first consideration. I do not say that it should be the only consideration. If we are wise, there are other considerations which will weigh with us. I am not, however, prepared to assent to a Bill which would leave it to the Colonial Treasurer, even with the assistance of yourself, Sir, to cut and carve the electorates as he thinks fit. The question should be discussed, fought out, and settled on the floor of this House. Sir, I believe that a further adjustment of the taxation of the colony is absolutely necessary. It is absolutely necessary, because we must have more revenue. But I do not believe that the additions to the revenue lately made by the Government were made upon a fair basis. I think that property should contribute its share of the taxation. I have no reason to feel ashamed of the part I have taken in this matter. A large amount of the taxes on property were put on by the Government of which I was a member. I have no reason to dread any inquiry into my conduct in that respect. The time has come when further sacrifices must be made by property; but the sacrifices should not be by one kind of property only. There should be a distribution of the burden more broad and more just than at present. In addition to that, I believe there are urgently required a variety of measures of social reform. It reflects but little credit on the Government that they have not before now dealt with the question of charitable aid and hospitals, and placed them on a well-considered footing—a footing which shall enlist local sympathy and co-operation, and shall not leave distress and poverty to the precarious and uncertain help of private charity. The licensing question also urgently needs being dealt with, for the law on the subject is in a state of the most unsatisfactory confusion. These and many others are measures which must engage the attention of any Government coming into office. We should not look forward to anything like rest in our legislation. Even in the Old Country there is constantly need for fresh legislation, and in a new and progressive country like this any Government coming into office must endeavour to meet that need. But, while that is my conviction, while I believe that a variety of measures of social reform and political reform urgently call for our attention, I believe there is a still greater need, and it is, that the laws we have got shall be capably, diligently, energetically, and honestly administered; and because I believe that that will never be the case so long as those gentlemen occupy the Government benches, I earnestly hope the House will adopt the amendment which I have now the honor to move.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, I am sure it must have been with concern that a great majority of honorable gentlemen present in this House listened to the speech which we have just heard. I had expected a very different speech. Here is a young nation a vast majority of the inhabitants of which are looking out for some great change in their institutions; are looking out for freedom from the present system of taxation, which they regard as oppressive; are desiring a just and fair administration of the laws, which they say in past times they have not had; are looking out for the measures which are to form the foundations of institutions hereafter to arise; and, Sir, when we long to hear of all such things, the trivial matters which have been mentioned to-night are altogether beneath our notice. I had expected that, when what I regard as an unconstitutional interference with our rights took place, and an honorable gentleman was sent down here from a Chamber claiming superiority over this Chamber, something very different would have greeted our ears. The honorable gentleman has entirely misunderstood the gravity of the position. I take some of his last remarks first. He told this House—and I heard him say it with pain—that two parties were now forming themselves in this country, and that the two parties were separating upon the question of whether personal government or party government should prevail. Sir, there is no such difference at all. The question is, whether or not an old state of things shall be swept away and a new state of things be set up. The honorable gentleman has told us that we have not fairly administered the laws. I throw that statement back in his teeth. I say the people are weary of the maladministration of the laws in past times, when members of Provincial Governments, in some instances, made laws to the disadvantage of the people at large, and, as Administrators, administered those laws for their own advantage. The people long to be freed from maladministration of that kind, and expect that such freedom shall be given to them. I say the honorable gentleman is the maladministrator of the laws, not we. He had no right to bring such an accusation against us. He had no right to say we did not fairly administer the laws. Have we acquired large tracts of country for ourselves? Have we “grid-ironed” the whole country? What fences have we run in order that we might claim preemptive rights, to the injury of the population at large? That is what I call unfair administration of the laws. I deny that in our case there has been any such unfair administration of the laws, and I challenge the honorable gentleman to bring forward an instance of it. I now turn to other questions. I will briefly notice the accusations brought against the Government. First of all, it is said that we pretended we wished to reduce Ministers’ salaries—that we had no intention of doing so, and that the two honorable gentlemen who prevented us carrying out our pretended intention were rewarded by being made Justices of the Peace. I ask, did ever a more contemptible notion enter any man’s head? Does the honorable gentleman think that any member of this House, or any honorable man in any position whatever, would have sold himself in order that he might be made a Justice of the Peace? Does he think a Government could be mean enough—because it was opposed, in some object it had in view, by two gentlemen who were worthy to be made Justices of the Peace—to exclude them on that account from that position? I say we acted upon no such base grounds as to refuse to put those gentlemen into that high office—as I regard it—because they, on some occasion, opposed us in this House. It is useless for me to tell the House that an accusation of that kind is absolutely absurd, and unworthy of the honorable gentleman who makes it. I turn next to the accusations made against the Government about employing the “Hinemoa,” and I ask the House, first of all, to remember that this is a peculiar country. It is a country divided into several islands—a country in which it is difficult to pass from one part to another, and especially in the North Island—and it is a country in which those who have governed it have always had the services of a vessel placed at their disposal. We did not order the “Hinemoa.” We found the vessel here, and the use we made of that vessel was simply the use that would have been made of any Government vessel on the coast. I maintain that the people of New Zealand as a whole have an interest in their Ministers being able to get rapidly from point to point. They thus gain, as it were, the advantage of having resident Ministers, and the country is saved the great cost of resident Government agents. I claim that I have a right, as Prime Minister of the country, if I think it desirable to make myself acquainted with the people and their wants in various localities, to avail myself of the services of that vessel. And, further than that, I deemed it my duty to warn the people of New Zealand of the exact nature of the measures which the Government proposed to introduce. I thought it my duty to make the people at large my friends, and the willing assistants of the Government in carrying out those measures which we considered would be of benefit to the country. Sir, I say I had a right to use that vessel in order to go about New Zealand and address large masses of the people, to endeavour to induce them to adopt measures of which I so highly approved. Have no other Ministers done the same? Has not Mr. Gladstone himself done so? Has not Mr. Bright done the very same thing? Have not many of the leading members of the English Legislature taken the very same course? Have not English Ministers used public yachts and vessels to take them to different parts of the country? But there is not the same necessity for that means of communication in England which there is in this country. The circumstances are absolutely and wholly different. And I go further, for no Minister in England has carried to the same extent that I have the design of making the people of the country one with their Government. I had a right to introduce my form of government into New Zealand if I thought it the best. I did think it the best, and I used my utmost endeavours to get it established. I think it is good both for the Government and for the people themselves that such a course should be pursued. If I have done right, I am deserving of the thanks of the people; if I have done wrong, I am deserving of their censure. But I stand here perfectly convinced that no such censure will fall upon me. I am thoroughly convinced that my conduct in that respect will meet with gratitude both at the present time and in the time to come. My conscience is clear. I did as I thought right; and as long as I am in office, and as long as the people of New Zealand desire it, I shall continue the same course, not from any obstinacy or wish to run counter to public feeling, but because it is a course which my conscience tells me is the right one, and which it is my duty to follow. I next pass to the objections raised to the Native policy of the Government. That I shall only slightly allude to, because the Native Minister is perfectly capable of defending himself; but I must make one remark. It is said that when we came into office we found the Native population in a tranquil and obedient state, and that we have quite altered that state of things. I say that before we came into office Native matters were infinitely worse than they are now. Those who know what the state of the country then was will bear me out when I say that murders of the most atrocious kind were committed in the Waikato and in the neighbourhood of Auckland, and no effort was made to punish the murderers. On the West Coast, before we came into office, a Native committed an outrage on a poor woman; and when he was arrested, and the police were bringing him to trial, he was rescued, and yet no notice was taken of the crime. I mention only these few instances, but I could name many others. I declare, to the best of my belief, that the condition of the Natives before we came into office was much worse than it is at present; and I feel that any person who considers what I have said in outline, and works out the details himself, must agree with what I state. I now turn to another question. It is said that we have bribed the Press by advertisements—not that we have attempted to do so, but that we have succeeded in doing so. But let the Press speak for itself. I deny that the advertisements given could possibly have influenced the Press. We were forced by law to advertise in some paper in each provincial district: the Opposition made that law, not ourselves. The sums paid are so trifling in comparison with the amounts which the Press is called upon to pay itself, that they are absolutely unworthy of consideration. I wonder that such a statement could be made. I am astonished that the newspaper proprietors should be vilified by being told that they have been bribed. For myself and the Government we expected hard words from the honorable gentleman. That he should call us “bribers” is not surprising—I expected such terms to be used,—but I regret that the Press should be spoken of in such terms. It was unwise, unjust, and ungenerous, and I am sorry that the honorable gentleman did it. I now turn to his remarks upon the estimates. The honorable gentleman says that the persons in England who lend their money to the colony have always been accustomed to receive from New Zealand a printed Statement of the condition of our finances, and that the credit of the colony would be shaken because such a Statement was not read to the House last session. My opinion is, that no written Statement should be allowed to be read in this House. It is contrary to the rules. It is a breach of the Standing Orders, of which the Speaker ought to take notice. I once tried to get notice taken of it, and the answer I received was that the custom had crept in. It was not defended—it was admitted to be unusual; it was admitted to be in many respects inconvenient; but it was said that the practice had not previously been objected to. I had a perfect right to follow the English custom and make a verbal Statement to the House. I made such a Statement as I thought was necessary under the circumstances. The House knows perfectly well that it was impossible to make the ordinary Financial Statement. The dissolution was to take place immediately; and as the Government was lying under a vote of want of confidence, and it was continually pressed, by an Opposition in a majority, to hurry on the dissolution, I maintain that it would have been unconstitutional on my part to make a more elaborate Statement than I did. Our position was peculiar. Harsh words were used to us. We were told that we had been condemned,—that we were ostracized,—that we could do nothing. Such was the language of the highest authority in the country. Under these circumstances I made such a Statement as I thought proper and just. That Statement should have been taken down by the reporter; but the mere fact of the reporter believing that I would make a Statement from a written paper, and that he could get it afterwards, and therefore omitting to take down what I said, reflects no blame upon me. I was surprised to hear such a statement made. I will now pass to the question of the Civil Service. It is said that we have neglected the interests of the officers of the Civil Service. I should like the Civil Service itself to be appealed to. I can solemnly declare that I have cherished those interests to the best of my ability. There are many personal friends of my own in the Civil Service—men who began life under me, and whose interests are as dear to me as those of my own relatives: in fact, I should do more for them than I would for my own relatives, because I should think it unfair to say anything in their behalf. I say, therefore, that the accusation is unjust and undeserved. I rest cheerfully on the verdict of the Civil servants; and I believe that the honorable gentleman knows in his heart that I did not deserve the remarks he made. Then the honorable gentleman spoke on the subject of the lunatics. I feel the truth of all that he said in favour of that unfortunate class of persons. Wherever I have been I have devoted myself to the subject of hospitals and lunatic asylums, and I can appeal to the history of many countries for the proofs of what I have done in respect to this question. But I would ask the House to remember that there were provincial institutions in this country which managed all establishments of that kind. They were under local control, and, generally speaking, were well managed. It will be found, in one of the highest works on the subject, that I bore testimony, when I was in England, to what had been done in Christchurch with regard to the lunatics there, and that one of the first medical men of the time recorded my testimony in his book. But the provincial institutions were destroyed by ruthless hands, and no other form of government was put in their place. The care of the lunatic asylums by the Government had gone on for a considerable time, and they were in a bad and inefficient state, when we came into office. Sudden reparation was impossible; but all that men could do in the direction of benefitting the lunatics we did our best to do. The subject had been examined by the House, and I feel certain that what I say will prove to be the case. Then the honorable gentleman went on to say that all constitutional rule had been abolished by me—that I had set up an autocratic form of government, and that that was what the Opposition was rebelling against. He said that I was unfitted by previous education to administer a free government. I do not know why my education should have unfitted me to administer a free government. I do not know why I should be charged with being autocratic. I appeal to every one of my colleagues to say whether I have been so or not, and I believe their opinion would be that, if anything, I have been too yielding. Certain instances were produced of my autocratic conduct in this House. The instance was adduced of my advising the Governor to disallow the Land Bill. Well, Sir, I should repeat that advice to-morrow under similar circumstances. That Land Bill was as iniquitous a measure as was ever passed. It was a fulfilment of the course formerly entered upon by the honorable gentleman himself at Christchurch. It sacrificed the interests of the community at large to those of the squatters, with whom he was allied. It prolonged their licenses for ten years, without the country having any warning that such a thing was to be done. The honorable gentleman himself is the person who is autocratic. He has injured the community at large by his autocratically forcing the claims of the squatters upon them. In the case of the Land Bill there was an opportunity of appealing to the people. There was no necessity to pass that law until the new Parliament was elected to succeed that which was expiring. Before such great interests—disposing of the leases for ten years—were disposed of, the Bill should have been sent to the constituencies, because all New Zealand was interested in those pastoral leases. But the House would not do it. The squatters had a majority at the time, and we were defeated upon that point. I was compelled to do one of two things—either to submit to what I believe was a grievous wrong, or to make a last effort by advising the Governor not to allow such a wrong to be done—to save the people of New Zealand. He chose to do this wrong: but I did my duty to the people of New Zealand. I had no personal interest to serve. I have no runs myself. I was a perfectly impartial person, able to judge calmly and coolly of what the interests of New Zealand required; and I fearlessly did my duty to my countrymen, knowing perfectly well that the squatters of Canterbury would pursue me till I died, for the effort I made for the public good. I leave honorable gentlemen to judge whether they are not doing that now, and whether they have not been doing it ever since. I strove to have in this instance justice done to the public. Then, with regard to the Electoral Bill, I am said to have acted autocratically in that respect; but I did nothing of the kind. The Electoral Bill was passed in this House, and was sent up to the Legislative Council. The members of that body, in their own interest, opposed the Bill. But it merely advocated what I believe were the just rights of the people of New Zealand, and I am sorry that I gave the honorable gentleman offence by endeavouring to enforce such rights upon him and the House in which he then was. But they so altered the Bill that in our belief we ran the chance of a Native disturbance if we had allowed it to become law. We had a perfect right to decide whether we thought that proper or not. What the Legislative Council proposed to do was this: to take away from the Natives privileges given to them by the Constitution. And an accusation was made against me as if I had then for the first time proposed to give the Native population a double vote. The double vote was in existence. Some honorable gentleman says, "No, no." I can only say that, whoever he is, he must be totally unacquainted with the Constitution of this country. He ought not to hold a seat in this House if he maintains that, for he does not know the laws of New Zealand. Well, I found this double vote in existence: I did not introduce it myself. When I had the opportunity of recommending that the vote should be given to the Native population, I gave them a fair vote—that is, the same as the Europeans; afterwards the double vote was added by other persons. But what the Legislative Council required was that we should take away one of their votes without the Natives being consulted in the matter, without their being informed that it was intended to do anything of the kind, without their being asked which vote they would rather lose. If we had incurred all the ill-feeling which would have arisen from the adoption of that course the probability is that we should have found ourselves plunged into great difficulty. The Native Minister therefore said, "We had better pass the Bill as it was sent up to the Legislative Council. Don't allow them to interfere with our rights; we have never interfered with theirs. We sent up the Bill in the form in which we wished it to be passed; and we will promise that during the recess we will inquire into the matter, and next session take away one vote from the Natives." But the Legislative Council would not hear us. I think that under these circumstances we were perfectly justified in refusing to incur the risk I have pointed out. The other points are really hardly worth noticing. One accusation was, that the Government had not allowed the people of New Zealand to judge for themselves as to the proposed measures of the Government—that we had gone about the country—or, at least, that I had—to address the people. Now, that is nothing more nor less than to call the people of New Zealand fools. When honorable members say they believe that the people of New Zealand would allow me to persuade them, against their wills, to take a certain course and to approve of certain measures, and that they are not able to judge for themselves, they say, in a roundabout way, that the people are fools. What those honorable gentlemen wanted was that the people should not be allowed to judge for themselves. They did not wish the facts of the case put before them. The honorable gentleman himself is the man who did not wish them to be allowed to form a fair judgment on the subject. He said that, by instructing the people of New Zealand on the great questions at issue, we did not allow them to judge for themselves. I say that to give them information, and not leave them in that darkness which has been customary hitherto—that darkness in which the honorable gentleman himself so much delights—to let the people of New Zealand know exactly what the measures are, to explain them fully to them, and then to let them pronounce their opinion—I say that that is to let them fairly judge for themselves, and that I was doing my duty to the people of New Zealand in giving them an opportunity of that kind. That is the answer I make to that accusation. Then, Sir, the honorable gentleman said what I was very sorry to hear. He said that, because the people of Christchurch asked that a subsidy due to them should be paid, I acted unworthily with a view of influencing their votes; and he then went on to say that in some county he spoke of the subsidy was not paid. Well, now, that may be the case. I do not know. But I do know this: that, making inquiries on the subject recently at the Treasury, I found out that of all the subsidies there were only two that had not been paid, and that those two had never been asked for—that the moment any subsidy had been asked for it had been paid.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Quite wrong.

Sir G. GREY.—Some honorable member says, "Quite wrong;" who it is I do not know.

Mr. SUTTON.—I know of two or three that have not been paid.

Sir G. GREY.—I simply said two. It may have been three. I was told two. But I have been assured positively that every subsidy asked for has been paid. The honorable gentleman does not say the subsidy has been asked for? I know that I have stated what I was told, and I firmly believe that what I was told was right—that every subsidy asked for had been paid, and that there was no preference given to Christchurch over any other place. Then, there was an accusation that I gave a clock. This is so absurd that it is hardly worth noticing. But there was a clock which was lying in a state of ruin.

Mr. HALL.—The clock keeps excellent time.

Sir G. GREY.—It had lain for years unnoticed. The honorable gentleman says "No." I affirm the contrary. In the next place, I did not give the clock myself; there was a consultation of the Government upon the subject. I would not even venture to do such a thing as that. It was agreed that, as this clock was wanted as a public clock for the town, it ought properly to be given to the Municipality; and, as it was lying unused, that course was adopted. I will now leave those points, and pass to other questions. I think I have bestowed too much time upon them, and they really have nothing to do with the main question at issue. I now come to the real points at issue between the Opposition and the Government. I, first of all, begin by saying this: that the people of New Zealand had the freest form of Constitution in the world. They elected what were virtually their own Lieutenant-Governors. There was no nominated Upper House. They elected every member who was to serve the people. They had the power of making their own laws without submitting them to the Queen; they were sent simply to Ministers chosen by the people of this country. In every respect it was one of the freest institutions in the world. The country was well governed under it. The provinces rose to a state of prosperity and stability, and they had gained that position with a rapidity of advancement almost unequalled, and they did that favoured by a Constitution of that kind. The country was in a perfectly settled state. The honorable gentleman and his friends destroyed that Constitution. They deprived the people of New Zealand of the liberties they had. They destroyed a government which was working well, and producing advantages for every part of the country; and they set up absolutely nothing in its place—it must be admitted that their attempt was an utter failure—and they managed to do that by burdening the revenue in an extraordinary manner. They bribed the people of New Zealand to abandon rights that they may never get again, by promising them what they called "subsidies"—"substantial subsidies"—which they took out of the pockets of the people. They took them out of one pocket and put them into another, subtracting heavy charges in the passage, and they burdened the revenue with a charge which now amounts to about £555,000 a year, and diminished the resources of the General Government, I may say, to that extent. The Government, which then became a central Government, had no proper means of governing the distant extremities of New Zealand. It had not been formed for a purpose of that kind. Some years must elapse yet before it can possibly fulfil its functions in every part of New Zealand; and a system of centralization which is in every respect most objectionable has been set up, and the population of New Zealand have been utterly deprived by those gentlemen of local self-government. I say that in that respect they have been the enemies of their country. They may attach to me the name of the "common enemy" of all. I say the man who obtained the Constitution I have referred to for New Zealand was its friend, and that those who destroyed it were really the enemies of all the people of New Zealand. Then, Sir, honorable gentlemen tell us now that they are all liberal. I distrust them. The honorable gentleman who has just spoken, I am assured by those who have consulted his speeches, has always been opposed to a free franchise in this country. He has ever said that the people have no natural right to a franchise—that it is something bestowed upon them which they have no right to claim. Such, Sir, has been the language used by the honorable gentleman.

Sir G. Grey

Well, I distrust a man who holds those views. I do not believe such a man would give a free franchise if he could help it. Then, the honorable gentleman says that now he is in favour of proper representation. I ask, if those honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House are in favour of a free and proper representation—a representation in proportion to population—why have they, after so many years of mismanagement, allowed the representation to fall into the state in which it now is? Why did they allow that, if they were really attached to a fair system of representation? Why, when they recently passed a new Representation Bill, did they make the matter worse? I contend that they intended to build up the power of a landed aristocracy in this country in imitation of England, in imitation of that power attached to land which has been so hurtful to England for so many years; and that, in setting up the kind of representation which they have set up, they did their best and have partially succeeded in bringing about a state of things such as that which Great Britain has so long deplored. Not only have they done that, but they have secured this further disadvantage: that it will be difficult indeed to wrest from them powers which they now hold, and which they ought never to have assumed—those powers thus gained by creating small constituencies which they could influence. I say that from that fact it will be difficult indeed to make the large landed estates which they have acquired pay their fair share towards the taxation of the country. I say it will be difficult indeed to make those who have realized enormous incomes in New Zealand contribute that proportion of those incomes to the taxes which the population have a right to expect from them. And it will be difficult to bring about a reform of the representation, because it is not to be believed that—with the second branch of the Legislature as now constituted—seats so easily obtained from the smallness of the constituencies will be readily abandoned. There must be a similar contest to that which took place in England with reference to the rotten boroughs at the time of the Reform Bill. The honorable gentleman knows that perfectly well. He did not tell the House that. And he knows that many sit there who do not represent a fair proportion of the population of New Zealand, and that this House does not truly represent the country. And when he said that the honorable member for Auckland City West did not go far enough when he made the pregnant statement which he did to-day, in the able speech we have heard from him, that two members on the side of the Government—the one who moved the Address, and the one who seconded it—were returned by more people than eleven members who were on the Opposition side, it occurred to me that the honorable gentleman (Mr. Hall) who moved the amendment did not himself go far enough. It is true that in a few instances named it would appear the honorable gentleman (Mr. Hurst) did not go far enough; but I say, Sir, that the honorable member (Mr. Hall) who has moved this amendment did not himself go far enough. Let any man search for himself in the returns which show all the electoral districts of the colony, and then let him deny that honorable gentlemen sit there who do not represent a fair and just number of electors as they ought to do, and that the people of New Zealand are consequently not fairly represented in this House. Then, Sir, I pass to what the honorable gentleman said on the subject of the incidence of taxation. He said he was the individual who had imposed some admirable system of taxation on New Zealand, from which the greatest amount of revenue was received.

Mr. HALL.—I said I was a member of the Government which had done so.

Sir G. GREY.—I do not know what kind of taxation it was—whether the duties were Customs duties—

Mr. HALL.—Stamp duties.

Sir G. GREY.—They do not constitute the largest portion of the revenue.

Mr. HALL.—I did not say they did.

Sir G. GREY.—They form a very small portion of the revenue.

Mr. HALL.—£200,000 a year.

Sir G. GREY.—I believe the honorable gentleman was a member of the Government which imposed the enormous Customs duties that now prevail. I think he was a member of the Government that altered the Customs duties, greatly increasing them. That was a matter which he left out of sight. He did not allow the people of New Zealand to judge for themselves in that respect. That corner was dark in the house of his conscience. But, Sir, I say that the question undoubtedly is this: The people of New Zealand have for years been subjected to an unfair taxation—a taxation by which the landholders have largely benefited by not bearing a just share of the charges of the country. The honorable gentleman spoke of the unfairness of the land-tax. I appeal to everybody to say whether a fairer tax was ever imposed. The only fault was that it was not larger and progressive. As the incomes derived from land benefited by the public expenditure, so ought the amount of tax levied on those lands to have been raised. That would have been fair and just. The injustice which has been done in reference to the land-tax is to the people at large—not to those who pay the tax. The object of the honorable gentleman and of those who think with him is to make all contribute alike to the revenue. I remarked the terms of his expression. His object is to make every individual, from the poorest to the richest, pay in proportion to his property. I say that nothing can be more unjust. Let the people pay in proportion to the sacrifice they make in paying the taxes. That is the fair rule. That is the rule now recognized by all persons who study political economy. I remarked that the honorable gentleman distinctly evaded that question. That is one reason why I can repose no confidence in the Opposition. Another thing is this: No reference was made by the honorable gentleman to the fair and equitable administration of lands—both public and Native lands. He said nothing of the manifest abuses that prevailed in the time past. He expressed no regret for the part he had taken in imposing such bad laws on the colony. He expressed no sort of sorrow for the way in which almost every acre of good land in the Province of Canterbury has been taken up without the public having had a fair chance. No sorrow or regret was expressed for that; and yet nothing more unfair was ever done. No people have been more injured than the people of Canterbury have been. Let an examination be made into the pre-emptive rights obtained, into the system of gridironing, into all these points, and I am sure that one general opinion will be arrived at—that a change must be made, and that a fair and just administration of land, both public and Native, will have to be secured. Everything was done to build up the power of this landed aristocracy, even in reference to the rents. What did they do? They established a Land Board in each provincial district. By whom were these Boards to be chosen? By the Government in office at the time, who made the law. They were not elected by the people. There was no justice in that respect. In every way an effort was made by the law-makers and administrators of the law to secure these great advantages for themselves, so as to render their position almost unassailable. Then I say that the people not only require a change in the administration of the land, but they also require that some perfect system of local self-government should be established. The country can no longer go on in its present state. The Opposition have not told us what they intend to do. They have accused me: I now accuse them. I say to them, For years you have taken liberty after liberty from the people of New Zealand. You took from them their provincial institutions; you set up nothing of equal freedom in their place. You took from them their fair right of representation, so that a very small number of electors, in many places, return members to Parliament—small bodies of electors who can be easily managed. Under that system of laws the Opposition and their friends principally acquired vast tracts of territory—tracts so large that, if the whole of them were summed up together, I feel certain honorable gentlemen would be perfectly astonished. In truth, in that respect, there was growing up the system of landed magnates which prevails in Great Britain. It appeared inevitable that in a few years there would be a number of very rich men holding enormous properties which they really had no more right to than their fellow-men, and the great mass of the country would be sunk in poverty. That is what we were rapidly coming to, and what we are determined to avoid. The Opposition were determined to resist us by not giving a greater franchise—a fair representation—to the people; by providing that Land Boards should be nominated; by providing that the people, as a mass, should be taxed to pay subsidies to those bodies which had, by means of a plurality of votes, in every respect fortified themselves in a position, and rendered it extremely difficult to assail them. It was necessary that the battle should be fought. Let me point out what the inevitable effect of that would have been—what we were coming to. I will just state, first of all, a few cases showing what is the position of Europe at the present moment. I will begin with Scotland. I will tell the House this: that 12 large landed proprietors hold one-fourth of Scotland, and 320 landed proprietors hold two-thirds of Scotland. Now, that is what we should rapidly have come to here. In Ireland, 292 persons own one-third of the island, 744 persons own the half of Ireland, and 1,942 persons hold two-thirds of Ireland, and almost the whole of it will be in the hands of these 1,942 persons when large leases fall in. Take England and Wales: 280 persons hold one-sixth of the whole of England and Wales; and 10,257 people hold two-thirds of the whole of England and Wales; and it is impossible to ascertain what the total number of persons who hold property in England and Wales is, because, in the returns the Government allowed to be taken, they mixed up in England and Wales leaseholders, returning leaseholders as freeholders, and they would not allow forests and commons held by these people to be taken into account either. So that there was no possibility, under that system, of getting an exact account of the persons; but the result is this: that 12,469 persons hold two-thirds of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. Now let us turn, on the other hand, to France. In France there are seven million landed proprietors, reckoning down only to those who hold six acres. In the return of persons in England and Wales they have gone down to people holding as small a piece of land as an acre. The result is this: It has been found that much greater comfort, much greater wealth, throughout the whole population, prevails in France, in Germany, in Austria, in Italy, in Norway, in Denmark, in Sweden, in Belgium, and in Holland—all existing under one land law—than prevails in England—while this land law of England entails an amount of wretchedness and misery which it is almost impossible to describe. The result of that is this: that it not only impoverishes the nation, but hardens the hearts of the landowners, who think nothing of the misery which they inflict on the millions. Nothing can induce them to yield these privileges, which keep millions of their fellow-countrymen in a state of starvation, or semi-starvation, and absolute misery. They harden the heart to the sufferings of other people. Great landlords may be kind to their immediate dependants—may give large sums in times of much distress; but they think nothing of the daily miseries of the millions, continued throughout many generations. That I may not be accused of saying what is wrong on this subject, I will give two instances which struck me in an extraordinary degree as to the effect which these land laws of Great Britain have on the human heart. The first occurred while I was in England, at the election in November, 1868. Mr. Dieraeli, addressing the electors of Buckinghamshire, said this: He described the famine of Ireland as a blessing. An immense number of people had indeed died; an enormous multitude had been driven out of the country. That, he said, was a blessing given such as no statesman could confer: it was given by the Maker of the Universe: it reduced the population in such a manner that the landlords were able to deal with the people. It is quite evident that, if from any country you take a million of people, or any large proportion of people, say one-sixth or one-seventh, those who are left behind must for a time appear to be benefited, because they inherit the property, however trifling, of that large number swept away. But what appears to me a horrible thing was this: that Mr. Disraeli said that these numerous deaths were such a benefit that the people of Great Britain ought to be grateful for the misfortune that had fallen on Ireland. Then, when a voice in the crowd, which Mr. Disraeli recognized, cried out, "Three cheers for the famine in Ireland," Mr. Disraeli assented, and three cheers were given; and when finished Mr. Disraeli said, "Well, you have given three cheers, before this, for things which have not done so much good to man as that famine." Consider what that meant! Instead of that famine being the visitation of God, it was the work of man, beyond all doubt. Ireland was in this state: that the mass of the population were having no other means of subsistence than small plots of land, from a quarter of an acre to ten acres, and the average rent was £10 an acre; the whole of which £10, or the produce which represented it, was generally taken out of Ireland to be put in the pockets of absentees. What was the result? The people were forced to exist on their only means of subsistence—potatoes; and the Government was often warned that the inevitable result would be that a famine would take place. The famine did take place; the most dreadful scenes occurred; and Mr. Disraeli said that this was a benefit for which they ought to feel grateful! Above a million of people died of starvation, and in most horrible circumstances. Any man who reads the account of what took place will have his heart moved in such a way as nothing else could move it. He will hear of fathers being anxious to bury their children in consecrated ground, which privilege they valued so highly that a sickly man was seen creeping along the road, dragging by a string the dead bodies of his two children behind him. He will hear of people dying in houses, of no one being there to bury them, and of their bodies being devoured by rats. He will hear of a million human beings swept away by the most lingering and agonizing of deaths. Yet three cheers were given for an event of that kind. The other day another thing of the same kind took place. There was a great dinner at the Mansion House. From three to four hundred persons were present. There was the richest kind of gold and silver plate, wines of every sort, luxuries of every kind, and from three to four hundred of the magnates of the country assembled, proud in their wealth, proud in their position. What did the Earl of Beaconsfield do? He made a great speech. He told them that landed property in Great Britain ought to continue as at present; that there ought to be no alteration in the law; and that announcement was received with frantic cheers. Their vision was fixed on themselves, on their own wealth and magnificence. This they thought of, thinking nothing of the millions of wretched beings outside the walls of the Mansion House, of the two hundred thousand paupers in London. Consider the agricultural population beyond London. Consider the people in Ireland, the poor in Scotland, who can get no land, no home, for whom there is no hope, who have nothing before them in old age but the workhouse and a pauper's grave; and then consider these three or four hundred people resolving that no alteration should be made in the land law, which was bringing such misery on millions. I say that no more terrible sight has been seen in the world. We have one type given to us illustrating things of this kind. We have an account of a great feast, in which people drank wine out of vessels of gold and silver, and hardened their hearts absolutely and entirely; but a hand came and wrote upon the wall, "Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin." And I say, in reference to that dinner in the Mansion House in England, that, although no hand was visible, upon the wall it was written that an end should come to that detestable system under which millions were oppressed, and that the land—which it is clearly the common property and right of all men born into the world to have a fair chance of acquiring a portion of—should no longer be shut against the immense mass of the people, so that twelve thousand people can hold two-thirds of the country, and can keep the rest of the population virtually as slaves. That is the attempt which has been made in New Zealand in the past—an attempt to set up here immense landed properties by means unfair to the community at large. I say that the real question at issue is, not whether we shall have personal government or party government, but whether the system now in operation in this country shall be allowed to continue, or whether a new system shall be allowed to be set up. That is the point which myself and those who work with me are determined to work for. What we feel is this: We know that generation after generation of men appear upon this earth, and we look with wonder as we consider this vast procession coming on. If we try to trace it backwards we lose the beginning of the procession in the dark gloom of history. Nothing exists of them; but we know that each generation, as it came on, has had to contend against the miseries of life, against the oppression of the few over the many; and we cannot help thinking of that with sorrow, and longing that some change should take place. We also know that in each generation there have been some men who have stood forward and have fought for the public good, achieving perhaps but little, but still accomplishing something. We know that those men, feeling that they were in the performance of their duty, and studying the human race, were not mere dreamers, but were benefactors of their kind. They felt that all that gave value to their lives was derived from their fellow-men; they felt that all that gave them pleasure, and happiness to their homes, came from their fellow-men; and they therefore felt that they ought to make themselves useful to those who occupied the earth with themselves. We are also determined to return the benefits

we have received, by doing a service to those amongst whom we live. We are resolved to devote ourselves to that duty. We feel that we shall, to some extent, succeed, and feel certain of this: that so long as we have that task before us, and steadily pursue it, we shall know no despair, that no chill of despondency shall come over us, because we are certain to achieve something. We know that it has taken, as generations came on, many years in each case to build up even the smallest portions of the edifice of freedom which the human race are trying to erect. We are resolved that we ourselves, whatever may be the difficulties we encounter, will do something towards completing that edifice, something towards adding to its beauty, something to make its proportions greater and better than they were. We care nothing for the taunts which are hurled against us, for the puny and contemptible accusations which are made, such as I have noticed this night. We know that we shall succeed in laying here the foundations of a race which will be in every respect a monument to the efforts of those who have striven to build it, which shall be as a light here, at the utmost limits of the known world, lightening up the dark regions which surround New Zealand, and securing to them civilization and Christianity. Whether we are in office or out of office, we can equally pursue that course; we can equally do our duty to our neighbour and our fellow-man. With that object before us, it is indifferent to us what position we hold. We shall hardly turn aside, as I have to-night, to notice the contemptible accusations made to try to darken our good fame. We seek something nobler, something greater; and we shall have this solace in old age, that we can look back on something accomplished here, upon abuses swept away, upon freedom secured, upon liberties gained for the people of New Zealand, upon equality of taxation, upon a system of society which secures a home to all, and hopes to all men in the country. Fortified by these thoughts, by these desires, we will walk calmly, quietly, and cheerfully on in the course we have entered upon, whatever position we occupy.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—I never rose in this House with so much reluctance as I do to-night. I feel myself very presumptuous in rising at all, and had the matter been left to my own judgment I certainly should not have done so. We have listened to-night to two speeches both of which, in their way, were very remarkable. They were as different as two speeches could well be. And yet each of them was good of its kind. One we may look upon as a terrestrial speech, and the other as quite a celestial speech. One gentleman confined himself to what I suppose is the business of this House; the other gentleman took us to England, to Scotland, to Ireland, to France, and to Babylon. And yet, after all, I think it must be admitted that he said wonderfully little on the subject which we have to-night under discussion. I have no wings to carry me to Babylon. Every one who knows me knows that I am a most commonplace, matter-of-fact speaker, and if I were to attempt to follow the Premier through the regions which he has traversed to-night it would simply be a very sudden descent from the sublime to the ridiculous. Before I go into what has been said by the Premier I would like to make a few remarks about the proposer and seconder of this motion, because, after all, I suppose we may be considered to-night to be speaking upon the Address in Reply. I think I may safely say I never saw such a thoroughly trashy, contemptible document supported by two such exceedingly good men as those who proposed and seconded it. If the Government had no consideration for their own credit in the matter, they certainly should have proposed something more respectable than they have placed in the hands of two of their supporters who are in themselves thoroughly respectable men, who do the Government a great deal of credit; but I am quite sure they will not keep them long. There are only one or two questions alluded to by the honorable member for Christchurch City (Mr. Andrews)—who, I must say, confined himself to the subject in a strict and business-like way—in respect of which I shall correct him, and in regard to which he has erred, I believe, through having lately listened more to the high flights of the Premier than to such matter-of-fact speeches as he will hear in this House. The Premier's imaginary pictures, I believe, have led him into the idea that when contesting the Christchurch election he was, in some way utterly unknown to us, contesting the seat against two illiberal men, who were opposed to all those liberal measures which he himself so sincerely and heartily supports. For the information of the new member for Christchurch City, I may be allowed to say that all old members of this House know that the residential qualification Electoral Bill was passed by this House more than twelve months ago by a majority of 61 to 2. Now, I do not understand very well how an appeal could be made to the country in favour of that Bill as against this House, which carried the measure by such a majority. What is more remarkable is that one—and the only one now in the House—of the two gentlemen who voted against that Bill, is sitting on the self-styled Liberal side of the House. It is true I do not think he belongs to that side, inasmuch as he told his constituents that he could not support the Premier, both on account of the despotic habit which he had acquired in his vocation as Governor of the colony, and on account of the infirmity which he had reached in consequence of his age. Under these circumstances, I do not know why he still sits there. I had hoped he would come over to this side of the House. He is a gentleman whom I highly esteem, and with whom I have been often associated; and I should be glad to see him on this side. I think it would be better for him to do so, if he intends to carry out the declarations he has made on that subject. I will not just now enter into the proofs of the Premier's despotism and infirmity, but I will just say that, in addition to the mistake which the honorable member for Christchurch City made upon the subject of the Electoral Bill, he has also made a mistake when he supposes that we have done nothing in this House with regard to extending the hours for polling. The Bill I have already alluded to did extend the time of polling by some four hours, when introduced into the House; but before it left the House that extension was reduced to two hours. That amendment, which I did not think was an amendment at all, though it was so called, was moved by a gentleman who occupied the very same seat as the new member for Christchurch City spoke from this afternoon. There were many divisions upon the Bill, and I was myself exceedingly sorry to find that the House shortened the hours. I can assure the honorable member that this is not a new subject in the House. It has received the attention of the House on several occasions, and I believe it will be certainly carried this session, or whenever we come to consider the Electoral Bill. I quite agree with the remarks made by the honorable gentleman with regard to the simplification of the mode of registration. I do not know if we are to take the Bill introduced into the House last session by the Government as a sample of what we are to expect this session. If so, I must say that, so far from simplifying the mode of registration, that Bill has made registration so exceedingly difficult and complicated under the residential claim that some of my constituents would have to spend more to register a vote than would enable them to buy a piece of land and build a whare to qualify themselves as householders. They would have to ride 150 miles over the country each way—300 miles in all—beside a paying 2s. when they got to the registration office. If that is what is called a liberal measure, I must confess I have forsaken the Liberal party altogether. I do not want any such liberal measures. The honorable member who seconded this Reply to the Speech gave the House abundant proofs that we shall often hear him in this House, and hear him with a great deal of pleasure. At the same time, he exhibited a great deal more of the combative spirit than was exhibited by the honorable member for Christchurch City; and, singular to say, he will always have to remember that his first blow in this House was struck at the wrong man—he knocked the wrong man down. He began by asserting very vehemently that it was idle to deny that the great liberal measures have been before the country, and have been decided upon favourably by the country. That is just what no one does deny; on the contrary, we complain that measures about which there was no difference of opinion in this House were dangled before the country to hide the real question at issue. What we complain of is, that the question whether these gentlemen were qualified, whether they were competent, whether they were capable, whether they were honest enough to hold those seats and administer the government of the country, was the proper question to go to the country. But they chose to say, "We are the advocates of liberal measures, and those other fellows are the advocates of anything but liberal measures—they are tyrants and Conservatives;" when the real fact was, that the House had carried those measures—either carried them or pressed them upon the Government. It was the Premier who resisted them and prevented them becoming the law of the country, although he had the audacity to go to the country and say not one word about the incapacity or mismanagement he had shown in his conduct of the business of the country—which was the real ground on which his Government was condemned—but simply boast about liberal measures, which the House was far more anxious to pass than he was. I hope the honorable member for Auckland City West did not intend to speak in the slighting manner in which he did about the Native disturbances. He spoke about men of the same family, all dark-skinned, killing one another as if it was of no consequence. I am sure he did not mean to insinuate anything of the kind. Whatever may be said about the position the Government has placed us in, the House will unanimously deplore, without any consideration of party questions, that such things should be taking place among any race in this country—that the Government should be in the position of being unable to say that life and property, whether Native or otherwise, shall be secure by the law of the land. There was one remark made by the honorable member that gives me great hopes of him for the future, although undoubtedly it was the weakest part of his speech, and that was the remark in which he told us, with a great deal of guileless simplicity, that the Premier had assured him confidentially that he wanted nothing but what was right. I am sure there is not a young Greyite in this House who has not been assured the same thing in the most confidential manner by the Premier. It is little more than twelve months ago since another gentleman came into the House, and seconded the Address in Reply, who said much the same thing. When he came into the House he really believed in good faith that the Premier was fighting with some great squatters, land speculators, or land-sharks in the House; but, after spending one session here, he began to find that these land-sharks and squatters were not in existence here. He began to see that the Government were very much more fond of dangle liberal measures before the House and the country than of making them law; and, after spending, as I said, one session in the House—after having convinced himself that he could not expect from the Government what in his younger and more sanguine days he had expected—I find him thus speaking to his constituents, or, rather, to those who have rejected him on account of his following out his convictions. I may say I believe that every one who heard the two speeches—that is, the speeches of the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply last year—immediately came to the conclusion that the proposer was a member who would follow his party, while the seconder was one who would follow his conscience. I believe they both followed in their own ways until they got on opposite benches; and, when honorable gentlemen who come here are disposed to follow their consciences, they will be very liable to get into the same position that Mr. Hobbs got into so readily. Mr. Hobbs says, after an experience of one session,—

"Why am I such a marked man? I will tell you why it is. Sir George Grey and Mr. Sheehan did not want me there to look into Native affairs. There was never such a thing heard of before as a Premier and two of his henchmen going into another electorate to oppose a man who had dared to be honest. I had only drawn the curtain a little bit aside—just a very little bit aside—and they saw the noise it had created. It is a wonder to me that the people have stood it so long. How the country submits to be fooled is a matter of astonishment to me. I am sure you will soon find out that Greyism is not liberalism—that setting labour against capital is not liberalism. You will yet find out that Sir George Grey's professions of liberalism are not very sincere. If they had been, he had an opportunity of carrying them a year ago. The House was favourable, but the Government was not. I am quite confident that the time is not far distant when the Grey delusion and snare will be exploded."

I do not say it in any disparagement of gentlemen on the other side—for no one has a greater respect for the young Greyites than I have—but there is something about the Greyites introduced to this House which puts me in mind of the young greyhounds lately introduced into Canterbury. The owners of these dogs have found that, when they are allowed in the field after the hare too often, they cease to take all the turns and bends they should do. They do not follow the hare round all the corners and turnings; they take to "running cunning." Now, I have noticed that when these young Greyites have seen Sir George Grey only once in three or four years, and have only heard once that set stock speech against the land-sharks and landowners, and so on, they are prepared to follow him implicitly, to take all the bends and turns through which he would lead them; but, when they come into the House, and when they hear the Premier day after day, see him day after day, when they see the course he takes in this House, and the companions he chooses for his support and surroundings, by some means they soon begin to run cunning. They run on their own account; they may choose devious ways of their own, but they do not follow him. Those who are disposed in the same direction may take a course of their own, while others, who are of a different opinion, take a course widely divergent from that of the Premier. I have been thinking that, after what has been said about the representation of the colony, a more simple answer could be given than that given by the leader of the Opposition to the remark made by the honorable member for Auckland City West (Mr. Hurst) in reference to representation on the basis of population. He spoke in a manner that was calculated to pain my feelings about the contemptible number of the constituents in my district; but if he had mixed up my constituents with those of Christchurch, the result would have been that the whole number of the candidates returned by Christchurch would have been anti-Greyites. The gentleman who opposed me certainly was not a Greyite, because the Premier and his Colonial

Mr. Saunders

Secretary knew that a Greyite would have stood no chance in the district; so that if my district had been tacked on to Christchurch the result would have been that no Greyite would have been returned for Christchurch. That effectually answers the objection. With regard to these young recruits, before I leave them I might say Napoleon used to speak of his recruits as "food for cannon," but Sir George Grey probably calls his recruits "food for gammon," though perhaps they are not so much "food for gammon" as the "produce of gammon." But they dissolve away as soon as they become exposed to the searching light of truths and facts which they are exposed to in this House, and thus he will require a large constant supply of recruits if he is to keep up anything like a working majority in the House. When the Premier began to-night he told us he had expected a different speech from that which he had heard from the leader of the Opposition. I have no doubt the wish was father to the thought—that he would have liked to have heard a different speech from the one he heard from the leader of the Opposition. I can say that I never in my life heard an hour and a half better spent. There was not the waste of a minute or a word. The whole of the speech was to the point. It was upon a subject upon which the honorable member had a right to speak and to which the House had a right to listen. It was as strong and condemnatory an array of unanswerable facts as was ever stated in any Legislative Assembly in the world. It may suit the Hon. the Premier to speak of the charges made in that speech as contemptible. Compared with Babylon, Europe, and many other places, New Zealand may be a very contemptible place; but, contemptible or not contemptible, New Zealand is the question which we have to discuss here. New Zealand is the subject we have to take into consideration when we are asked whether men are fit to sit on those benches or not. It may be sore to the feelings of men or communities to hear such facts as were brought forward to-night, but our duty is, not to discuss matters that do not immediately affect us, but to take into consideration such questions as have been submitted to this House by the leader of the Opposition to-night. Sir, in the very small part of the Premier's speech which was devoted to any answer, or anything that could be called an answer, it was remarkable that he seemed to expect that in replying to the facts which had been related with so much veracity, so much detail, and in such a manner that no one could say that if they were untrue they could not be easily answered—it is remarkable that the Premier expected us to take his mere assertion that such things were not true, without any proof whatever. Upon the question of the management of the lunatic asylums, what could have been easier than for the Premier to have pointed out what he had done for those asylums, what attention he had paid to them, and what funds he had devoted to them? Does he expect this House to take his answer to the charges brought by the leader of the Opposition, that they were not true, when he cannot put his finger on a single thing he has done, or cannot prove to this House in any way whatever that he has not been guilty of the neglect with which he has been charged? Now, there is one subject which I am glad the Hon. the Premier has brought before us. I had hoped that the young Greyites who spoke before him would have referred to it, but they did not do so; and it has been left to the leader of the Government to talk as he invariably does talk on the subject of the Canterbury gridironing. That subject has often come before the House, and I have taken the pains to make a good deal of inquiry to ascertain what are the real facts of this charge of gridironing. I say that I came to it without any prejudices. No one will charge me with having gridironed, or bought land. I have never been in the Canterbury Land Office in my life, nor ever bought an acre of land there. I have been inclined to take the part of those who have condemned this system of gridironing, and, like the honorable member for Avon, the late Superintendent of Canterbury, I have done everything in my power to render it impossible for any man to adopt a practice that I consider would be injurious to the country in the purchase of land. But I do not know that I should be in a position to condemn any man who purchased in such a way as to give him a chance of obtaining an offer of other land when he felt that he would be in a position to purchase it. I say it is very desirable indeed that the Government should take every step in their power—and I am sure those who know me will know that I have done so—to prevent any person acquiring land in any way of that kind; but, at the same time, I do not look upon it as a criminal charge to be brought against any man that, when he had an opportunity of securing as much as he could for himself in an honest way, he did it. I am quite certain that there are very few tradesmen in this House—and I am glad to say that there are a great many tradesmen here—who, if they had an opportunity to take a contract in such a way as would secure to them that, when they had finished that contract, they must have the offer of the next, would not take such an opportunity; and they would think they were no great criminals for doing it. But, notwithstanding what I have said in justification of this, I find, on inquiry, that the quantity of land which has been gridironed in Canterbury has been so insignificant as to amount to little more than 2,000 acres in the whole—certainly not 5,000 acres—out of the hundreds of thousands of acres sold in Canterbury. Therefore I think the Canterbury run-holders, and the Canterbury people generally, should feel it a very high compliment that the Premier, in his desire to charge them with the gross malpractices which he is so anxious to fix upon them in this House, should have said so much, and said it so often, on what might truly be called a contemptible charge and a contemptible subject. I do not think it is necessary for me to say much to-night with regard to the "Hinemoa" steamer. What the Hon. the Premier has said to us on this subject may be correct or it may not. I do not suppose it is very important whether it is correct or is not; but I think, after all he has himself said on this subject, it is rather remarkable that he should take a course so vastly more extravagant than his predecessors ever dreamt of, and use a vessel which he so often said should be sold and taken out of the reach of Government employ—that he should use it more extensively than any other person has ever used it, and for purposes so questionable that I think no member of this House, to whatever party he may belong, can have failed to condemn such use. I do not believe that the members who sit in this House will for one moment submit to the Government, no matter to what party they belong, using the property of the public in such a way, and attempting with it to influence the free choice of the electors in the election of representatives to this House. The honorable member told us that the advertisements were very contemptible, and not likely to influence the high-toned papers that are now supporting the Government. Well, Sir, I am afraid that in New Zealand we must pay a great deal of attention to these contemptible things. The charges that were brought against the Government to-night, whatever they may be to all the world, are to New Zealand not contemptible; they are very important indeed. I think that, whilst we find that these advertisements are capable of producing such gross misrepresentation as they have produced throughout the length and breadth of this colony—whilst we find that the papers which have received these advertisements are prepared to hold up honest men as rogues, and hold up a thoroughly dishonest, rotten Government as sound and liberal, and entitled in itself to all the most endearing names that can possibly be conferred upon it by them—I think that, when we notice the ready manner in which some of these papers trim when there is a prospect of any change of Government, and are prepared to go round to the winning side, we may fairly believe that these contemptible advertisements have a very great effect upon the side which most of the papers of this colony will adopt. Now, I quite agree with what the Hon. the Premier has said with regard to the undesirableness of reading Financial Statements in this House. I was sorry to see the practice adopted when I came back to this House: it was not in existence when I was in the House in old times. I think, Sir, for this reason, it would be much better that Financial Statements should not be read. I can well understand that a much more elaborate, a much more correct, and a better Statement can be produced by either the Colonial Treasurer or the clerks in his office, and put before this House and before the country in writing; but I do think that this House is entitled to know, by the manner in which the Colonial Treasurer is able to talk finance, whether he understands anything about the subject himself or not. When we saw the exhibition which the present Colonial Treasurer himself made at that table—when we found that he had the figures before him, but was utterly incapable of answering a single question upon them—that he could not tell whether a certain sum of over £300,000 which had been sent to England was still available for use in the colony, I thought it was a very clear illustration that we could not depend very much upon a Treasurer who had no power whatever except that of bringing down figures prepared by his clerks. We could have done with a very simple, plain statement. We did not expect much. I am sure that no member of this House expects much from the Premier in that line. Facts and figures are not in his line at all. I am sure, little as we expect of him, none of us thought that the exhibition would have been such a complete failure as it was. When he knew that he was going to give us so little, it was not courteous of him to keep us hanging about here a week in expectation that we should get a Financial Statement. The time was short. But the Minister for Public Works had a much more difficult task to perform, I should imagine, than that of the Colonial Treasurer, with all the assistance of his clerks; yet that gentleman gave us a very respectable Statement, and one which, I believe, entirely satisfied this House. I do maintain that it was of infinitely more consequence that a statement with regard to our finances should be produced to this House, because, whilst we were sending Home a Loan Bill to the amount of £5,000,000, it was of the utmost importance that a statement should be made to the House in such a manner that those gentlemen in England who were likely to lend us the money should have some guarantee that the statement was true, and that it was one which was passed by the representatives of the people. Sir, the honorable gentleman talked about the squatters, and about their hunting him till he died; but it is a very remarkable fact that, some thirty or forty years ago, when the squatters were a great power in the colony, the Premier then was upon the best terms with them. He never said a word against them, but invariably appointed them to his own nominee Councils. He gave them land at such very low prices as to enable them to arrest the progress of the country by buying immense blocks, and thus shutting out the actual work of settlement of the best land in the colony. I find that these omnipotent squatters have now dwindled down to two. I find that there are actually, at the present moment, only two Crown runholders in this House, and that it is very safe to vilify them now as they have very few votes. I think we have no reason to complain of the constitution of this House, or the manner in which the different occupations of the colony are represented here. The only two parts of the community decidedly over-represented, I find, are the lawyers and the newspaper men. I am glad to say that we have twenty-two farmers, and we may, I trust, feel sure that their interests will be looked after, because, after all, their interests are the most important interests in the colony. Then we have no less than eleven lawyers. We have seven members whom I am obliged to call "gentlemen," for want of a better more distinctive name. We have seven newspaper editors, proprietors, and contributors. We have six merchants. We have five whom I will call "financiers"—connected with money-lending institutions and so on; and we have three large freeholders. We have two runholders, two manufacturers, two mining agents; and two pensioners—and they both sit on the Government benches. Of the fourteen others there are no two alike, so that, upon the whole, the different classes of the community are very fairly represented in this House. With regard to this Electoral Bill, we have heard the Premier speak of it some four or five times, and I do not know for what reason—whether his memory is failing, or from what other cause—there is a different reason assigned every time why that Bill was not allowed to pass. There is one very remarkable fact in connection with it, which, in the case of almost any other person except the Premier, would be damning to him, and that is that the Bill came back from the Upper House in exactly the same state, with regard to the Maori vote, as when it was introduced into this House. If there was anything so objectionable in that state, surely we have only the honorable gentleman himself to thank for it. Therefore I do not think it is worth while to say any more on that point. I would call it "contemptible" if the honorable gentleman did not himself use the word so much; but I think it is unworthy of any public man to quibble with regard to the meaning of that double vote. We know perfectly well what was meant by it. It is true the Maori dual or double vote existed before that Bill was introduced at all. The Maoris had their own special representation, and they also possessed the same power of qualifying themselves as Europeans have, and of voting for European representatives in this House. But what was proposed and resisted in this Electoral Bill was the giving power to vote on the communistic rights which every Maori has, and which would confer absolutely universal suffrage on them, in addition to their own special votes. Such a thing as that was not fair to the Europeans, and even the Natives themselves never desired it. It was a provision which, I am sure, there was not the slightest difficulty in objecting to and resisting; and yet that is the reason which the honorable gentleman has given us to-night for not passing the Bill. I may say that, on the last occasion on which the Premier spoke on this subject in my presence, he did not assign that at all as the reason. What he said then was, that it was thought such an act of insolence towards the House of Representatives for the Upper House to attempt to interfere in any way with an Electoral Bill sent to them that, if he had had his will, he would have had it torn to pieces on the floor of the House as an expression of the indignation of the House of Commons against the House of Lords for taking such an audacious course as they then took. I have none of those feelings against the other Chamber. I have never supported, and perhaps I shall never support, a nominee Chamber; and I have frequently expressed my desire in this House that there should be some better mode of election than that now adopted, and I may say that, since I have seen the action of the Premier in that respect, I am more firmly fixed in my belief. But, apart from that, any person knowing the history of the legislation of this colony must feel thankful for some very wise interference on the part of the Upper Chamber with ill-considered measures passed by this House. The honorable gentleman gives, as a reason why he was justified in employing the Government steamers and in spending Government time and money in various ways in travelling through the country to influence the elections and the choice of his own judges, that he wishes to enlighten the electors, and that we wish to keep them in the dark. It is generally considered necessary, in order to enlighten persons, that they should hear both sides of a question. I never heard of persons being enlightened by only hearing one side, and no reply. I took care to test the matter when the Premier was in Christchurch, and I found that the electors only heard one side, no matter how glaringly untrue were the statements made; and no one was allowed to say a single word in reply, or to answer a single statement, although many at least of his statements were grossly misleading and untrue.

AN HON. MEMBER.—No.

MR. SAUNDERS.—The honorable gentleman says "No," but I will soon give him proof as to that. I may say that, in quoting anything which has been said by the Premier, that honorable gentleman is placed in a far more advantageous position than any other honorable member of this House in regard to quotations from his speeches. I quote from a paper friendly to the Government—a paper receiving Government advertisements, and supplied with a report taken by the private secretary of the Premier himself. Therefore there can be no objection to the quotation on that ground. You, Sir, will remember, and many old members of this House will remember, that, when the question of the honorarium came before the House last session, the honorable member for Newton (Mr. Swanson) proposed, first, that the £210 should be reduced to £50. The Committee divided, and the amendment was lost. It was afterwards proposed by the then honorable member for Riverton (Dr. Hodgkinson) that the sum should be reduced to £100. The Committee divided upon that question; and the Premier, without making any remark, left the House. The honorable member for Avon appealed to the Chairman of Committees to know if it was not necessary that the Premier should vote, under the circumstances, as he was in the House when the question was finally put. The Premier, on being sent for, came back, and the Chairman of Committees asked him if he had heard the question put for the last time; and he replied, "No; I was thinking of other things;" and took his seat. Then the honorable member for Avon stated that the honorable gentleman was there when the question was put, and the honorable member for Egmont said that, if that was all the excuse needed, most of us could say that we were thinking of something else at the time, and so the Standing Order would be inoperative. Upon that, Sir George Grey rose in this House, and said he had no objection to vote—he did not wish to avoid voting; and he voted for the larger sum. I am sure I am stating exactly what took place. And now, Sir, this is what Sir George Grey himself says. I may say that not only do I know that this quotation is not exaggerated, but I know it is considerably modified, and the statement I heard him make was more at variance with the circumstances that took place here than in this report. However, it is sufficient to show that, if the Government steamers are to be used for disseminating truth throughout the colony, both sides should be heard. This question was read by the chairman of his meeting at Christchurch:—

"When it was proposed last session to vote two hundred guineas for four weeks' work, did you, although leader of the House, walk out of the House and refuse to vote on the question?"

After the usual preliminary speech about every dear little child being brought up so as to qualify him to be a member of Parliament or a Premier, Sir George Grey says to the Christchurch electors, "I did not like the way in which it was brought forward." Now, as Sir George Grey was both Premier and Treasurer, I should like to know who was responsible for the manner and the amount! He both fixed the amount, and he brought it forward in the way he chose. The honorable gentleman continued,—

"I thought in my own mind two hundred guineas too much. That was my impression. But, on the other hand, I could not bring myself to vote against payment being made altogether. Under such circumstances, I did not vote at all, and I explained my reasons to the House."

That, Sir, is the kind of truth disseminated by the "Hinemoa." There was another thing stated at the same meeting which I think will rather shake the faith of the House as to the enlightenment given to the people by the Premier. It is with reference to the Canterbury funds. It will be remembered by old members of this House that when we came here in 1878 we found that the Government had what we called "trumped up" a claim against Canterbury, by which they got £227,000 from that district—£100,000 under the pretence of some debentures not having been properly signed, and partly because it was said that it was necessary to take the money to complete the survey of lands, or to correct them in some fanciful way. In fact, after taking all our assets, they trump up some fanciful liabilities to charge us with. I am sorry to say that, when we appealed against this course of conduct, the only member of the Cabinet representing Canterbury considered that it was quite justifiable. A Committee was appointed to inquire into the equity of this attempted robbery, and, although it consisted largely of Government supporters and gentlemen from other provinces, they all, with the exception of the Colonial Treasurer, were imbued with such a spirit of fairness that they said we should not be called upon to pay that money. The Government, however, had so large a majority in this House that the Canterbury members were obliged to submit to terms, and they had to take £55,000, instead of £127,000, which was held back from them for surveys. The £100,000 due to the province for Lyttelton Harbour debentures has never been paid yet, and this is what Sir George Grey said with regard to the latter: After speaking of the sums in the hands of Canterbury Road Boards, Sir George charms the electors of Christchurch with these words:—

"In addition to that, Canterbury has £100,000 due to it, for which ample provision is now made. I took care that that should be done, and at a time when I had no idea for a moment that I should be asked to represent Canterbury. I did it solely as Premier of the colony, from a sense of justice."

Such, Sir, is another specimen of the Premier's truth. And not one of these misstatements was allowed to be contradicted at these instructive meetings of the Premier's. We have been frequently told that the electors have been appealed to, and that they have decided in favour of the liberal measures of Sir George Grey. But that was not the question sent to the country; and in all the speeches Sir George Grey made to his constituents at Christchurch I may say that I never heard him appeal once to them on the real question at issue. He was constantly, as I have already stated, endeavouring to conceal the real question at issue; and he talked solely to them of the liberal measures which, I have already shown, this House was willing to pass by an overwhelming majority, but which he refused to grant when asked to do so. He never said one word to the Christchurch electors on the true question before them when he appealed to them against two men who had supported every one of these liberal measures—who voted for the Electoral Bill, for the Triennial Parliaments Bill, and who demanded from the Premier a redistribution of seats. And yet he and his party now pretend that he went there to settle the question whether the country approved of the liberal measures which those gentlemen opposed, and which he wished to be the law of the land; although exactly the reverse was the truth. He never said one word about the reason why he had increased the civil expenditure of the colony, why he had managed Native affairs in such a way that we had drifted from a state of profound peace and security with regard to both races, and had come, as he himself acknowledged, to a state in which it was only just possible to avert a war. He never told us why he had acted towards members of his Cabinet in such a way that no member of the House with any self-respect would sit in Cabinet with him. He never told us why he had driven one Treasurer from the position in which he was discharging his duty and protecting the finances of the colony to some extent, and why he had not been able to get another. Nor did he tell us why he was not able to present any decent Statement to this House, when he himself played the part of mock-Treasurer. He never told us why the five-million loan was sent home without any Financial Statement being made, and he never told the electors how much the colony was likely to lose by that omission. If we needed anything to prove that he cared nothing whatever about these liberal measures, and that his liberalism was a mere mockery to be dangled before the people of the country, I would refer to the telegram sent to the gentleman who was offered a bribe to become my opponent. He is a person who is avowedly opposed to these liberal measures. He does not believe in the extension of the franchise. He is opposed to triennial Parliaments; and he is opposed to a redistribution of seats, because in our electoral district we are in a very comfortable position. He is the last person in the colony who would support these liberal measures. I may be a very useless, and to the Premier I dare say I am not a very agreeable, member, but still I have consistently supported these measures for the last thirty-seven years; and, when the honorable gentleman offered some nice little billet to the gentleman who was opposed to me, he practically showed that he very much preferred a man who was decidedly not in favour of these liberal measures, so long as he would oppose me, as said by him. That was the issue put before the country. It was a great promise made. Nothing whatever was said, and no appeal was made by Sir George Grey, and no attempt made to really enlighten the people to whom he professed to appeal. Now, I will show the kind of enlightenment he gave to the people of Canterbury; how far the people will be improved, and how far the country is likely to be compensated for the expenditure that has been incurred. This is a sample of the speeches he made. I am still quoting from the same friendly newspaper, and from his Private Secretary's report:—

"I maintain that we shall do no injustice by letting those who have thus acquired land enjoy it during their lifetime, and then allowing a new generation to determine how it shall be dealt with. Why should those who have acquired great tracts of land to the wronging of existing people be allowed to perpetuate that wrong? I say the earth shall be used for the benefit of all, and not for a few wealthy families. This is what we should aim at—homes for all, farms for all who wish to have them. When you have done that, you will have raised men who will be temperate, who will really be devoted to their country, who will wish for no changes, because they will have all they desire, and who will make this country one of the happiest countries in the world, instead of a pauper population, which it will be unless you make the changes I ask."

That is the kind of enlightenment which the "Hinemoa" is to be employed to circulate throughout the country. I agree with these liberal measures, but I have a greater belief in the lines of Goldsmith,—

How small, of all that human hearts endure,
That part which laws or kings can cause or cure!

I believe that if the honorable gentleman succeeds in spreading discontent throughout the country,—if he succeeds in making the industrious, hard-working men of this colony believe that, in consequence of some measures which we are going to pass in this House, they can acquire comforts and competency, lands and property, without persevering in the old-fashioned methods of industry and self-denial,—so far from improving them he will do a great deal in the other direction. I said, in starting, that I never knew such a trumpety document to be introduced and supported by two such able men as the honorable gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address in Reply. The first portion I find fault with is the second paragraph, in which we are called upon to assert that the position of the colony is thoroughly sound. Now, as business men, who are sent here not to speculate, or mislead the country, or to make unsupported assertions, but actually to inquire for ourselves, we have no right to say that the position of the colony is sound, unless we have an opportunity of seeing whether it is sound or not. We have had no such opportunity. We have had many little indications which lead us to believe that the position of the colony is not sound. We were told by the late Colonial Treasurer—when there was a real Colonial Treasurer, who knew at least which clerk to go to for a decent Financial Statement—that, in order to meet the liabilities of the colony, it was necessary that a Beer Duty Bill and a Companies' Incomes Bill should be passed, and that £100,000 a year would have to be obtained from a land-tax. Now, we know that all these things have not come to pass, that there is no revenue from these sources, and that the manner in which we do meet the expenditure is by appropriating borrowed money for a large number of purposes for which borrowed money ought never to be appropriated: and that does not look as if the position of the colony is so thoroughly sound. The fourth paragraph appears to me to take upon itself an assertion which is not correct, but, as I have already spoken upon that subject, I will not enlarge upon it now. The sixth paragraph calls upon us to express the "opinion that these three measures are so equitable in themselves, and so accordant with the spirit of modern times, that, should they become law, there is every prospect that a feeling of general contentment would be permanently established in the colony." This is such absolute nonsense that I will not trouble the House with many remarks in regard to it; but I never was a good party man, and, although my leader to-night has allowed this paragraph to go by default, I must say that, if I had my way, I should have proposed the insertion of this paragraph in its place, as it would be much more in accordance with truth: "To remind His Excellency that, although his Responsible Advisers are now of opinion that these three measures are so equitable in themselves, and so accordant with the spirit of modern times, that, should they become law, there is every prospect that a feeling of general contentment would be permanently established in the colony, His Excellency's Advisers are alone responsible for their non-existence at the present moment. The first was passed with remarkable unanimity by both branches of the Legislature last year, and only consigned to the waste-paper basket by those who now act as your Excellency's Advisers; the second has on every opportunity been ably and consistently opposed by the gentleman who was last chosen as one of His Excellency's Council; and the third was resisted, on the 25th of September last year, by the recorded votes of the whole of His Excellency's Advisers who were then and are now present in this House." I will skip over all the other paragraphs, and come to the one referring to the railway to the West Coast. We all know that this paragraph emanates from the honorable gentleman who smiles as I speak of it—the Minister for Public Works. Instead of proceeding rapidly with the railway, as some of us flattered ourselves the Government would do, it is now proposed to appoint a Committee to make inquiry as to the best route, before any work is done. Then there is a very remarkable expression in the twelfth paragraph, which I am rather surprised the mover of the Address should have overlooked, especially as he is a Canterbury man. I can only suppose that the word "especially" has been used instead of the word "except." The clause says, "We desire to assure His Excellency that every proposal for the vigorous prosecution of public works, and especially proposals relating to works already authorized by Parliament, shall be considered with the utmost care." I should have thought that the works we should consider with the utmost care were those to come before us, and not those we have already decided upon. If we have done our duty we considered them well before we authorized them, and it would be rather remarkable to tell His Excellency that the works already authorized would be the ones which we would now so especially consider. Then there is another subject which has rather an interesting tale connected with it. We are asked to express our belief, "that it is desirable the question of how manufactures and local industries may best be encouraged should be taken into consideration." I would add to that, "but that it is also desirable that your Excellency's Advisers should make up their own minds and agree amongst themselves on this important practical question, before they attempt to lead this House." I have said that there was a remarkable tale connected with this matter. There is an association in Christchurch called the Protection Association, which appointed certain gentlemen to put certain questions to Sir George Grey, at his first election meeting in Christchurch, in order to ascertain his opinion upon the subject of protection versus free trade. But, instead of giving answers as to whether he was or was not in favour of protection, he made in reply a speech of ten minutes' duration; and the protectionists came to the conclusion that Sir George Grey was a protectionist, and the free-traders came to the conclusion that he was a free-trader. When the meeting of this Protection Society took place shortly after, they discussed the question as to which opinion Sir George Grey held. As one of the candidates whom he was trying to keep out was a free-trader, and the other a protectionist, they were anxious to know whether they should give their votes to Sir George Grey or not; so they appointed a deputation to wait upon Sir George Grey, and they appointed some clever shrewd men. They spent some time with him, and asked as many questions as they liked, and when they came back to the Association one said one thing and another another, until at last the Chairman said, "He must be a deal cleverer than I am who can tell what he means." They were so unable to judge, after all this, whether he was a protectionist or a free-trader, that they were obliged to come to the conclusion that they could not tell which Sir George Grey was, and that therefore every man must vote as he pleased. A book was kindly lent me by a member of this House in which I think I have found out where Sir George Grey gets his creed from, and his election speeches and election promises. It is rather amusing, and may be instructive to some members of this House, as it will give them guidance upon a subject on which I myself have very often erred. I will in conclusion read a verse or two from the candidate's letter in "The Biglow Papers." The House will understand that the candidate is in America, and is speaking of the great questions that were agitating the minds of American politicians at the time. He says,—

Es for the war, I go agin it,—
I mean to say, I kind o' du,— Thet is, I mean thet, bein' in it,
The best way wus to fight it thru;
Not but wut abstract war is horrid,
I sign to thet with all my heart;
But civilyzation doos git forrid
Sometimes upon a powder-cart.
Es to the slaves, there's no confusion
In my ideas consarnin' them.
I think they air an Institution,
A sort of—yes, jest so,—ahem!
Do I own any? Of my merit
On thet pint you yourself may jedge;
All is, I never drink no sperit,
Nor I haint never signed no pledge.
Es to my principles, I glory
In hev'in' nothin' o' the sort;
I aint a Wig, I aint a Tory,
I'm jest a candidate, in short.

But the last verse, from the postscript to this letter, is, I think, the most instructive, and it is the one which I believe the Premier has put into operation with the best effect. I think he has been specially using it with good effect upon the Chairman of the Liberal Association in Christchurch. It is as follows:—

Es we're a sort o' privateerin', O' course, you know, it's sheer an' sheer,
An' there is suttthin' wuth your hearin'
I'll mention in your privit ear;
Ef you get me inside the White House,
Your head wuth ile I'll kin' o' 'nint,
By gettin' you inside the Light-house
Down to the eend o' Jaalam Pint.

WINE MANUFACTURE.

Mr. GEORGE asked the Premier, If the Government will take into their consideration some method of encouraging the manufacture of wine in New Zealand? He put the question on the Paper because there were in this country a number of small settlers, with vineyards producing from fifty to sixty gallons of wine a year, who, under the present licensing law, were unable to sell their wine without taking out a license at very considerable expense. His object, therefore, was to induce the Government to introduce an Act which would enable these settlers to take out a license at a small fee, so that they might be encouraged to grow vines to a greater extent for the manufacture of wine, and eventually enable them to compete with the Australian Colonies.

Sir G. GREY said the question would be referred to a Special Committee which it was proposed to appoint to consider many other questions of a similar nature. The Government would also take the matter into their consideration, with the view of determining what could be done.

NELSON HARBOUR.

Mr. ACTON ADAMS asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether he will cause a report to be made upon the cost and best means of improving the entrance to Nelson Harbour, by the removal of the sunken rocks? The honorable gentleman was probably aware that the entrance to Nelson Harbour was very narrow, and was rendered still more narrow by the existence of these sunken rocks, which were dry at low water and ten feet below the surface at high water. For the information of the honorable gentleman he would refer him to a report upon the harbour prepared by the late Mr. Balfour, Colonial Marine Engineer, and sent to the Superintendent of Nelson in 1868. That gentleman said with reference to these rocks,—

"Two small but awkwardly-situated rocks exist in the fairway of the entrance, and these—the Fairway and the Buoy Rocks—should be removed as a preliminary to any other work."

And in the concluding paragraph he said,—

"I shall not attempt to estimate the cost of removing the Channel and Buoy Rocks, as it depends very greatly on the method adopted; but I would very strongly recommend that their removal be at once authorized, and have no doubt that the Provincial Engineer will do the work most successfully, and at a very moderate cost."

Though he (Mr. Acton Adams) had no special knowledge of the subject himself, he felt sure that the cost of this work would be very small indeed.

Mr. MACANDREW said that a survey of the entrance had already been ordered to be made.

NELSON PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. ACTON ADAMS asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether the Public Works Department have reported upon the resolution carried last session, on the 17th July last, and spoken to again on the 9th August last, to the effect that the administration of the public works in Nelson and the West Coast should be placed under the direction of the department in Wellington, instead of in Dunedin; and, if so, whether the Minister for Public Works has taken, or will shortly take, any steps to carry out that resolution? He had intimated to the honorable gentleman last session that this was a matter of some importance to the people of Nelson, and he trusted to hear that some steps had been taken, because, on the date indicated in the question—the 9th August last—the honorable gentleman said he would consult the officers of his department, and request them to report as to the desirability of the suggested alteration.

Mr. MACANDREW said there had been very little time since the prorogation to consider this or any other matter. Still, he had had several conversations with the head of the Public Works Department upon this question, and the result was that, all things considered, it was not deemed desirable at present to make any change in the existing arrangement, which was merely tentative, and had better not be disturbed just now. It would not be in the interests of the public service to do so, especially as the House would probably be asked to consider the suggestion he had frequently thrown out—namely, that there should be two responsible Public Works Ministers, one for each Island. That was the direction in which he considered administrative reform in this department should be effected. In the meantime, it would perhaps be as well to let matters remain as they were.

LIBRARIES.

Mr. ACTON ADAMS asked the Government, Whether the resolution of the honorable member for Motueka passed by this House last session—namely, "That, in the opinion of this House, all libraries in the colony receiving Government aid should be supplied with a copy of the Government Gazette, Hanard, Statutes, and all Parliamentary Papers, free of cost"—has been complied with? He was not aware whether the resolution had or had not been complied with, but so far as he could ascertain it had not, and he had had his attention repeatedly drawn to the absence of these Parliamentary Papers from the libraries in the district from whence he came. People complained that they were ignorant of what was passing in that House; and he now wished to know whether the Government would give effect to the resolution, and disseminate this necessary information amongst the people.

Sir G. GREY said that to carry out the resolution would entail very considerable expense upon the country. At the outset it would be at least £300 a year, and it would be a continually-augmenting expense. The sum of £300 would be placed upon the estimates for the present year, in order to raise a discussion upon the subject.

LICENSE FEES.

Mr. ACTON ADAMS asked the Government, If they will introduce a Bill this session to amend the existing Licensing Acts, so as to equalize the license fees throughout the colony? For the information of the Government he would read a short abstract of the license fees paid in the different provincial districts. Commencing in Auckland, the publicans paid £40. In Hawke's Bay, they paid £40 for a twelve-o'clock license, and £25 for a ten-o'clock license. In Wellington they paid £40 for a twelve-o'clock license, and £30 for a ten-o'clock license. In Nelson they paid £50 for a twelve-o'clock license, and £40 for an eleven-o'clock license. In Canterbury they paid £30 for a twelve-o'clock license; and in Otago £25 for a twelve-o'clock license, and £20 for a ten-o'clock license. The Government would see that the fees paid in the Provincial District of Nelson were exactly double those paid for similar privileges in Dunedin; and he asked the question because, if the Government were not prepared to introduce a Bill to amend the Licensing Act, and to equalize these fees, he would do so himself; but, before taking upon himself the responsibility of introducing a Bill affecting the general business of the country, he wished to know whether the Government would undertake it.

Sir G. GREY said he could not give a very complete answer to the question, because his colleague the Native Minister was absent from the House on important business; but he would remind the honorable gentleman that this question was involved in very great difficulty. These license fees formed part of the revenue of the local bodies, and it might be considered an arbitrary act to take away from these bodies revenue to which the law entitled them, without their being consulted. However, the Government would take the matter into their consideration.

AROHA BLOCK.

Mr. ORMOND asked the Minister of Lands, If he will lay before this House a return of lands sold in the Aroha Block (late Broomhall's), specifying the number of selections, and acreage, sold on deferred payments, and stating whether such lands are occupied? The question was one which was sure to occupy the attention of the House during the session, and he asked the honorable gentleman for this information with the view of ascertaining how far the block had been opened up in the manner indicated in the question.

Mr. THOMSON said the block had not yet been opened up for selection, nor was it intended to throw it open until it had been to some extent improved by the cutting of main drains and the partial formation of roads. The block had been in the hands of the Public Works Department for some time past, in order that these improvements might be effected. As soon as the works were well forward it was the intention of the Government to open up part of the block for sale on deferred payments, and part on immediate payments. The object was to encourage the location of as many small settlers as possible, holding from one hundred to three hundred acres of land.

TIMBER AND GRAIN EXPORTS AND IMPORTS.

Mr. BALLANCE asked the Government, if they will lay before this House comparative returns showing the exports and imports, foreign and coastwise, of timber and grain for the March, June, and September quarters of the calendar years 1878 and 1879?

Sir G. GREY said the Government would at once lay on the table the returns for the March quarter of the year 1878-79; those for the June quarter of 1878-79 would be speedily prepared; but those for the September quarter would take a very considerable time in preparation. Those latter returns would, however, be laid on the table as soon as possible.

BANK ACCOUNT.

Mr. BALLANCE asked the Colonial Treasurer, Whether there is any objection to lay before this House the letter from the bank giving notice of the termination of the agreement affecting the Public Account?

Sir G. GREY said the letter had already been laid on the table.

HARES IN NELSON.

Mr. RICHMOND asked the Government, Whether they will proclaim hares exempt from the schedule of the Protection of Animals Act in the Provincial District of Nelson? He had been requested to ask this question by his constituents, in whose district the hares had become so very numerous that they were a perfect nuisance, and were most destructive to the plantations and fruit-trees. One gentleman had told him that he estimated his loss this year from injury to fruit-trees and plantations at upwards of £300. Other gentlemen had equally suffered. The farmers also complained that they could not grow root crops, for in a few nights the whole of these were swept away. The consequence was, that the farmers had to take matters into their own hands, and destroy the hares whenever they got an opportunity. Of course, in doing so they were acting against the law, and found they rendered themselves liable to penalties. This they wished to avoid, and therefore asked him to bring the matter under the notice of the Government, in order that a Proclamation might be issued exempting hares from the Protection of Animals Act. He hoped the Government would take action in the matter as soon as possible.

Sir G. GREY said, if the Government understood that the honorable gentleman really expressed the views of a majority of the settlers, there would be no difficulty about issuing the necessary Proclamation.

GOVERNMENT STEAMERS.

Mr. DICK asked the Commissioner of Customs, What progress, if any, the Government have made in carrying out their resolution, as expressed in the Colonial Treasurer's Statement of 19th November, 1877—viz., "to sell one of the steam-vessels now the property of the Government"? He had seen that the Colonial Treasurer, shortly after the present Ministry came into office, had stated in his Financial Statement,—

"We propose to sell—not privately—one of the steam vessels now the property of the Government. The Public Accounts Committee report on the advisability of selling the 'Hinemoa,' but, before determining which boat to dispose of, we shall be guided by careful and sound advice from officers practically qualified to give it."

This was nearly two years ago, and he had no doubt the Government had had an opportunity of consulting their officers as to which vessel they should sell. He wished to know the result of that consultation, and whether the Government had done anything towards selling the steamers.

Sir G. GREY said it was found impossible to dispose of the "Hinemoa," because she was the only vessel belonging to the Government which could carry troops, or could be used on an occasion of emergency such as must often arise in a country like New Zealand. It would be difficult, almost impracticable, to dispose of the "Stella" at anything like a remunerative price, or anything which would at all repay the country for the outlay on the vessel. Further, it was found that, owing to the large number of lighthouses existing in New Zealand, and those continually in construction, it was impossible to dispense with the services of such a vessel. When the lighthouses now in course of construction were built, the matter would be considered again.

KAIAPOI NATIVE RESERVES.

Mr. TAINUI asked the Government, When they intend bringing into operation "The Kaiapoi Native Reserves Act, 1877"?

Sir G. GREY begged to inform the honorable gentleman that the Act was being brought into operation at the present time.

BALLOT.

Mr. HUTCHISON asked the Government, Whether they will amend the Ballot Act in the direction of dispensing with the numbers marked upon the ballot-papers by the Returning Officers?

Sir G. GREY replied that the question was under consideration. It was one of extreme difficulty. It had been found that the numbers were almost indispensable; but a system had been invented by which their use might be avoided. If they found that it could be successfully adopted, the Government would have it carried out.

LAND-TAX.

Mr. WAKEFIELD asked the Colonial Treasurer,—(1) Whether he is aware that the Land-Tax Commissioner is demanding payment of a whole year's land-tax on the 1st of October, though the 8th clause of "The Land-Tax Act, 1878," provides that the tax "shall be payable by equal half-yearly payments"? (2) Whether the Government intend to insist on payment of the tax for the whole year in one payment; and, if so, under what provision of the law they propose to take that step?

Sir G. GREY replied that it was found to be impossible to collect the tax for the first half-year on the 1st April. The work to be performed was so great that it could not be got through. Although the tax for the first half-year was not collected on the 1st April, it was then due, and there was no reason why it should not be collected now. The payers had not lost anything, because they had had the advantage of holding the money all this time. The other half-year's land-tax, about to be collected, was due properly upon the 1st October. It was therefore not the tax for the whole year, but the tax for two separate half-years that was being collected. This revenue was collected under the authority of clauses 8 and 9 of the Land-Tax Act.

HAMILTON RAILWAY BRIDGE.

Mr. WHYTE asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether the Government have entered into any contract for the construction of a railway bridge at Hamilton; and, if not, when they intend to do so? His reason for asking this question was, that he understood it would take two years to build a suitable bridge; and, as its construction was authorized the session before last, it was necessary that something should be done.

Mr. MACANDREW replied that no contract had been entered into as yet for the construction of this bridge, but it was intended to take the necessary action towards it so soon as they got the necessary appropriation. He believed it would be two years before the bridge could be procured from Home. It would be a very expensive bridge. As soon as the necessary funds were at the disposal of the Government, steps would be taken to put the work in hand.

HOKIANGA AND MONGONUI TELEGRAPH LINES.

Mr. TAWHAI asked the Commissioner of Telegraphs, If the Government will extend the telegraph line from Herd's Point, Hokianga, to Pakia, at the mouth of the river; also, if they will extend the line from Mongonui Station to Kaitain?

Mr. FISHER replied that inquiry would be made into this matter, which required consideration. He was not prepared to give a decided answer at the moment.

KAWAKAWA-TAHEKE RAILWAY.

Mr. TAWHAI asked the Minister for Public Works, If the Government have received any petition or petitions from Europeans and Natives praying for the construction of a railway from Te Kawakawa, Bay of Islands, to Te Taheke, Hokianga?

Mr. MACANDREW understood that applications had been made on the subject verbally, but no formal petition had been received.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Mr. SPEIGHT.—Mr. Speaker, I apprehend that the usual course, as a matter of form, is for a new member to claim the consideration of the House. I have been but a very short time in the House, but it appears to me that the consideration which is usually granted is of such a character that I do not desire to claim it at the present time. The consideration I have seen shown has been of this kind: Pay all the attention you can to him, and then tear his speech to pieces as completely as possible. For that consideration I am not going to ask the House. I am as much prepared to take my chance as any other member of this branch of the Legislature, trusting that the insignificance of the member may perhaps permit me to be passed by without that scathing attack which sometimes takes place upon the utterances of new members. I do not know that there is any particular reason for making this statement, except the manner in which the honorable member for Auckland City West was treated yesterday. The honorable member who followed him deserved the highest credit with regard to civility and mode of address, and yet the honorable the seconder of the Address in Reply was taken to pieces in a most unmerciful manner. Therefore I shall not waste any moments by asking consideration at the hands of honorable members, but shall proceed at once to put very shortly before honorable members the views I entertain on the subject now under consideration. Before entering into the matter under discussion, I wish to state that, having, in another capacity, watched the debate of last session upon a similar motion—a motion of which, I apprehend, this is but the outcome—it gives me pleasurable feelings, as a new member, to observe that the tone of debate in the House has considerably altered from that time. It gives one greater confidence to believe that, whatever may be brought forward by any honorable member, it will at least be treated with that courtesy with which an honorable member should be treated. I may say that, from my reading of Hansard and my attendance here in another capacity, my feelings with respect to the character of the proceedings of last session were not at all what they now are. I congratulate the House, and the honorable gentleman who we may assume is the leader of the Opposition, on this very desirable change that has taken place, as it will give such a tone to future discussion as we should not have had under other circumstances. I also think that the very large amount of courtesies that have been exchanged by honorable members of both sides of the House will have a good effect, and that these courtesies will be continued to the end, if no rash man steps in and disturbs the harmony which should characterize our deliberations. I shall endeavour, in the observations I wish to make, to follow the excellent example which has been thrown out by the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government and the leader of the Opposition, and I shall to the fullest extent endeavour to emulate that example. But, whilst I say this with regard to the honorable the leader of the Opposition, I must also say that, having listened to his speech with a great deal of attention, and having made myself acquainted with a few of that honorable gentleman's antecedents, I was grievously disappointed with the address which he delivered last night. I was prepared, as one of those young "greyhounds" who have recently been let loose from the kennel elsewhere, for such an indictment against the constituted Government, and against the men who have been members of the Government for the past two years, as would have fairly taken my breath away. I am not going to do what the honorable member for Cheviot seems inclined to invite all those young greyhounds to do—desert my party; but I am going to say that honestly and truthfully I do believe that I could frame a better bill of indictment against the Government than the honorable members of the Opposition have done. I believe I could frame a stronger bill of indictment against the Government than they have done; but there is this much to be said about it: that, even if that bill of indictment which I might frame were added to the indictment that those honorable gentlemen have brought forward, I do not think that the two combined would be a justification for the amendment which has been moved by the leader of the Opposition. It appears to me that one of the easiest things in existence is for honorable gentlemen who sit in opposition, with no care, no responsibility with regard to the government of the colony at all proportionate to the responsibility of Ministers—I say nothing is more easy, in my mind, than to pile up one count upon another, until one would think the members of the Government were the veriest rascals who could occupy those benches. Nothing is more easy, in the hands of skilful men, in the hands of men who make this kind of tactics their life-long study, in the hands of gentlemen whom I see in the ranks of the Opposition at this moment, who, I believe, from a perusal of their antecedents and their utterances, and their public and private doings, can at a few hours' notice attack any Government from whatever side of the House it may be necessary for them to make the attack. Therefore I do not think, as a fact, that the honorable members of the Opposition who have already spoken have brought any charges against the Government of a character sufficient to justify the amendment which has been moved by the honorable member for Selwyn. I do not think that those charges combined are a sufficient justification for the amendment that has been moved on this occasion. Now, Sir, I will take a few of the things which the leader of the Opposition introduced in the course of his speech last evening; and I do so with the greatest deference, not only to this House, but to the honorable member himself. Before proceeding to do so, allow me to say that, whilst I have firm convictions on questions that have agitated and still are agitating the public mind, those are not ideas taken up for party purposes, but honest, genuine convictions; and therefore, when I find a gentleman of the character of the leader of the Opposition, in his place in this House, take such grounds as he has taken in this matter, it shakes very much that desire which I had to listen attentively to what he and other members of the Opposition had to say, and tells me that I should endeavour to give shape to my own resolutions and convictions. I am not, and will not be, under any circumstances, a supporter of any Government of whose actions I cannot approve; but, at the same time, I do think it incumbent upon the members of the Opposition to show a reason for the course they have adopted on this occasion—a reason which will be satisfactory, not to the gentlemen who sit behind them on those benches, and who are prepared to echo every sentiment they utter, be it right or wrong, but a reason which will be satisfactory to the country, and which should carry conviction to the hearts of the people whenever they hear the grounds brought forward. These are the reasons why we young greyhounds are anxious to know what is the justification for the amendment which has been moved to this Address; for, if no better justification is given than what has already been adduced by the leader of the Opposition and the honorable member for Cheviot, I do not think it will influence any of us in the vote we shall give on this occasion. I do hope, further, that some of those young members I see around me will not allow themselves to be caught in the meshes that are being spread for them by persons who have got more designing methods of work than we have. The country has committed to us certain sacred trusts, and we are responsible to the people for our conduct; and, if we are led into an opposite camp to that to which we should adhere, there will be a retribution that will astonish some of us one of these days. For these reasons, I think that the honorable gentleman who introduced this amendment on the Address has not gone sufficiently deep into the matter. I have not taken his subjects in the order in which they were brought forward by the honorable gentleman, but have arranged them to suit my own convenience. I will take, first, that subject which I think, notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary by many gentlemen both in and out of the House, is of almost primary consequence—the state of the finances. Now, I thought that on that subject at least we should have heard such an exposure as would have been a complete crusher to the Government. I thought that on that subject at least the honorable gentlemen on that side of the House were such perfect masters that they had only to place certain documents in the hands of their leader to enable him to bring forward such an indictment as would have been perfectly irresistible. But what do we find? That the whole charges brought forward in the matter of finance amount to this: The leader of the Opposition says that a certain course should have been proposed. The honorable gentleman in power says that a wrong course had been pursued for years, and that he is anxious to bring this Chamber back to the proper course, and therefore does not insert a Statement in Hansard which the leader of the Opposition says usually appears there. I take it, from the tenor of the remarks of the honorable member for Selwyn, and from the way in which these remarks were given expression to, that he means to assert that that Statement was designedly kept out of Hansard to mislead the country and the Opposition. The Hon. the Premier denies such an inference. I can only say that, whatever the practice of other honorable gentlemen may be, my practice for the future will be this: that, if any other honorable gentleman makes a statement, I will believe him. The Minister states distinctly his reason for the course which he took—a reason which commends itself to the House—and I say we have no right to find fault with him. I think the Premier is completely acquitted from any charge of attempting to mislead the House and the people. The only other matter in relation to money which the honorable gentleman introduced is this: He said that the economy in the public departments promised to be practised by the new Government—then a Government of promises—had not been so practised. He said that the Government, through the lips of the Premier, promised to make certain reductions in the Civil Service, and that in departmental work deductions would be made amounting to a considerable saving. Well, Sir, those of us who were not members of this House during the time the great contest took place—the abolition of the provinces—can afford to start clear. We have no connection with either of those parties on this subject. But, whether or not the abolition of the provinces was a wise act—whether or not it was essentially a necessary act—this I always did firmly believe: that one of the immediate results of that measure would be that the work to be transacted by the central Government must be immensely increased, and that on the floor of this House would be brought petitions bearing on the most trivial subjects, that ought to be settled by Road Boards, or County or Borough Councils. And the immediate effect—and an effect well and clearly pointed out by those honorable members who opposed Abolition—has been to swamp this House with a lot of petty legislation, which would not have been necessary if the people had been allowed to maintain provincial institutions. I say that, under these circumstances, it seems to me unjust—and it seems to me designedly unjust—to get up and charge this Government, or any other Government, with having increased the expenditure of the country. I say such an increase was inevitable; and, if the Premier goes out of power and the honorable member for Selwyn takes his place, he may make no promises with regard to retrenchment; but this may be safely said: that he must continue to heap on appointment after appointment, in order to overtake the public work; and that cannot be done without money. I take it for granted that the abolition of the provinces is the fruitful source of the large expenditure of money, which would not have taken place under different circumstances—the retention of the provinces. I am not going to touch on all the subjects which the honorable leader of the Opposition introduced in the course of his speech; but the next I will take is that referring to Native matters. I am aware that Native matters are to certain gentlemen the great bugbear of colonial politics—that it is a matter we must get rid of in some way or other. The other day I heard one or two gentlemen who came from the northern part of the colony say that all this difficulty might be got rid of at once if Native matters were altogether managed by the North. But I apprehend that, from a southern point of view, that would not do. However, I honestly believe that, if the Northern men had charge of Native affairs, they would be much less troublesome than they are at the present time. I also firmly believe that, if in the matter of the administration of Native affairs less interference took place with the action of the Government in power for the time being, Native management would be much more satisfactory. It is unfortunately too true that, however much we may plume ourselves upon our patriotism, whenever a Minister is engaged in delicate negotiations in regard to Native matters—negotiations which may be wearing-out a Minister—it is invariably found that there are men of the opposite side in politics interfering with the progress of those negotiations. I ask, why is that? Is it because these men think the proper course is not being adopted by the Ministry in power? Not a bit of it. The object is simply to thwart the Native Minister who may be in office for the time being, and, for party purposes, to make him appear ridiculous in the eyes of the Natives. Now, that is not an object creditable to us. It is unnecessary that I should go into details to prove that this is the case. It is a fact within the knowledge of many honorable gentlemen on the opposite side of this House who are about to vote against the Government, because of their Native policy, on the motion we are now considering. Considering these circumstances, and considering that Native negotiations are at all times very difficult and troublesome, would it be a matter of wonder if Native Ministers failed to accomplish their objects? There is one particular section of the Native troubles to which I should like specially to refer—that is the Thames trouble. In that case a party of surveyors, with their assistants, were fired at, and one man was wounded. I am not going into the details which led up to that occurrence. I will only take the fact as it occurred. When that incident transpired, immediately we have wired all over the colony—what?—That a slight trouble had taken place? Not a bit of it; but a statement that there was an absolute rebellion of the Native tribes in the district where this occurrence took place. To read some of the Southern papers, one would think that every available man would be required to buckle on his armour and rush away to the Thames in order to resent this great outrage.

But what, after all, did the thing amount to? The honorable member for Auckland City West, who seconded the Address, put a good deal of the truth before the House with regard to the commencement of the matter. What I want to look at is, whether there is really any significance in the matter or not. Here is the position: A number of persons in this colony think that, when any breach of the law is committed, it should be immediately followed up by swift and distinct punishment, backed up by force of arms. A number of honorable gentlemen think that in this case the law should have been at once set in motion and rigorously and swiftly followed up, so that these men should have been captured. Now I am of a different opinion. This outrage possessed no tribal significance—that is to say, the tribe did not sympathize with the men who committed the outrage; but there is this feature about the matter: that, if you attempt to go up into that country where the Native disturbance occurred and to apprehend these men by force of arms—which gentlemen from the South think ought to be done in order to the maintenance of order—that moment you would arouse the ill-feeling of the whole tribe. Let us understand the real significance of that in the present case. I have seen documents relating to the action of the Native Minister in this case in which he has been blamed because the law has not been enforced—because an armed force has not been sent up there. Now there are some present before me on the Opposition benches who have gone over the ground, and I fearlessly ask any of these gentlemen this question: Supposing that these two persons who were implicated in this outrage allied themselves to some fourteen or fifteen persons—which was about the number of their adherents at that particular time—and you had sent the strong force then available at the Thames to capture them, what would have been the result? I do not mean to say that the Natives are capable of beating us in fighting—the time has gone by for that; but this I say: A wilful sacrifice of a dozen lives at least must have taken place before those two men could have been captured; and, under these circumstances, I think it is the fools who “rush in where angels fear to tread” who would complain that force was not used. It appears to me that the proposition made by the Native Minister at the time indicated the correct action to take under the circumstances. I may say I have never spoken to the Native Minister upon this subject in my life. I know nothing of what his opinions are, except by his public utterances; but I say this: that the course he took regarding that matter immediately commended itself to my judgment; and I think it would commend itself to all persons desirous of taking an impartial view of the occurrence. And what did he do? He said he would hold the whole tribe responsible for the action of these men, and that, if they were not given up, he would take the land of the tribe to which they belonged. If that were done, what would be the effect? I honestly believe the result would be something of this nature: that the tribe, rather than lose their land, would give up the prisoners. But, suppose that were not the result, is there a single member of this House so far forgetful of the interests of the country and the lives of the people who would necessarily suffer in a contest, as to say that it is worth our while to sacrifice certainly a dozen or fourteen European lives in order to arrest these two men? I do not think there is one who, in a serious, thoughtful moment, would say so. But I do know there are some men in the country who think the sufferings of other men are nothing—who are quite willing to see other men shed their blood, but who, when it comes to shedding their own blood or facing danger themselves, become aware that it is altogether another matter; men who, while it was purely a matter of sending the Thames Constabulary or the Thames Volunteers up to the scene of the outrage, think it a clear case they should be sent, but who, if men had to be sent from Taranaki headed by the honorable member opposite, would regard it from a different and more correct point of view. No man looks at a matter so clearly as he who has to engage in it; and, while there were to be found at the Thames men as brave as the colony could produce—men prepared to sacrifice everything, to do and to dare anything, for the good of the colony—still it would have been unwise to call upon them for this sacrifice without absolute necessity. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that the Native Minister took the right course. Under these circumstances, I do not think Native affairs are being handled so very badly, after all; and I apprehend, before this Thames affair is settled, the House will unanimously concur—if not by a regularly formal vote, certainly by acquiescence—that the course pursued by the Native Minister was the only course he could follow as a man who valued the lives of his fellow-settlers, and who knew that the credit of the colony would be shaken if anything in the nature of a conflict were to take place. I will waste very little more of the time of the House with respect to Native matters, because I think there is a general agreement of opinion that, whatever faults the Native Minister may possess, his management of Native affairs is not open to the reproach some people attempt to cast upon it. I will only say, further, with regard to this particular matter, that in my opinion the land on which this disturbance occurred could be most advantageously occupied by armed settlers. If it has been decided that the land shall be taken as a penalty for this offence, it might well be occupied by a band of armed men, and for this reason: that, through that same ground, or very close to it, there has been a road in dispute for a considerable period past. Let that road be pushed on. I do not mean that immediately the land is taken it should be occupied as I have described; but let it be gradually taken up in this way, and it will have a quietening effect upon the Natives themselves. With regard to Native matters generally, the honorable gentleman at the head of the Opposition suggests that one of the faults of the Native Minister has been that he has not availed himself sufficiently of the services of the Native chiefs. On the other hand, he also complains that the vote for expenditure in the Native Department has been exceeded. I am not going to say anything derogatory to the chiefs of the Native people; but the chiefs of the Native people are like the chiefs of the people of any other colour—they like to be paid for their services; and, if you want to take the Native chiefs into your confidence and to get their help, you will have to pay them for it. I apprehend the idea is to make these Native chiefs assessors; but that has been done to a large extent, and it should be borne in mind it must mean a further expenditure in Native matters, so that it is inconsistent to recommend getting the assistance of Native chiefs, and then to complain that the limit of expenditure has been exceeded in consequence of that having been done. The next thing I will allude to is a very difficult matter indeed. It relates to the great Fourth Estate—the Press. I think nothing could be more derogatory to the character of the Ministry, to the character of the House, or to the character of the colonial Press itself, than to say that the Press is capable of being bribed. It is evident that the Press in this colony exercises a far greater influence, whether for weal or for woe, than does the Press in older countries. To a great extent people in this colony never think for themselves. They put it out to be done for them; and very well done it is, in some instances. Often the advice tendered by the Press is really of a very sound character, well worth following and acting up to, though there is sometimes advice given of an opposite description, and I suppose it depends very much upon the stand we take with reference to the advice whether we consider it good or bad. However, what I wish to say is this: that it does not appear very complimentary to the Press, or complimentary to that large section of the members of this House who are supposed to belong to the Press-gang, to suppose that a paltry Government advertisement will have the effect of changing the tenor of their articles either one way or the other. But if it be true, then I mourn for the Press that could do such things, and I mourn for the Government that could tempt the Press to do those things. But I say that there is no truth in those accusations. There may be some little truth in some very small cases, but, taking the large bulk of the New Zealand Press, there is not one word of truth in the accusation that it could be guilty of such conduct. The Press is well represented in this House now, and I hope such statements will not be allowed to pass unchallenged by the representatives of the Press. But what, after all, is the amount of these Government advertisements? I think, in one case, there has been a large sum mentioned, but not a single word has been said as to the very small character of the Government advertisements in the many other cases. It appears to me—indeed, I am quite certain it is the fact—that each local Road Board, each Borough Council, or County Council, has far more patronage in this way, in its own particular locality, than has the whole great General Government of the colony. Then, again, there are all the tradesmen to be found in all the different centres of population, who give a great deal to the papers in the way of advertisements. Does it follow that the newspaper must immediately abandon its own principles and adopt the colour of the tradesmen who patronize it? Not at all. A mutual advantage is interchanged, and payment is given to the newspaper for the advantage the tradesman receives in the shape of the publicity given by the advertisement. If, however, in the case of these Government advertisements, the honorable gentleman proves that it is different, then he will have done good service to the colony; but, until he has given us that proof, I do not think we are called upon to accept his mere statement. The proposal I would make is this: It has been stated that one newspaper is so very patriotic, and so mindful of the interests of its readers, as to put in, at times, a whole column of Government advertisements for nothing. But to my mind it is clear that the reason why it does so is because it really pays,—because the class of readers who take in that paper require that those advertisements should be there. I would, then, suggest that the Government should pay no newspapers for advertisements, but place at their disposal particulars with regard to railways and public works to be constructed, and other matters of public interest, and let the newspapers publish them if they like. The people would then very soon learn to patronize those papers which published the advertisements. That, I think, is the way to get out of the difficulty—to cut the Gordian knot, and to put a stop to all the talk about undue influence of the Press. Some honorable gentlemen laugh, but it seems to me that, however laughable the proposition may appear to them, there is a modicum of sense at the bottom.

AN HON. MEMBER.—Put them in the Government Gazette.

MR. SPEIGHT.—I am afraid that is too exclusive a publication, and is seen by so very few people that it would not be of much use to take that course; but I think that, if the plan I propose were adopted, we should very soon get rid of these accusations. The next charge made is that of Government electioneering interference. This House, no doubt, has a very high standard of morality, and long may it retain that standard; but, however high its standard in this respect may be, it is well to look matters in the face, and consider them according to the varying circumstances of the time. Is there a single member of the Opposition, who inveigh so loudly against Government intervention at elections, who will tell me that were they in power they would not use that power to the fullest extent to turn the elections? I think not. The honorable gentleman who formerly led the Opposition in this House fully recognized the truthfulness of that position, because I commit no breach of confidence when I say that one of the great desires that honorable gentleman had to see the Government turned out of power when the last vote of want of confidence was carried, was expressed in some such words as these: "Am I going to let those gentlemen stop in office and use their weight as a Government in the elections?" These are facts which I am stating with regard to that particular gentleman. He saw at once that whoever was in power had an immense advantage; and it is in the very nature of things that it should be so. Unfortunately, there are to be found in every country—and in this country as elsewhere—persons who worship the rising sun. If they think a Government will hold its own, they worship it. If they think the Government is going out, they will turn to the rising luminary. And this is not confined to persons outside this House. There are, inside these walls as outside them, doubtful people, cautious people, timid people, who like to see where the sun rises, so as to get within the effulgence of its rays. The chief charge against the Government in regard to this election intervention is that they used the Government steamers for that purpose. On that I may say nothing. The Premier has told us that he did so—he thought it was right—and that he would do so again to-morrow. I say, “More power to him; let him do so;” but at the same time let it be understood that there are other things to be looked after as well as elections at these particular times.—(Laughter.)—Before the honorable gentleman gives an incredulous laugh, let me tell him that, when he states that when the Premier went to Auckland he went there specially for the purpose of assisting a supporter in his election, such a statement is not in accordance with facts. The real truth is this: that, long prior to the election, steps were taken by those whom the honorable member for Cheviot has been pleased to call “greyhounds” to get the Premier to address that supporter’s constituents. It was afterwards announced that a gentleman holding the high position in this colony that Mr. Whitaker did was going to descend from the high pedestal on which he stood both as a legislator and a lawyer, in order to pit himself against one whom he supposed to be the weakest man of the opposite party. He was supposed to be the weakest man—but supposition and facts are often very different things. They sent their strong man armed to rout this puny boy; but, long before that was arranged, it was settled that the Premier should address his constituents, as I believe all members elected to this House should do. I have personal knowledge of the fact that it was so arranged; and therefore it is not right, fair, or truthful to say that the Premier went north to assist in the Eden election. The honorable gentleman who was elected for that district was quite able to take care of himself without that assistance. It needed only the fatal mistake made on the part of the Opposition, who thought they were going to clutch certain seats, and who sent such a man as I have named against such a man as the gentleman who was elected; it needed only the disgraceful party cries then raised to insure the defeat of Mr. Whitaker. When a man like him could raise such a cry as the religious beliefs of his fellow-men to assist him in his election, his doom was knelled out. When such things are done, every right principle that should actuate a man is roused and makes him stand by the weaker side. I say that gentleman was beaten, through the very tactics he used, by a less astute, able, and circuitous man. It was not necessary, therefore, that the Premier should go to Auckland and assist the honorable member for Eden, for he was quite able to assist himself. I trust the lesson taught there will be a lesson to this House and to the whole country, and that in future we shall see, when a seat has to be fought for, that it shall be fought for in an honest, square, straightforward manner, and not with sidwinds and attacks upon men for their religious belief. The honorable gentleman who leads the Opposition also says that undue influences were used to get rid of the honorable member who formerly led the Opposition. All I can say is—and I am sure a large section of the House will agree with me—that, personally, I should have liked to see the former member for Wanganui occupying a seat in this House. I do not mean to say that I should like to see him take the seat which the honorable gentleman who defeated him occupies. I wish the “Stella” could have been placed at the disposal of the late member for Wanganui, so that he might have been replaced in this House for another seat, because it is desirable that we should have every class of man in this House. It would be well for us young members to have before us the winning, calm, and conciliatory demeanour of the present leader of the Opposition, and the highly excitable and impetuous oratory of the late leader of the Opposition, so that we might take a medium between them and strike out our own course for the future. I am sorry that a requisition was not sent in to the Premier to place the “Stella” at the disposal of the late honorable member for Wanganui, so that he might have obtained a seat; and I am sure he would have acceded to the request if he had looked to the future result of that gentleman being returned. I think it would have been a great advantage to the Government, and not to the Opposition, if such had been the case; and I believe a fatal mistake was made in not giving him every facility for re-election. However, there are other reasons why I should like to see that gentleman occupying a seat here. He has served the country well in various capacities, and it is well that those who have so served their country should be rewarded with the confidence of the people to the end. But it must be borne in mind that, however great ability a man may be possessed of, if he exercises it against the temper of the time he must expect to be passed by; and I think it was so, unfortunately, in this case. This use of Government power in the elections has been carried to a still greater extent, according to the ideas of the gentlemen who have preferred the charge, but they have not given us much information as to the extent to which it was used. I suppose, when they talked of expenditure, they alluded to what Mr. Sheehan did, and to his conduct in the matter; but I need say nothing on that point. He is one of those men who always remind me of a hedgehog—touch him where you will, he is ready for you. I feel perfectly certain, when his conduct is impugned, he is able to defend himself; and he would be a very foolish young member indeed who took the cudgels up for him. I will not do so. Speaking of Sir William Fox, I may be allowed to express the very great regret I have felt in reading some of the public prints which previously lauded him to the skies as the beau idéal of an Opposition leader, to find that, now that he has been defeated, they speak of that defeat as a great benefit to the party. I think, Sir, such conduct is ungenerous; I think it is not calculated to inspire in men those principles which make them stern and resolute in adherence to the opinions of the party whose cause they espouse; I think, also, that it is unbecoming, and I am sure that those honorable members who have served with Sir William Fox will at least do him the credit of saying that, under all circumstances, he was actuated by a sincere desire to serve the country well. The honorable gentleman wound up his indictment by saying that the Government ought to introduce measures on two subjects—two subjects in which I take a deep and personal interest—charitable aid, and the licensing question. As a member of a Borough Council, I happen to sit upon a Committee called the Charitable Aid Committee; and I want to tell the House this: that if ever there was a Government that endeavoured to bring this question of charitable aid to a final and distinct head it is the present Government; and, if honorable gentleman desire proof of this, they will find printed memoranda and circulars of every description relating to the matter, which have been sent to the local bodies. The proposals of the Government were these: To transfer from the colony to local bodies the cost of maintaining the charitable institutions, and, as an inducement to the local bodies to accept the transfer, they offer a subsidy of pound for pound. Well, warm conferences have taken place amongst the local bodies throughout the colony with regard to that proposal. I think I read that in Christchurch they have formed what they call a Charitable Aid Board, in which they group certain centres of population, and work together; and I think it is a capital plan.

Mr. HALL.—The honorable member is mistaken; it is not so.

Mr. SPEIGHT.—I thought it was, from what I saw in the public prints. I have no personal knowledge of the facts with regard to Christchurch. I shall get better acquainted with them perhaps before long from the honorable gentlemen who represent that part of the country. I was about to say that this borough with which I happen to be connected adopted the proposals of the Government in their entirety, and the result is that, to a limited extent—indeed, I may say to the full extent—they are now taking charge of the sick and destitute, and all but the criminal and insane. They raised the money for the purpose from local funds, and they have adopted this course in opposition to other sections of the community, which have striven against it; and why? Because the honorable gentlemen belonging to the Opposition have, during the past two years, held out the bait that the consolidated revenue will be made chargeable by them for charitable aid, when they come into power—because those gentlemen have led those persons throughout the country who agree with them to believe that local bodies will be exempted from the cost of these things, and that the charge will be made, pure and simple, a charge upon the consolidated revenue of the colony.—(Oh.)—I say, Sir, what I know to be true. In conference with other local bodies on this subject these facts were brought forward, and they alone prevented a union which would otherwise have taken place in order to make the local bodies fairly bear their share of the cost of maintaining these institutions. I say it is so, and that the present Government have sent out printed circulars bearing upon the subject—and if this is denied I will, at a future time, produce the circulars myself—inviting the co-operation of local bodies in these matters, and that in some instances these proposals have been adopted, and in other instances they have been rejected on two grounds: The first ground is a hope that the Consolidated Fund will be made to bear the cost of these institutions entirely, and the local bodies be relieved of the charge; and the next is a fear that, having once taken over the charitable-aid matter, the subsidies that were promised would become a myth and pass away. These things have militated against the adoption of the proposals of the Government. And then for honorable members to come down and tell us the Government have done nothing towards carrying out those objects which are so desirable, so close to their hearts, and so much for the welfare of the colony! It seems to me that they are speaking without book, to say nothing more. Now, Sir, with regard to the licensing question. I may say at once that my idea with reference to the Government taking up the licensing question is something of this sort: that, until this Government or any other can come to recognize certain first great principles upon which the licensing question ought to be managed, it is useless for them to introduce Bills. But, when they fail to do that, is it to be supposed that there is to be a Licensing Bill thrown on the floor of this House to be scrambled over and fought about, and made a Government measure? I have never seen a Government yet that possessed two members who agreed as to the principles which should underlie a Licensing Bill. At a future period I dare say my views on licensing matters will be fully explained to the House, and therefore it is not necessary for me to enter upon them now. The honorable member who preceded me in this debate has brought forth a Local Option Bill, and I suppose the reason why I was selected to succeed him in the discussion was because we are both cold-water men, and there was no fear that we would get quarrelling over anything of this nature. Well, it seems a strange fatality that the very first Bill on this subject introduced into this House should be one which has not been considered by the members of the House who are supposed to belong to the temperance party. I say that the Bill has been introduced with undue precipitancy; and I say, furthermore, that, as far as that Bill is concerned, if it be what I take it to be, I hope it will be expelled from the House. I desire to make no uncertain sound on that point. If it is what I take it to be, I trust it will never pass the second reading in this House. These are the things that are held out as baits to the young members of this House to induce them to join the Opposition. First, those gentlemen are going to introduce great liberal measures in relation to charitable aid; next, they are going to introduce a Licensing Bill which will be satisfactory to everybody. Well, if they accomplish the latter they will perform one of the greatest wonders the world has seen. The Licensing Bill leads me up to the honorable member for Cheviot. He told us in the beginning of his speech last night that the hour and a half occupied by the speech of the leader of the Opposition was the most enjoyable hour and a half he had ever spent in his life.—(No.)—The words he used, I think, were—"the best hour and a half speech I ever sat under." All I can say is, that I am glad the honorable gentleman is so easily satisfied, because I now have hopes that, young and inexperienced as some of us are, we may give the honorable gentleman some pleasure by-and-by. Whilst I have every desire to enjoy to the uttermost the utterances which proceed from the lips of honorable gentlemen who are opposed to me, I must say that, when listening to the speech of the honorable member for Selwyn, there came over me a feeling of dampness, of dissatisfaction, of disappointment, and of despondency.—(Hear, hear.)—I dare say the honorable gentlemen who cry "Hear, hear," sympathize with those feelings. No doubt they also felt despondent when they listened to the speech of the honorable member, but despondent from an altogether different reason from that which operated with me. I felt despondent at this: that here is an amendment tacked on to an Address—an amendment which implies censure upon the Government in the most serious of forms—and it is based upon the flimsiest of pretexts, that will not stand a moment's consideration. That is why I felt despondent: that the time of this House and of the country should be wasted in discussing such a motion based upon such grounds. If the honorable members on the other side felt despondent for another reason, I can thoroughly understand their feelings. They were despondent when they saw the lameness of the case which was being made out, and they naturally felt that it would have been better if the motion had taken another form. I am not going to quarrel with them. I do not think it is my place to quarrel or agree with the course which the Opposition have pursued. They have perfect liberty to do as they think proper, as long as they obey the rules of this House. But, at the same time, my opinion is that the Opposition have done a perfectly correct thing. I do not think that good government could have been carried on in this country with such a motion hanging over the Ministry for an indefinite period. Therefore I think the Opposition deserve credit for the period at which they have brought this matter on. I am pleased that they have brought it on in this form; and I am still more pleased to find that they have such an utterly futile case—futile in every sense; for I am satisfied of this: that, whatever the vote of the House may be, it will be the vote of a foregone conclusion, and not a vote which will back up the counts in the indictment laid by the leader of the Opposition. It will be a vote which will say, "We will not have this Government as at present constituted. They may introduce measures which would do credit to the heart of a saint or an angel; but we will have none of those measures, as long as they come from such hands." That is the meaning of the vote; that is what is meant by the proposal; and honorable members who seek to make us believe that any other meaning is attachable to it are only seeking to throw dust in our eyes. The honorable member for Cheviot told us, in speaking of the mover and seconder of this Address, that, judging by those two, good men were absolutely supporting the Government. I thank the honorable gentleman for the compliment. He regretted to see two such good men supporting the Government. All I can say is that, when I look round these benches, I cannot help thinking that his regret will be intensified before the House is finished with these honorable members. It appears to me that, if any man comes into this House with an honest determination to do his duty faithfully and fearlessly to the people who send him here—if he means to do his duty irrespective of those petty party tactics which are so freely indulged in at the present time, and by which it is endeavoured to lead young members to believe that this is not the question at issue: that Codlin is the true friend, and not Short—I say, if that is to be the position which a new man is to take up, the sooner he understands that there are certain things now before the country which must be settled before the country will settle into a state of satisfaction, the better. But let him also understand that, if these things which are to be settled are to be rightly settled, they can only be settled by men who have an honest and genuine belief in the principles themselves, and that the object is not to be attained by throwing out of office those men who have initiated the measures, and who have educated the country up to their acceptance. I say it is not to be gained by bringing into power men whom I have heard designated, and, I believe, with good reason, the "governing families of the colony," who have so long had the control of affairs in their hands. I had a number of notes of the speech of the honorable member for Cheviot, but, as it is desirable that he and I should cultivate the closest friendship under present circumstances, I think it is perhaps well that I should refrain from saying many things which I had intended to say. Therefore I will not trouble the House at very much greater length, and will simply deal with one or two small matters that occur to me. The honorable gentleman tells us that these "young greyhounds" who have been let loose and have come on to the floor of this House are honest, intelligent, and conscientious—I think that was the term—and the honorable member instanced Mr. Hobbs, a gentleman who graces this floor no more: that these gentlemen, if they are conscientious, will be found walking into that lobby behind, I presume, the honorable member for Cheviot, who also has had a conscience in this matter, and who found his way across the floor of the House. But, Sir, I apprehend there are two things required before that is done. First of all, there is the character of the conscience itself to be considered; and next the honorable gentlemen have got to show us upon what ground they claim us, and require that we should desert those principles which we have taken up, and go over to the other side of the House. The honorable member for Cheviot himself can best tell what induced him to change his side of the House. I am the keeper of no man's conscience—I try to keep my own—but I must say that I have honestly searched through the records of this House to find the cause of the honorable gentleman's conscientious scruples, but I could not. I dare say at some future time I shall get to the bottom of the whole thing, and it will give me great pleasure to hear calmly and considerately the motives which induced a gentleman of such great intelligence and ability to be a recreant to the party under whose auspices he came out. He told us, in regard to the number of votes polled at the elections—which, after all, are insignificant things when you come to look at them; but I suppose they are the by-play which fill up the intervals in the solid matter in this House—he told us, in referring to the number of votes polled for certain places as against other places, and alluding to the honorable member for Christchurch City (Mr. Andrews), that, had the votes of Cheviot been added to those of Christchurch, no Greyites would have been returned for Christchurch. Let me tell the honorable gentleman that that argument is like a two-edged sword—it cuts both ways. It means something of this sort: It means that, had the electors of Cheviot been placed under the inspired influence which the electors of Christchurch were placed under, they would not have returned the honorable gentleman, and that happy locality would have been shorn of the delight of being represented by the honorable gentleman in this House. But I can quite understand the honorable gentleman's feeling of contentment. When such causes produce such results, I can thoroughly understand that he is contented with the present position of affairs; but I do hope that, whatever else may occur within the next few months, this at least will occur: that those anomalies which at present exist in the matter of representation shall be blotted out of existence, and that we shall have a fair representation of the people in accordance with their numbers. When such glaring anomalies exist, it is time that both sides of the House should for once sink their party feelings—their personal animosities—and unite to carry out the reforms that are desirable. When these things are brought about, there will be less ground of complaint, and less boasting over happy boroughs such as that of the honorable gentleman. There is one other matter I will allude to, and that is the peculiar characteristic of this debate and the debate of last session. The characteristic is this: Laud up the honorable member for Port Chalmers; laud him up to the skies. He is the acme of a Public Works Minister; he is everything that can be desired; but send “the common enemy” down to the lowest depths possible. That seems to be the whole object of the Opposition. A reconstructed Ministry is to be the proposal, and, to use a classic quotation which some of you will not understand, an attempt is being made to “sluther” young members. The honorable member for Riverton has been subjected to the smoothing-down process. He has been appealed to as a man of the world, as a man who knows what an important thing his vote is, how he comprehends the situation, and so on. That is the sort of thing that gains votes. Men like to be appealed to. It is in most cases a novelty, and they take to it like mother's milk. But it ought to be remembered that, whatever they do, there will assuredly be a day of reckoning; and if, as we are told, the destiny of the country is going to hang upon the votes of one or two gentlemen who are taking very kindly to the smoothing process, let them not forget that the day is not very distant when they will need all the smoothing they can get; because, after the passing of the Triennial Parliaments Bill and the Representation Bill, they will have to face angry constituents, who will tell them very plainly what they think. Let these young men remember this. Let the old men go their own way; but, if we young fellows are to be worked upon as so many fish to be caught by a coloured bait, or by inducements of a character that ought not to be made, then the sooner we young men stand together and form a new party the better. Now, I should like to see the honorable member for Riverton in that party. I can assure him he is not likely to hold a portfolio under the old party; but then, if he thinks differently, I will allow him to be the best judge. Then, Sir, much has been said about the Electoral Bill which was withdrawn. We heard last night a certain version of that matter, and the honorable gentleman who gave us that version told us that it was a peculiar characteristic of the Premier to place one side of a subject before his audience and to let them know nothing of the other. Now, I think the Premier has been very plain on this occasion; but what did the honorable member for Cheviot say? He said that the Bill as returned from the Upper House was in the exact form in which the Government introduced it into this House.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—No.

Mr. SPEIGHT.—I heard the statement, not once, but a dozen times. The argument was that, because it was in the same form, the Premier should have proceeded with it. There can be no mistake about that.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—I did not say that. I said it was in the same form in reference to the Maori vote.

Mr. SPEIGHT.—Why, that is all that is in dispute. It was the Maori vote! Very well, Sir; what does it mean? It means that the position which the Premier took up in the first instance was, that the dual vote ought not to be there—that he was opposed to it: but it shows more. It shows that the Premier is prepared to stand up for the dignity of this House against all comers. The Premier has fairly stated the position of the matter, and I think you will find thousands of men outside the House who thoroughly understand it. It is useless, therefore, for members of this House to make such statements. The Bill was withdrawn because the Premier would not permit it to be altered in the Upper House from the form in which it passed this House. I shall say a few words now upon the character of the vote we are about to take. What does it mean? To my mind it means this, that, irrespective altogether of the measures before the House, the Opposition desire to occupy those benches. That is all I can see in the proposals of the Opposition; and again I will say that I think they were right in raising the question so early in the session. But on what ground do they do it? I have in my mind's eye certain gentlemen who think there may be in the Ministry men so recreant to the great principles we are fighting for that they will accept office under the Opposition should they succeed in ousting the present Ministry. Now, I do hope that, whatever other mistakes may be made, there will be no mistake upon this point. I hope every Minister will give forth such a sound as will destroy all such hopes as that. I feel satisfied that there is no such intention, for I feel certain that the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House will never pass the measures to which the people attach such a high value; and, believing as I do in the ultimate triumph of those principles and the faith of the people in them, I say that, irrespective altogether of party tactics, no Government and no Opposition can cheat the people out of them. They cannot and will not be robbed of them. They will have them, and the members of this House had better make up their minds to that fact. Let me again refer to the amendment of the Opposition, who say that, "whilst we are prepared to adopt the liberal measures which the country desires, we have no confidence in the Government as at present constituted." Now, let it be understood that no reconstruction of that Ministry can take place. There stands at least one solid section of this House who recognize in the Premier an important factor in the Ministry, and, recognizing that, we are prepared to stand by him at all hazards. With that knowledge, I can scarcely believe that any Ministry would dream of deserting him, and I believe the present Ministry have not the slightest desire to do so. But the honorable gentlemen on the opposite side of the House say they are prepared to give effect to the measures desired by the country. Now, let us understand things clearly. The amendment does not say that they are prepared to pass the Bills of the Government. They are prepared to give effect to the liberal measures desired by the country, but they are to be the exponents of those measures, and not the people themselves. They are not going to take the oft-repeated utterances of the people themselves as the indication of what the people want; they are going to give their own ideas of what is good for the people. I do not like repeating the words of any man, but I must repeat the words of the Premier with reference to the leaders of the Opposition, and say that I distrust them. I remember many years ago reading a little anecdote which seems apposite to the present occasion. In a town in France there was a very worthy curé who discovered through the communications of the parish priest that there existed among the female portion of his parishioners a strong disposition to a certain vice which shall be unnamed. The poor man's heart was righteously grieved over the matter. He was very anxious about the welfare of his people, and he took the least offensive way to pull them up. Accordingly he arranged that after a certain meeting all the female members of the church were to remain. He then referred to the particular sin in fitting terms, and concluded by strongly condemning it. I should have said that it was a very general sin amongst these ladies. He did not say that they were all guilty of it—he said he would let their own hearts tell them that—but he singled out one lady and said, "Now, I know you all detest this sin; but yonder I see a woman who, above all her fellows, has been guilty of it, and, in order that I may mark her for your eternal contempt and disgust, I will hurl this breviary at her head;" and, as he made a movement to do so, there was not a bonnet in the church but went down. Sir, it appears to me that there are Liberals in this House now who state that they are prepared to pass these measures that are desired by the country. They are prepared to vote for triennial Parliaments; yet their votes are recorded here in this book in a solid phalanx against them. There is not a man that I can name, with one honorable exception—not a man who remains on the Opposition side of the House out of those who have come back—but has voted against the Triennial Parliaments Bill. Yet these men are going to adopt the Triennial Parliaments Bill. Can anything be more contemptible? Can anything be more ridiculous? I am not sufficiently versed in the rules of this House to know if they would permit me to fling this volume of Hansard at the heads of honorable members opposite; but, if I were allowed to do so, there would be such a ducking and diving there as would astonish one. Yet these are the men who are going to lead the country to progress and reform; these are the men who have had control of the country for years past, and who have not ventured even to initiate this movement, but now they are prepared to carry it out. I will stop to tell the House why they are prepared. It is because an indignant people say those measures shall be carried. It is because the country's mind is made up that they must be carried. If, honorable gentlemen, you cannot make up your minds to adopt these measures in their entirety—to adopt the Bills, the whole Bills, and nothing but the Bills—then make up your minds that other men will come into your places. If you attain temporary success, if you can stave off the frequently-expressed desires of the people of this country by mauling and destroying those measures in such a manner as to make them useless to the country and an insult to the intelligence of this House, if you pass them in such a form as "to keep the word of promise to our ear, but break it to our hope," you will reckon too much on the forbearance of the people. I apprehend that when these measures are disposed of we shall have another dissolution. Some honorable gentlemen do not like that; but to young fellows, to young greyhounds whose limbs are fleet, a dissolution has no terrors. And I assure those honorable gentlemen that, whether this Government is in power or the other Government is in power, there is not a constituency in this colony which will not insist that the people shall be appealed to when those proposed measures are brought into operation, and when a fair chance has been given to form a new roll upon those measures. The result of the late election, from a Government-party point of view, has been an eminently satisfactory one. Where are the gentlemen I saw a few months since sitting on that side of the House who denominated themselves by the term "rats"? Echo answers, "Where?" They have retired to the obscurity from which they should never have emerged. Let me say to some of our young men who are in the toils that there is an obscurity in store for some of us if we remember not our faith to guard it. I shall not detain the House further than by saying that the proposition of the Opposition with regard to the composition of the present Ministry is one that, to my mind, is not sustained by any indictment presented to this House. It is one that will not procure favourable consideration from the country—that will not meet with the approval of the country. What the country looks for now is that the men who have educated it up to the present position of political intelligence shall have a fair and honorable chance of redeeming the promises they have made in the past—that they shall have a fair and honorable opportunity given to them, not only to bring those measures into existence, but to see the first House that meets under them. We are told it is not desirable that these things should be done by the present Government, because one or two or half-a-dozen gentlemen of the Opposition have personal spleen which they mean to have out. I cannot denominate it by a more noble term than spleen. I know there are some members of the House who will go into the Opposition lobbies in a few hours or days who would vote the other way if the Premier could be shunted from the track. Such a position is ignoble for any man to take up who lays claim to be an honest, intelligent, and respectable representative of an honest and intelligent people. Let the Premier stand or fall with the Ministry and the party he has led, but this at least will be the record of the future: He did all in the defence of the liberties of this colony which a man dare do.

Colonel TRIMBLE.—Sir, I have to apologize to the House, because I am quite unable to follow the honorable gentleman who has just sat down in the glowing terms he has used. I feel that, after his speech, what I have to say will be rather a damper to the feelings of both my friends and my opponents. But I may perhaps be allowed, as a plain man, to tell my story as well as I can. First of all, I would refer to two or three points with regard to which there seems to be some misapprehension as to the question at issue before the House. Take, for instance, the question of subsidies. I apprehend that, when that was referred to in regard to Christchurch, the objection of the speaker was not to the fact that Christchurch had got its subsidy, but that other places had not got theirs. All over the colony there was a complaint that the subsidies had not been paid, and in no case had any notice been given that a new order of proceeding would be adopted by the Government. The consequence was, that a great deal of inconvenience was experienced by Road Boards and County Councils all over the colony. Then, again, there seemed to me to be a misapprehension of the point at issue as to Ministers travelling in the "Hinemoa." The objection was, not that Ministers should travel in the "Hinemoa," but that Ministers should travel on electioneering business. There could be no objection whatever to the Government steamer carrying Government officials upon public duty, but I apprehend that on those particular occasions the business was not of a public nature, any more than my business was of a public nature when I went about to address my constituents. Then, again, in regard to finance, the objection was, not that the Minister did not make a speech upon finance, but that he showed an evident ignorance of the principles of finance. Then, with regard to plural voting at local elections, I apprehend there is a material distinction between the position taken up by our opponents and that taken by us on this point. As far as I am personally concerned, I am willing at any moment to give up my plural vote. I believe I have hardly ever exercised it, and I am not at all likely to exercise it very often. But there is this to be said in reference to it: We have been told from the Government benches that the reason why plural voting ought to be given up in local elections is this: that there is a subsidy to the local body from the General Government, and that therefore there ought not to be plural voting. Here, again, there is a misapprehension. The amount of that subsidy is but a small proportion of the amount given to the local bodies from other sources, such as taxation, endowments, &c. I apprehend that the reason for plural voting is, that men who have large interests at stake should not, for the benefit of a few who have little at stake, be overtaxed. Now, in my own district there is really no difficulty on this point at all. We are so nearly on an equality, there are so few large holders, that if plural voting were abolished to-morrow it would make no practical difference whatever. But I can well understand that there may be a serious difficulty in districts otherwise situated; and therefore, before the House passes a measure for the abolition of plurality of voting, it should take into consideration the circumstances of those districts where there are a few who pay very little and a great many who would have to pay a large amount. Another matter referred to last night was the election of Land Boards. Now, I would just ask this question of my friends opposite: Why have they not made the Land Boards elective during the last two years? They have had ample means, and the power to do so. Is it not the fact that they have not done so simply because they found that a nominated Board was, on the whole, a fair tribunal to look after the interests of the country? Before going to the main part of the subject I will refer to one or two other matters. We are told that we are all Liberals now, but that the Opposition want to start a new aristocracy. That may possibly apply to some honorable members on this side of the House—of course I do not know who they are—but assuredly it does not apply to me. I have been a Radical—not merely a Liberal so-called, but a Radical—all my life. Certainly for over thirty years I have worked hard in the Liberal camp. So that, as far as that taunt applies, it does not apply to me, and I apprehend it will not apply to any considerable number in any part of the House. Now, with regard to the setting-up of an aristocracy, I would ask this question: Is there any reasonable man who believes that an aristocracy, in the sense in which an aristocracy is regarded in the Old Country, could by any possibility—by any remote chance—be established in any colony of the British Crown? Why, the colonies have been established as a rule, and their populations have been recruited as a rule, from the common people of the Home Country. All attempts that have hitherto been made to found a new aristocracy have been failures. And why? Because under the old aristocracy that institution was founded upon the right of conquest. The leader naturally was retained as leader from generation to generation, for the safety of the conquerors, and every effort was made to keep the aristocracy in existence. But, here, what are the facts of the case? You have started into existence from a new basis, from an enlightened age, at a time when conquests have ceased; and by no possibility can you galvanize the old style of things into life. I say it is simply nonsense to talk of the foundation of a new aristocracy in this country. Sir, there were a few other trifling things alluded to last night, and, as they seemed to be made much of, perhaps you will allow me to refer to them. If there is one man in the British dominions that I have an antagonism to more than another, it is Lord Beaconsfield—Mr. Disraeli. I believe him to be a charlatan, I believe him to have no political knowledge, and I believe his public career has been an almost unmitigated loss to the country. But let us do a man justice. Lord Beaconsfield is not a brute; and I think that no man, but a brute, would act in the way in which Lord Beaconsfield was represented last night as having acted with regard to the Irish famine. I think this House ought to have the words that the man uttered. We ought to have had put before us the exact words that he uttered, in order that we might judge of their merit; and not a paraphrase which may or may not truly represent the facts of the case. I do not speak without a certain knowledge of what has been said on the subject of the Irish famine. I am quite well aware that many persons, looking at the Irish famine and its results as a whole, feel satisfied that it has resulted in good; but I never knew a man to gloat over it. No doubt Providence does overrule apparent evils for good; and no doubt in many districts the Irish famine has resulted in good to many people, and in a large amount of physical comfort to the people that were left; but I apprehend that neither Lord Beaconsfield nor any other public man would ever go the length of saying what he last night was represented to have said. Then there was this point raised—and, whether it be true or not, I may be allowed to refer to it. I speak of the deplorable position in which the honorable gentleman opposite depicted the Irish population at the time of the famine. He said, for instance, that those poor wretches were ground down by the aristocracy, who wrung the last penny from them, and charged them even as much as £10 an acre for rent. Now, I happen to know what I am about to say on this matter, for I lived amongst those people. I resided amongst them at the time referred to—that is to say, in the autumn of 1846 and the spring of 1847. I know what the Premier alluded to when he referred to £10 a year rent; and let me tell the House how far that is true, and how far it does not represent the facts. Landlords in Ireland never got £10 per acre as rent for their land; but under a system of small tenures a man could get four or five or six acres of land; and a man having twenty acres was considered a well-to-do farmer. There grew up a large proportion of the population which had no land at all. Now, there being no manufactures in the country worth talking about, these people were driven to very great straits in order to find subsistence. There was no employment for them all the year round, and when they could get employment it was at a very low rate of wages. The way in which they managed to make ends meet was this: Under what was called the con-acre system they rented a quarter of an acre or perhaps a whole acre of land. They manured it and planted it with potatoes, upon which they subsisted. At the end of the year they went upon a fresh piece of land, which they again manured, and out of which they got a small crop of potatoes. By this means they were able to subsist with the wages they earned during the rest of the year. The landlords and the aristocracy of Ireland had nothing to do with that system. During the whole of my lifetime they had set their faces resolutely to get rid of it; and that fact formed one ground of objection to the landlord. I may say that I did my best to get the Irish Land Bill passed, and I have no reason to regret any action I took upon that occasion. We must do justice to those men even in our hostility. I think it was an unjust thing, to the party represented by Lord Beaconsfield, to that nobleman, and to all concerned, to make the statements that were made in the House last night; and I did not wish to allow them to pass without some trifling challenge. Well, now, there are some few points in reference to the general policy of the Government upon which I differ from them, and upon which I will ground my opposition and the vote that I intend to give upon this occasion. I take first of all the question of immigration. And here perhaps I may be allowed to say that the honorable gentleman who proposed the adoption of the Address in Reply seemed not to have known that the Government have practically stopped free immigration. He spoke in strong terms in favour of nominated immigration, and I think he said nothing in reference to it that is not strictly true. In my own district there is a very large population of men holding each from forty to a hundred acres of bush land. These men came as free immigrants. They were day-labourers at Home, and most of them lived in poor circumstances. They applied for and got their pieces of land, and they are gradually becoming independent men. The advantage of the nominated system is this: It brings just the class of people who have already shown that they can hold their footing in the country; it brings just the class of men who are likely to be sober, honest, and industrious; and therefore it seems to me that if you are to have immigration it ought to be the bounden duty of the Government to encourage that class of men to come to this country. But there is another point that you have to take into account. When a free immigrant comes into the country you have to take charge of him—you have to see that he gets work, and that he does not starve. You send him to the Immigration Barracks, where he remains ten days, a fortnight, or even longer; but in the case of nominated immigrants you have no such trouble. They have their relatives and friends to look after them, and to obtain employment for them. Now, the system of free immigration has been practically put an end to. An announcement appears in the New Zealand Gazette, No. 88, of 24th August. I saw copies of this announcement in Taranaki, where it is being acted upon. The notification is signed by Mr. Gisborne, and the first clause is to this effect: "The sum of five pounds will be required to be paid in cash, in advance, for each male adult, whether married or single, at the time of making the nomination." That has put a stop to free immigration altogether in my district, and in almost all the districts. There was a statement made by the Prime Minister in reference to immigration generally—to free immigration. He first of all tells us that the bringing-out of free immigrants is at the expense of the working-men—that the result is the lowering of wages—and then he says this is cruel. Now, in the first place I am inclined to dispute the statement that it is at the expense of the working-men that free immigration takes place; and I deny in toto the statement that immigration, in the circumstances in which New Zealand is placed, could by any possibility lower wages. I take my stand, Sir, upon this fact: I say that it is an ascertained fact that in all free countries where land is plentiful and cheap, and population scarce, immigration, instead of having a tendency to lower wages, has an invariable tendency to raise them.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Colonel TRIMBLE.—I am glad those gentlemen on the Ministerial benches say "Hear, hear," to this. It shows that we are in accord upon that important point, and out of accord with the views taken up by the head of the Government. I need not argue that question, as my friends opposite agree with me. I stated it as a fact in my candidature; and I was answered by the oldest men in the place—by men who came out to Taranaki in the first ship—that it was an unmistakable fact that wages had risen with an increase of immigrants. How am I to place confidence in a Government whose head tells me what is utterly incredible to me, and who not only holds that view, but actually puts it in practice in the way I have indicated? He said in this House last session that a stop would be put to free immigration, and, in the way I have indicated, he has already put a stop to it. I can place no confidence in a Government whose chief member cannot tell me whether he is a Free-trader or not. I know no Liberal at Home, I know of no Liberal here, who has any doubt upon that point. Here is what Mr. Gladstone says in the last number that reached this country of the Nineteenth Century:—

"The legislation by which freedom of trade was established among us cost the nation many years—perhaps not less than fifteen or twenty—of its legislative life. From 1840 to 1860 it was the one absorbing subject of parliamentary action. It tore to pieces the political parties of the country; it made and unmade the fortunes of those by whom they were led, or who knew how to turn political vicissitudes to account. For this heavy price we received in return a system under which, and in great part by means of which, our trade with the world has been multiplied fourfold; our capital has been enormously augmented, so that the penny of income-tax, which was in 1842 worth some £700,000, is now, in round numbers, of the value of two millions. And, what is better than all this, the incomes of labouring-men of all classes have been increased by an amount which may be moderately estimated at 30 per cent. on the average, while their hours of work have in most or many cases been decreased, and a portion of their time rescued from sheer bondage to the immediate necessities of livelihood."

And then he goes on to denounce the Government for having, even by implication, coincided with the view expressed by one of their followers, who granted, or proposed to grant, a Committee to inquire whether the agricultural distress arose, or did not arise, from free-trade. And yet it is proposed, by this Address which this House is going to make, that a Committee should, here in this country, judge as to the mode of promoting manufactures and so on. Why, Sir, the very mention of such a thing shows that there is no liberality in those who propose it. Is it an open question amongst Liberals to go into the question of protection? I say, No. The very fact that a man does not know his own mind—that he turns one side of his face towards the Free-trader and the other side of his face towards the Protectionist—shows that he is not really a Liberal; and a Ministry with an illiberal, a really Tory head, cannot be a Liberal Ministry. Well, then, Sir, we are asked to sustain the Government on the ground of its great success in the Native policy. I am not going into the question of the Thames disturbance; I will simply ask the gentleman who tried to explain the matter whether the Native Minister has been successful in his efforts. Has he secured peace? Of course the statement cannot be accepted which has been made, that this is merely a thing between a few Natives. The shooting of a man in Government employment cannot be set down, as is stated in the Address, as an intertribal dispute. Why should they shoot a Government officer because of disputes amongst themselves? It is utterly incredible. It is a dispute with the Government or it is nothing. The Government sent men to survey a certain piece of land, and they are shot? What does that mean? Surely it means not an intertribal dispute;—that may have been at the bottom of it originally—but it means at the present moment a dispute with the Government, or the authorities who sent the surveyors there. There is no getting out of that. I am not going into the old question whether Native affairs were managed well by this or by that man. I only say that when the present Government came into power two years ago we had no troubles with the Natives. And let us review the circumstances in that district where I know the facts better than I know them elsewhere. Nearly three years ago I happened to be in the Patea District, and I there saw the officer in charge of the Native Department. He had just finished a very complicated, a very tedious arrangement with the Natives with regard to the lands on this side of the Waingongoro River, and he told me that as soon as the payments were completed he intended to go to the other side of the river, and he was quite sanguine that upon that other side he would have no more trouble than he had on this side. Well, he made his arrangements to proceed. A new Government came into office; and what does this Government do? It says, "Stop that, until we look into it." What does that mean? A Government which professes to be the special friend of the Maori comes into office, and the first act that it does is to tell the officer in charge, "Don't do that particular duty, until we see whether it should be done or not." What was the natural inference to the Maori mind? Was it not this: "Our friends are now in office; our friends are determined to stop this taking of land from us. We have had warning for twelve months that the surveyors would come, and, now that the time has come, the Government has stopped it: we have friends in office;" and I can imagine the disappointment of the Natives when, twelve months afterwards, surveyors are put on the Plains for the purpose of taking the land from them which Government held out was to be theirs. It was perfectly natural that disturbances should arise. What precautions were taken for a possible settlement of the question after the Government had determined to go on with the survey? Was any precaution taken to protect the surveyors? None whatever. It was treated as an ordinary matter. Well, I cannot go further into this question of surveying, unless I go rather forward to the point when the surveyors were turned off. Then, what took place? There was an immediate sputter. They said, "Oh! we will put the land in the market;" and they advertised it by telegraph all over the Australian Colonies and New Zealand that, within a couple of months—I think in the month of May—the lands would be sold. I remember some people said, "Are they mad?" Others said, "Well, you see they are determined to carry it through." This determination to carry it through resulted in another set of telegrams countermanding the sale. Were the Natives likely to be conciliated by the apparent retrogression of the Government? No. No savage, no civilized, men would take this view of it. Well, after they had withdrawn their advertisements, nothing whatever was done until the Natives, emboldened no doubt by impunity—for impunity does embolden men, though even savages—what did they do? They came upon the lands of peaceable settlers, and ploughed them up. I see in this document that they are waiting patiently for the operation of the law. When they began to plough did they think of our laws? Are they thinking of our laws now? It is a notorious fact that Te Whiti told the honorable gentleman, when he went to Parihaka, that he did not regard him or his laws. Our laws are nothing to the Maoris. They despise the laws, and say you must submit to their laws. But here we are told, "No further development has taken place of the fanatical movement on the West Coast, and the tribes concerned appear to be quietly awaiting the action of the Parliament and of the ordinary Courts of law." Why, Sir, they are doing nothing of the kind. They are not waiting for the ordinary course of law. They do not care twopence about your law, or how it operates. Then the Speech says, "Steps are being taken for the holding of a full inquiry into the existence and extent of the alleged unfulfilled promises in regard to lands." Why, Sir, I apprehend that the Government have already satisfied themselves that there are hardly any unfulfilled promises.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—No, no.

Colonel TRIMBLE.—I believe that is the fact.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—No, no.

Colonel TRIMBLE.—I think other people are perfectly satisfied, on precisely the same information. The promises consist of two. The first to William King—the main promise, and the largest amount. He has never been out of possession of the land. He has held possession of it from the day he was told he might have it until to-day. Then there was another promise—that given to the Oakura Natives, who began this ploughing. What was it? A promise of some 22,000 acres near Stoney River—given to them on condition that their conduct would be good. Well, who holds possession of that land now? Are we surveying it, and cutting it up? No; it is in the hands of the Natives at this moment, and has been all through from the very time they were told that they might have it. What are the promises? Something has been said about Crown grants, and that they have not been given to the Natives. And how stands the fact? That hardly any Native will take up a Crown grant. The Native Office at New Plymouth is blocked up with Crown grants, and the Natives refuse to take them, for two reasons: first, because there is a fee to be paid; and, secondly, because many think the proceeds will go to the publichouse.

HOUSE RESUMED.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair at half-past seven p.m.

Colonel TRIMBLE.—I have already referred to the immigration policy, and endeavoured to point out the difference in that particular between myself and my friends and the Government as I understood it; but I understand since, by expressions of opinion from the Treasury benches, that I ought only to have referred to some members of the Ministry, although the policy of the Premier has been actually carried out in practice. I have also referred to the question of free-trade, and shown what was the latest expression of opinion of Mr. Gladstone which has reached us, an expression of opinion by a man who, above all others in British-speaking communities, expresses the views of the Liberal party upon the subject of free-trade, and I pointed out that there was no uncertain sound in his utterances. That gentleman showed no two-facedness about it—hinting that, if one party in the country were in favour of free-trade, he might possibly be in favour of it, or that, if a larger party were in favour of the other side of the question, he might possibly take up that particular side. Mr. Gladstone had one opinion and one expression of opinion for all. But a small quotation, which perhaps I might make, would represent the position of the Government upon the point:—

No! never say nothin' without you're compelled to;
And then don't say nothin' that you can be held to;
Nor don't leave no friction-ideas layin' loose
For the ignorant to put to incendiary use.

That is the position of the occupants of the Treasury benches; but it is not the position taken up by the Liberal party, and therefore I do not believe that, in this matter, the occupants of the Treasury benches represent the Liberal party. I then went on to the question of Native affairs, and I was in the midst of the expression of my opinion when the adjournment took place. I referred to the position we were in two years ago. I pointed out that the action of the Government in stopping the surveys upon the plains had a markedly injurious influence upon the Native mind—that this was the natural sequence of their action—and pointed out that their action in that matter, coupled with the position they have assumed as protectors of the Natives, had given the Natives a foolish and wrongful idea of their position in regard to the whole matter of the confiscated lands—that the position taken up by the Ministry encouraged hopes on the part of the Natives; and that the consequence was that, when disappointment stared them in the face, they turned the surveyors off the land. I referred to the fact that, owing to certain counsel in the Government, a hurried sale was determined upon—I think it was in the month of May the sale was to take place—and here I will point out what I forgot to mention before, that, when the Land Board of Taranaki was communicated with, the members were told to put a fixed price upon the land—that is, a price fixed by the Government—an act contrary to all precedent, contrary to the law, I believe. And what was that price? Why, notoriously the land that it was proposed to put into the market would fetch in ordinary times not less than £10 or £12 per acre. It was worth that in the market. Lands worse situated, and of worse quality, were selling at a higher price; and what was the price the Government directed the Land Board to sell the land at? Why, £5 per acre. What did that mean? It meant that there was danger to the buyer. Was that the policy the seller of an article ought to pursue? You were like a merchant in the market who had land for sale, but you were desirous of selling the land at half its value.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Oh, oh.

Colonel TRIMBLE.—I know what I am saying to be the truth. Honorable members need not say, "Oh, oh." If any gentleman can reply to me he will have the opportunity to do so. Having taken this false step, the Government soon after—under wiser auspices; I do not know from what source derived—as hastily took the land out of the market. The telegraph was set in motion once more, and the advertisements were withdrawn from the Australian and New Zealand newspapers. Clearly the effect must necessarily have been upon the Native mind what it actually was—a feeling that the Government did not know its own resolves, did not know what steps to take, did not know its mind; while the Natives had a mind of their own, and took the bull by the horns, for, instead of the Government going on to the land of the Natives, the Natives came on to ours. I have pointed out, so far, the position of affairs; but how did the Government act when the Natives came to plough our land? I think that, in the whole course of administration, there has never been anything so vacillating as the conduct of the Ministry from that time to the present. There is a whisper going round the lobbies, I see that it even finds expression in the papers, and comes from the Ministerial members and their friends, that there is some object on the part of the people of Taranaki in keeping up an agitation about the Native difficulty—they are to get some wonderful advantage from it, we are told. Well, I have a word to say about that, but in the meantime I will try to pursue the historic course of the Government in the matter. I have said their conduct was vacillating. We had a visit from two members of the Ministry and a great personage whose name I might not be in order in mentioning: at any rate, we had the highest personages in the land visiting us. The danger was palpable. The opinion of men who knew what danger was, and men not afraid to meet danger, was clear and distinct. These gentlemen had before them the history of the colony. They knew that a single drop of blood shed meant a war extending throughout the whole of the Maori districts of the North Island; and, with all this before them, what action did the Ministry take? They waited, day by day, not to announce their own views, but to find out what this one or that one would do.

Their whole effort was to throw the initiative on the settlers of the district. I remember what went on between the Premier and a large deputation from the settlers, an affair in which I took very little part, though I had been in the chair at the meeting which sent the deputation to the Premier. I took little part in it, because, being comparatively a stranger, I wished men of more experience to speak; but, after listening to both sides for a time, I could not restrain myself from saying to the Premier words to this effect: "The danger does not lie merely in the fact that the Natives are ploughing our land, or that the Natives will offer violence. We should know perfectly well how to prepare for that, and would prepare for that; but the danger lies in this: that the Natives may go upon the land of some man less cool and collected than the Prime Minister—a man with more blood in his veins, or more passion at his heart—and that man might be betrayed into an act which in his cooler moments he might regret, but which uncontrolled passion might force him into; and what would be the effect? Why, that the whole country would be plunged into a war." I therefore urged that a sufficient physical force should immediately be sent into the district, so that the settlers might at once feel that they were safe in their houses. I did not speak for the people of New Plymouth, but for the residents of the out-districts—the men whose homes and families were in danger. Well, what was the reply? Something to this effect: "I have listened to what the speaker has said. From his position as Chairman of the county he ought to be listened to; but I think his speech was imprudent, and I do not see the danger he sees—that he thinks he sees." That was the course pursued. I was told in another interview—the first interview was on Saturday; this was on Monday—that men would hesitate before putting their necks into a noose—that is to say, that the settlers would hesitate before they took steps to resist the injuries put upon them. Things went on in this way till the settlers could stand it no longer, and turned the Natives off by force. At Hawera, at the other end of the district, they simply said to the Government, "If you do not put them off, we will give them till twelve o'clock to-morrow; and then we will turn them off." No answer was given, and the settlers themselves proceeded, at twelve o'clock next day, to turn these men off. I do not justify that action, but I say it was natural. It may have been unadvisable, but certainly it was natural. Supposing a shot had been fired on that occasion, what would have followed? Would not the whole of the Island have been at once in a blaze? Then, and not till then, the Government took action. They ordered the Constabulary to remove these men, but they did not do so until the settlers themselves had taken the initiative. And what happened at my end of the district? The ploughers, having given up ploughing for a season, resumed it at Oakura and all over the district between that and the White Cliffs. Mr. Kelly, a member of this House, viewing with alarm the course of proceedings, and knowing that the settlers were determined at once to eject, at whatever cost, these intruders, telegraphed to the Government to this effect: "If you do not take the initiative, the settlers will take the whole thing out of your hands." Then came a tardy response, "Let the Constabulary remove the intruders." I ask, is that conduct worthy of a Government? Was there ever a Government that was worthy of the name that would have allowed its citizens to take the initiative in a case of this kind before it had the courage to perform its duty? I say the Government, in this respect, deserves reprobation both by this House and by the country. It has been said—and I believe it has been repeated within the last day or two by one member of the Government—in relation to a claim that has been made, that the settlers at Taranaki have been well paid by the disturbance, even as things stand. Why, Sir, is it to be said that the utter want of confidence amongst us, the utter impossibility of making a bargain even for the most trifling amount, is well repaid by such profits as may be obtained by feeding a couple of hundred men? Was there ever anything so monstrous as that? What is it to me, living in the bush? What is that to my fellow-settlers owning some forty or fifty acres of land, or living on some ten or twelve acres of clearing in the heart of the bush? What fat contracts have we got, or what fat contracts are we likely to get? Is drilling three days a week—is having to leave our work, and travel ten or twelve miles over roads where the mud lies so thick that it is up to your horse's girths if you ride, and above your knees if you walk, repaid for by provisioning a couple of hundred men? The thing is monstrous and absurd, on the face of it. Will it pay me to get a couple of pounds per head extra for my oxen, if my wife is shot and my children murdered? The thing is so monstrous that no words are strong enough to express our reprobation of it. Then, how is it proposed to settle the matter? I apprehend we know just as much from the newspapers as we are likely to get from the Government. When the Government were asked—last year, I think—to lay on the table of the House official intelligence of their interviews with Rewi, and their celebrated confabulations with Tawhiao, what did they give? They laid on the table a most marvellous production of newspaper clippings, a copy of which reached me at Taranaki, and which I had an opportunity of perusing. But I think we are just as capable ourselves as are the Government of making those newspaper clippings, and can get just as much information in that way as the Government are likely to give us. As far as I can make out, they have no policy for the future. We, the people of the district, have a policy. It may be a mistaken one, but at any rate it is a policy on which we are all united. It is a policy of peace, too, and not of war. It is a policy for physical changes in the aspect of the country. Our policy is to make roads through the disaffected district, acquire the land, sell it, and settle it with Europeans. In the Inglewood District we are not afraid of the Maoris; and why? Because every man of us is armed—badly, I know, but still armed—and every man is determined that no hostile Maori shall come into the district. You might have the same thing in the disturbed district if you had only the courage to spend a sufficient sum—and it need only be a small sum—in making roads. Perhaps it will be said that it would be spending money amongst us. As far as I am concerned, I should not reap a penny benefit from it, except in the indirect way of having peace established. Separated by two days' journey from that district, such expenditure would in no sense or way be one in which the Taranaki settlers of my constituency would be personally interested, except in the sense in which all the people of the colony would be interested—the establishment of peace. Our policy is as distinct from the no-policy of the Government as possible. Our road-making policy would be preliminary to the policy of settlement. And here, again, when we talk of a policy of settlement we are at issue once more with the Prime Minister. He has put it forth that it would be an excellent plan to place the sons of men from the South Island on the land as military settlers. I and, I think, my constituents will join issue with the honorable gentleman on that point. We say that military settlers have never succeeded in New Zealand. We have them all round us in Taranaki; and, of all the military settlements established there, not one has succeeded. I go even further, and say that, looking to the experience of the whole world, I know of no military settlement that has succeeded. I myself come from a country where military settlements have been established, and I should like to know what they have done for Ireland during the last three hundred years. I should like to know how they have advanced the interests of that country. But I look at the question not only from an historical point of view, but in view of the actual facts of what has taken place in Taranaki; and I view with jealousy any attempt to establish further military settlements there. The policy of the colony, I am sure, ought not to be the establishment of military settlements, but making roads and settling the land on precisely the same principle as has been adopted in regard to settlements lately formed in other parts of the country. Sell the land to the highest bidder, and out of the proceeds give protection to your settlers. This protection would be easy if you follow out the first part of the programme—that of making roads—and then along those roads establish settlements. I have propounded a policy for the consideration of the Government which we in my district believe to be a good one; but I have no hope that those honorable gentlemen will follow it out, and therefore I cannot in my conscience give them my support. Some hard things have from time to time been said of the Native Minister, but I have no ill word to say against him; and I should be very sorry if any remark of mine should be taken as personal either with regard to him or to any other member of the Ministry, for both he and they have been most civil to me. I believe they are, according to their light, doing their duty; but I believe that the light that is within them is for the greater part darkness. There is another matter which I have omitted to mention, and which has been upon my mind and upon the minds of all the people I represent. In speaking about it, I think I may honestly say I represent the feelings of ninety-nine out of every hundred of the freeholders of the Grey and Bell District. There have been from time to time hints thrown out that we in that district are interested to a large extent in agitating the Natives in order to get their land. If any lawyer thinks he can make a fortune out of the titles to land in Taranaki, I am afraid he will find he has made a great mistake. For myself, I may say I never had, and probably never shall have, an acre of Native land. The feeling of the people there in regard to the Native lands is, that you should make ample reserves for the Natives. I have already referred to two large tracts—aggregating something like sixty-five thousand acres of the very richest land in the island—granted to two tribes. No man in my district in any way grudges them that. And, more than that, there are men like Honi Pihama and others, who, though at one time at war with us, have since then been sincere in their friendship; and we say, "Reward them better than you have ever rewarded Natives before." With regard to our enemies—those who have given us trouble—we say the same thing. Give them more than they require; give them ample reserves, and do it at once. Do not let the thing hang over. But above all things we ask you to individualize the land. Some will lease it; some will sell it: make every provision that you can in order that they may be honestly dealt with both in leasing and selling. Let it be done by the Government if you like, or by public auction if you think it better. We have no objection. Let the money be funded if you will, so that they may not spend it all in drink. Remember that one of the difficulties we have in making the Natives take up titles is, that they fear, if they do take them up, all the money will get into the hands of the grog-sellers. Therefore we say, Make ample provision against a difficulty of that kind. When you have done all that, you will have abundance of land for sale, which will be so enhanced in value by the making of roads that there will be more than enough for the making of these roads in the increased price of the land. Passing from the Natives, perhaps I may be allowed to say one or two words in reference to the three principal points in what is called the Liberal programme. I have already said that from early youth until now I have advocated Liberalism, and not merely a milk-and-water Liberalism, but Radicalism; and therefore I speak in every sense as a Liberal. With regard to the extension of the franchise, my position is a very simple one. I should say that upon all points I feel absolutely free. My constituents have made no terms with me. They took me with whatever faults and failings I had, and with the opinions that I was known to possess. They asked me no questions about them. They took it for granted that I would act honestly; and I do not come here as their delegate, but as their representative. With regard to the franchise, I have this to say: In my own district I find that about six hundred freeholders are not on the roll at the present moment, owing partly to their own carelessness and to a very large extent to the want of facility in the law, and also, I may say, to this fact: that you have two laws which contradict each other, or, rather, one which was meant to supplement the other, but does not. For instance, in the Electoral Act there are provisions by which a man is required to give various particulars with regard to his holding, his residence, and so on. But in another Act—I think the Act of 1875—there is a clause which provides that the Clerk of a Road Board is to send in, on or before the 31st March, the names of all persons who have paid rates previous to that date. Well, acting under the provisions of this Act, names have been sent to the proper authority, but the lists have been thrown into the waste-paper basket because they did not give the particulars required by the other Act. The consequence is, that in my district not less than six hundred freeholders were disqualified from voting at the last election. I may state that in one road near my house—I think the road to which my farm extends—out of twenty-seven freeholders only three were upon the roll. That will show how, partly by the operation or non-operation of the law, and partly by the carelessness of the people themselves, numbers are kept off the register; and the 65,000 serfs that have been so much talked about would, I think, vanish into thin air if a proper investigation were made all over the colony, such as I have made in my district. If those persons I have mentioned were put on the register, I venture to say there would not be two dozen men over twenty-one years of age in the whole of the Grey and Bell District who would be placed on the register by manhood suffrage. I say that advisedly, after consultation with those persons in the constituency who know most about it. But if the number were ten times two dozen it would not frighten me. I say distinctly and clearly, Put them on. And I say that, if a Bill—an honest Bill—for I regard the measure of the session before last as one which was never meant to be passed—if an honest Bill be brought forward with a real intention of being passed, it shall have my cordial support. But I will give my consent to no Bill that will swamp the European constituencies by Maori votes. My constituency, like many others in the North Island, would be easily swamped under the Bill that was introduced by the Premier; and in this way: We have between Waitara and Urenui some twelve thousand or fourteen thousand acres of magnificent land. It is entirely in the hands of the Natives, and it is held in common. Its owners are scattered all over the two Islands. An immense number of them do not reside in the district at all. With an unscrupulous—I was going to say Native Minister—but with an unscrupulous servant of the Native Office hundreds and hundreds of names could at any time be placed upon the roll; and under the secret system of the Native Office the men could be brought from time to time, as occasion required, to swamp the genuine electors at an election. I will therefore oppose any measure which will give that kind of dual voting. So long as the Natives fulfil the conditions of citizenship which Europeans have to fulfil—if they pay taxes as we pay them—then I have no objection at all to the Natives standing exactly on an equality with myself; but I altogether object to men who pay no taxes, except the merest trifle indirectly, who do not live in the district, who have no special interests, who have not a foot of land they can say is their own individually—I say I object to these men being brought from time to time, at the will of any man, or any underling of any man, to swamp the genuine settlers at an election. To a fair and honest franchise I offer no opposition. Nay, I go further than that. I do not see why it should stop at manhood suffrage. For thirty years I have advocated female suffrage, and I see no reason why it should not be introduced here. But that is not the question of the moment. When the time comes, when younger men take it up, as I hope they will do, it will have my support. In the meantime I will give my support to any honest and well-considered measure for universal suffrage in the old-fashioned sense. Then, with regard to the redistribution of seats. There again my course is perfectly clear. Population I believe ought to be the main basis: there is no question in my mind about that. It ought to be the main basis, but I do not believe it ought to be the only one. And here I want to free myself altogether from an argument which I have seen reported in Hansard as having been made use of in this House, and which I know is a very common one amongst my Tory friends. It is this: that in addition to population you must look at property. Now, Sir, in looking at population, I, in the main, do look at property, because I believe that property and population, as a rule, go together—that is to say, that the valuation of, say, the City of Wellington, with its 20,000 or so inhabitants, will probably be about the same as the valuation in a larger district with the same amount of population. The value may even be more, for, owing to exceptional circumstances, the valuation of a town increases out of all ratio to the population. But I do not go by that at all. I will not look at property. I say it is sufficiently recognized in the mere fact of the larger population. But I think that the Bill should deal with this matter itself—that its provisions should be directly introduced in this House, and not be worked out by a machinery outside. And I say so upon this ground: that, in dealing with this matter, you want the advice and assistance of all concerned—and you cannot get that advice and assistance unless you have them to give you information—in this regard, which I have not seen mentioned in the speeches of honorable gentlemen during the last Parliament, but which I throw out for the consideration of those who may have to bring in a Bill on the subject. It is this: It seems to me that there is no antagonism, and never can be any real antagonism, between town and country. The interests are identical. In whatever aspect you put them, to any reasonable man the two interests are identical. But, Sir, they are not always considered to be identical. Apart from mere interest there is a sentiment and an appa-opposition of feeling. This has been shown in n case at the last election, and, if honorable men will permit me to say a word about a ratively private matter, I will illustrate the n I wish the House to see. During the n the cry against me was that I was op- to the harbour of New Plymouth. Well, indly did make a journey to Wellington two go, when Parliament was sitting, and I saw l honorable gentlemen, and thought I had ded them—as they said they were per- l—to take my view of the subject. How- hey afterwards changed their minds—I did ame them for it—and, instead of opposing ill that was then before Parliament, they for it, and the measure was passed, and we to get a harbour. It will naturally be hat the people of New Plymouth, who very earnest about getting the harbour, me very little good-will. Now, I was for their interests, as I thought and be- ; but they did not think so. What was the uence? Almost to a man they opposed the election. They had a large number of —a couple of hundred—in the town, and I t think I am betraying the secrets of the box when I say that I got precious few of votes. In the country districts the num- ood thus: 90 for me, 2 for my opponent; me, 16 for my opponent. It was just the e, however, in the town. Now, the interests e two places were entirely identical, but was a misapprehension as to their true in- s in one place or the other—I am not pre- to say which. Although their interests absolutely identical, their sentiments and gs were adverse. That will, I hope, illus- in a sufficiently explicit way what I mean. ave feelings that are not in common, and, ore, if you join them forcibly in the bonds, r say, of wedlock, they will be pulling against other. Therefore, in forming the new con- ncies I believe the only true and honest plan, he only effective plan in the end, will be to ler the feelings of constituencies—the natural es of gravity, as it were, of the various consti- ies; and, whether there be a thousand more or a thousand more there, let them be joined e Nature has joined them and where sentiment joined them. Well, Sir, with that qualifi- n I will go in for a free redistribution of seats. ievie that every one of the gentlemen with a I am acting will do the same. Then we to the subject of triennial Parliaments. , again, I think we may have a perfectly and open understanding. It has been said we are not sincere. The honorable member uckland City East said he could not believe we would sincerely carry out the views ex- ed by the honorable member for Selwyn, see we could not be thought to be in earnest e point. I have no hesitation in saying that r person I have spoken to on this side of the se has expressed his intention of voting for honest Triennial Bill. My own feeling is not warm one way or the other. I feel about as I feel about many other indifferent ques- ; and my constituents do not care a rap about it. They told me so in plain words. I am free to vote as I think proper, and they will be satisfied; therefore I say, in a free and independent way, that I am perfectly prepared to vote for triennial Parliaments. I have dealt with three points upon which it has been said that what is called the Liberal party differs from ours, which I suppose I must call the Constitutional party. The word "constitutional" is a very good one, but it has always been associated in my mind with such an abominable perversion of its meaning that I do not like the name. I do not intend to call myself that. I am a Radical. Then let us see how we stand with regard to the Liberal party. The Liberal party with which I have always been connected was a very peculiar one. It was frequently in a minority. I have been used to being in minorities, but I have always seen my minorities change into majorities. Well, Sir, what was the general principle—the raison d'être—of the Liberal party at Home. Its characteristic was to bring people together—to make one nation out of two or three—to abolish privileges, not by bringing men down, or robbing them of what they had acquired, but by taking away artificial barriers, and enabling men to rise to any position to which Nature would allow them to rise. That was the function of the Liberal party ever since there was a Liberal party in Great Britain. Let us take the case of the agitation to abolish the corn laws. That carries us back to the time when those of us who are beginning to get grey hairs were young. Well, what did we say to those who supported the old institutions, the old law—which, after all, was not a very old one, for it did not come to us from the mists of antiquity? What was one of the arguments used then? "We impoverish no man; we enrich many. We take away no real privilege; but we bring men into the enjoyment of privileges. We take away no man's acre—we take no man's land; but we refuse any longer to support by artificial buttresses a system which ought to have come to the ground long ago." That was the position taken up on that question. Then, let us come to the Irish Church. When, in 1868, we agitated the country on that question—and I took an active part in the agitation in my own district—did we go about as robbers, robbing men of their own? No. We said, "You, as a Church, will be benefited by it. What we are doing is for your good. We are taking nothing from you to which you are entitled; we only ask you to do as men before you have done. We ask you to walk alone, that you may enjoy the feeling of your own strength." And that we succeeded, take this little anecdote as a proof. A few years after the passage of the Act, being in Belfast, and having nothing to do on a particular day, I entered a railway-carriage to go to a part of the country I had not seen, and in the carriage I saw a lady and a sick boy. I was attracted to them because they had been fellow-passengers with me in a steamer the night before. The air was full of the Irish Church question, and in a very short time the lady introduced the subject. She said, "The Liberal party meant to destroy us, but God has turned their act to our good." I said, "We worked for your good. We told you it would be for your good; and I am glad to hear from your testimony that it has been so." This was the wife of a dignitary of the Church in a cathedral town. Well, that is precisely the position the Liberal party has always occupied at Home. It has tried, not to pull down, not to do evil to anybody, but to do good to all. We started two centuries ago, or more. We started with the determination to do good to men, and we, the Liberal party of to-day, hold the principles of our fathers. We may have made mistakes—no doubt we have, from time to time—but that has been the great aim and object of the party. We have tried to level class distinctions; we have tried to make men look upon themselves as men; we have tried to make men look upon their brothers as men; and, to a large extent, though not to the full extent, we have succeeded. That is the Liberal party at Home. But what is the Liberal party here? Its special function is to denounce men if they hold land. Its special function seems to be to raise up artificial barriers where Nature and the law have made none. If there be artificial barriers here, why has no law been introduced for their abatement. I learned to-day, for the first time since I came here, that the law of entail is in existence in New Zealand. Why have Ministers not attempted to repeal that law? At Home the large estates are kept up by it. We of the Liberal party have fought against it; but we do not wish to cut down the large estates by artificial means. All that is desired by the Liberal party at Home is that Nature shall have its fair way, and that the possession of estates shall be as free as the possession of any other kind of property. Why has the Liberal party not endeavoured to prevent some of the evils which take place at Home? The fact is, the Liberal party here has not been in earnest in its Liberalism, or else its leaders do not know what Liberalism is. I should be sorry to impute motives to men, and I will therefore take the latter alternative, and say that if it be the function of the so-called Liberal party here to flatter the poor man and to denounce the rich, to flatter mobs and to denounce the educated, then the sooner the Liberal party is squelched the better, and a new Liberal party, built upon new lines, put in its place. What is the Liberal at Home? He has no more fear of facing the mob than he has of facing the aristocrats of the Upper House; but here every person that can pretend to be a working-man is flattered and cajoled as if he were an infant. There ought to be more respect for the working-man than this. Why, what am I? If I am seen at home, I am in rage, and work as hard as any of them. Then, what are the others? What are these men who are so much appealed to? I say this is mountebankism, and not Liberalism; and, until these men who are the leaders of the Liberal party come forward and try to lead these men to better and not to worse, I will not follow them. I happened to-day to see a few lines which very correctly represent the actions of these men. They are as follow:—

Colonel Trimble

In short, I do firmly believe
In humbug generally,
For it's a thing that I perceive
To hev a solid rally.

The humbug that has been carried on during the last elections seems to me to be very much of the kind described in these lines. There is a certain "rally" about it; but it is a value that will not stand for long. I will counsel those young men who have spoken from the opposite benches, not to desert their party, so-called—but, above all, not to desert their principles. I say to them, let them be able to stand in a minority, and hold their ground in a minority. Let them cleave fast to principles and let loose their hold of men of loose principles. I do not ask them to come to us. They do not know us sufficiently, and I do not know them. But I say this to them—and it is a thing I have never seen lose its value: Keep hold of your convictions. Do not be afraid of your enthusiasms even; and you may depend upon it that if you give full sway to enthusiasm, but under the guidance of right reason, you need not be afraid to face even that old age to which you have appealed.

Mr. MOSS. — Sir, I feel that it would be somewhat impertinent on my part as a member of only two sessions to speak as I would like to do of the manner in which the debate has been so far conducted, and, I may say, the decided improvement in tone which has been caused by the dissolution and the appearance among us of so many new members. At the same time, I desire to express that feeling, and a hope that nothing I shall say will in the slightest degree change the tone, although on many points I shall be bound to differ very materially indeed from many of those gentlemen who have spoken before me. I should like in the first instance to refer to the manner in which the debate was opened by the honorable member for Selwyn—the leader of the Opposition. Nothing could have exceeded the good taste, good temper, and courtesy with which the honorable member spoke. But it appears to me he must have felt that he had a very poor case indeed. The whole speech was just such a speech as we might have expected to hear, not from one contesting grave questions of policy on which the whole future of a young country depends, not from one who was fighting a Government endeavouring to carry out that policy, but rather from one who treated the subject more as if it were a question of displacing one Chairman of a County Council and electing another. We heard of the "Hinemoa," of a bridge here, of a clock there, and of a water-race somewhere else. No great questions of policy were touched upon, none of the real differences that exist between that side of the House and this were referred to; and upon that speech we are asked to give a vote that will displace a Government which I believe has been honestly struggling against great and immense difficulties during the last three years—struggling in a House in which it was in a minority—struggling against division in its own ranks,—but which has roused public opinion throughout New Zealand, and brought before the people of the country great questions which, until that Government came forward, were not even mentioned. I was disappointed also with the speech of the honorable member for Cheviot, although I think the same excuse is to be made for that honorable member as I hope will be granted to me, that he, like myself, is to a great extent travelling over old ground. We spoke over and over again on this subject last session, and we now come somewhat stale to the question. The new members are able to throw more life and vigour into the debate, and clothe it with the flesh and blood which it deserves. Unless we deal with the larger questions involved in this contest, as well as with the mere questions of water-races, the "Hinemoa," Christchurch clock, and things of that kind, the debate will sink to the level to which, I am sorry to say, it sank last session. The speech of the honorable member for Cheviot suggested this thought to my mind, because he ridiculed every attempt to elevate the debate out of that rut as "celestial." The speech of the honorable member who opened the debate was "terrestrial," but anything that rises out of that groove is, according to the honorable member for Cheviot, celestial. I will attempt to go into some of these celestial questions. I will try to show that we have something more to think about on the present occasion than the mere administration of the Government, and I hope I shall be able to show good grounds for continuing that Government in office, despite errors of administration, for I am not at all prepared to defend everything that the Government have done. Despite those errors of administration, I hope I shall be able to adduce sufficient grounds why that Government ought to remain in office until it has had an honest chance of carrying out the policy which it has so long and, I believe, honestly enunciated, but which it has never yet had the power to bring down for fair consideration before the House. Before I go further, let me refer to the speech of the honorable member for Grey and Bell. In listening to him I felt that my sentiments and his own were so much in accord—that his sympathies and mine so thoroughly agreed—that it was astonishing he should be so earnest in his support of that side of the House, and that I should be equally earnest in my support of this. The only cause to which I can attribute the difference between us is, that the honorable member has not been twenty years in New Zealand, as I have been, and he has not been able to trace the history of the country and watch the struggles that have gone on. The honorable member has only been here a few years, and perhaps, therefore, is not able to see how little applicable English rules and precedents are to our condition. I am afraid, also, that the honorable member has suffered himself to be misled by newspaper reports, because he has not had an opportunity of hearing most of the things absolutely said in this House. Had he been here he would have found a very different condition of things. He would have found how little real debate there is in this House. He would have found the party with whom he is now working scorning debate when they found themselves strong, and carrying everything with a very high hand. That is one reason why we on this side of the House are determined they shall not get into power again. Before the present Ministry came into power we used to see fifty men, who had scarcely listened to a word of debate, trooping in one after the other to record their votes in favour of the Ministry of the day; and debate became a farce. Something dropped from the honorable member which led me to think that he has misunderstood much that has been said on this side of the House. He referred to 65,000 serfs who were to be emancipated in New Zealand by the policy we are supporting. I do not know where that phrase came from. It must be a phrase coined by some newspaper.

HON. MEMBERS.—It is in Hansard.

MR. MOSS.—Is it in Hansard? Was it stated that there are serfs in New Zealand, or that there might be serfs here in future? That makes all the difference. I have heard it said that the policy we propose will avoid the creation of serfs in future; but certainly I have no recollection of anybody saying that there are serfs in New Zealand now. I mention this to show that the honorable member does not clearly understand us on this side of the House. I should think it an insult to any working-man in the colony to call him a serf. I maintain, however, that, but for the public opinion lately roused in New Zealand, some time hence we should have serfs here. I will undertake to prove it. I will show that the whole course of our policy here was tending towards that. Then, again, the honorable member spoke of the upset price of land on the Waimate Plains being lowered to £5, as if it were done by the Government to lower the value of the land in the public estimation. But that land was put up to auction; £5 was merely the upset price; and the probability is that it was lowered to excite larger competition. It is not as if £5 was the price at which the land should be bought. I think the honorable member will admit he was wrong in that point of the indictment he brought against the Government. With regard to the law of entail, this is the first time I have heard it stated that the law of entail exists in New Zealand. I do not think so. It is statute law in England, and a very old one, under which entails exist; and I doubt whether it applies to New Zealand. I do not know of any case in which it has been attempted to be brought into force. But I would call the special attention of the honorable member for Grey and Bell to what was done by the present Government the session before last. They brought down a Bill which placed real property in the same position as personal property, and provided that when an intestate estate was being administered the real property should be divided equally among the children.

MR. HALL.—That was done long ago.

MR. MOSS.—I have a distinct recollection that the Administration Bill was brought down the session before last.

MR. HALL.—It was a mere technical amendment.

MR. MOSS.—I know the Bill was brought down; but I accept at once the statement of the honorable member. My honorable friend near me, who is a lawyer, knows better than I do, and he still says that I am right. It is admitted by the Opposition that the Bill introduced was an amending measure. At all events it was a step in the right direction. I know this, that, small as that reform may be considered, it is one which Mr. Bright has tried in vain for years to have carried out at Home. Another expression fell from my honorable friend the member for Grey and Bell. He spoke of us on this side of the House as flattering mobs, and said that was not true Liberalism. We hold this opinion—and I say that experience justifies us in holding it—that, if you take New Zealand from one end to the other, there is no such thing as a mob in it. We know of no mob in New Zealand. I only wish my honorable friend lived in a more populous place than Taranaki. I only wish he saw three thousand or four thousand people assembled together, as in the larger towns, conducting their business in an orderly manner, carrying on their proceedings in such a way as could not be surpassed anywhere, coming to a most clear and intelligent decision, and free from all rowdiness of any kind. Happily we have no mobs in New Zealand, and one of the main points in our liberal programme is, that we do not intend to have them. If education, fair treatment, a share—a full share—in the government of the country can avoid that greatest of calamities, the creation of mobs, then we shall not have laboured in vain in promoting this liberal policy. Then, again, we are told that we rail at those who own large estates, and that the people of England do not rail at the holders of large properties. I do not rail at persons who have large estates. I think it is exceedingly fortunate to have these estates; but I say that we are in great danger of these men not only having the estates, but being the ruling class in the country. It is to avoid this that we want to see legislation in the direction indicated in the Governor's Speech. We envy no man his property, and we desire to curtail no man's estate by unfair means; but we say, Keep your estates; rejoice in the wealth that you possess; rejoice in the increased influence which that wealth, properly used, will always give you—you have an immense advantage over those who have no wealth, in that respect; but do not claim one iota more voice in the government of the country than other men, with wives and families, who contribute largely to the general taxation of the country. We require that every man shall have an equal voice in the government of the country. That is the only safeguard from the evils which large estates have always brought about in other countries; which the honorable member for Grey and Bell, and all who choose to give a candid expression to their views, must admit. Are we to be told that we are premature in this? Let me refer to an extract from a paper showing what is the state of things in Cheviot County, represented by my honorable friend Mr. Saunders, and which is about equal in size to Middlesex. It is entirely comprised in three enormous freeholds, comprising

179,000 acres. In Waikato County there is one freehold of 80,000 acres. In Marlborough County there is one freehold of 89,000 acres, owned by two gentlemen both long absent from the colony, enjoying large revenues from this land, and contributing little or nothing to the taxation of the colony. In the same county there are ten other holdings, together comprising 220,000 acres of freehold and 64,000 acres of leasehold. In Amuri, eight freeholds comprise 248,000 acres; in Tūapeka, are one freehold of 70,000 acres and one of 20,640 acres; in Southland County, one freehold of 70,000 acres; and so on, showing ninety-six freeholds, containing two and a-half millions of acres; showing the tendency to accumulation of land in few hands, which honorable members on the other side, as well as on this, regard as a great evil if allowed to be the permanent condition of the country. There is a long list of these cases, but the aggregate result is, that there are about two millions and a-half of acres of land in the possession of a few people. Unless we take care, the inevitable result will be, that the holders of large estates will increase their estates, that they will acquire increased political influence, and that they will in the course of another hundred years be really the ruling class in this country. This has been the inevitable course of things in other countries. Let us go back twenty years in the history of New Zealand. What was the position then? We had self-governing bodies elected by the people. Those bodies administered the lands in the interests of the people, and passed the most liberal land laws that could be proposed. There was every desire to see the country settled. At the same time there was always passed by this House a Gold Fields Act, which traversed the liberal provisions of the provincial Land Act. The Provincial Governments were crippled by the claims made for compensation, and the liberal designs of Provincial Governments were destroyed. In the North we have seen the same influence brought to bear over and over again in the acquisition of large estates. Men have hired land from the Natives—land inalienable, which they could by law only lease for twenty-one years. Having so hired it, and got possession, the next step is to purchase from individual Natives the freehold of the land, of course at a very low price, because the transaction is an illegal one. Having obtained the freehold, the possessor comes to the Government of the day and says, "I want you to pass an Order in Council authorizing the Natives to sell this land." Has not that been done over and over again? A mere bogus sale is authorized, because the Natives have already sold it. The Order in Council is simply to cover an illegal act. I desire to show my honorable friend the member for Grey and Bell that, having witnessed all these things in the past, I have acquired an earnest desire not to see the whole power of the country thrown into the hands of any one class of men. I have seen the provincial institutions destroyed in a manner not creditable to those who took part in their destruction. I have seen them for twenty-five years deliberately undermined and sapped, privilege after privilege, and power after power taken from them, and every advantage taken in this House to bring them into poverty and contempt. After all, they were abolished by an Act teeming with bribes—bribes to County Councils, bribes to local governing bodies, bribes to every public body in the country, paid from money which certainly belonged to the people, and not to the Government who presumed to give it. Supposing the Government had money available for these local bodies, I will defy any one to give a single reason why the Provincial Governments should not have had that money instead of the local bodies; but the Provincial Governments were carefully kept without a penny. This House fostered a feeling of jealousy also between the town and the country. The members representing country districts were encouraged to believe that their districts were being oppressed by the towns. These were the means by which the old state of things was upset, and which led to the state of things that now prevails. We have engendered by this course a feeling of wide distrust in this Assembly. I do not hesitate to say it; I have a perfect right to say it. We have here a body that arrogates to itself powers unknown to any other Legislature in any colony; because it has been the aim of those who have struggled to retain power in their hands to put this Assembly above the Constitution of the country. The old Constitution provided that representation should be strictly according to population. It also provided that we should have numerous bodies to distribute power, to distribute patronage; but we have seized the powers once wielded by those bodies, and we have assumed to ourselves the whole power, the whole patronage, and the whole revenue of the country. I say there is great danger to the country, unless there be legislation of such a kind that we in our turn shall be controlled by the people, and not control them. Any one who looks at the representation at this moment must see that it is unequal and unfair. For instance, my honorable friend the member for Cheviot represents one of the smallest constituencies in the country—a constituency of 1,700 people—and yet he has an equal voice in the legislation to those who represent thousands. There are numerous other cases of the same kind. That is the position of things that has grown up; and it is a position full of danger. I want to ask honorable members this question: Will any one show that there was the slightest sign of appreciation of this danger, or the slightest desire to face it, in the public interest, until the present Government came into office? No. We were treated to all kinds of schemes of local government; we were treated to all kinds of talk about constitutionalism; but, until the present Government came into office, until it raised public opinion upon this great and vital question, the silence of death prevailed. The Assembly was fast getting into its hands an unequal distribution of seats—an unfair distribution of the represented—and the whole power of the country. In rousing public attention to these growing evils, this Government have done good service, and made me one of their most ardent supporters. An honorable member asked why the Land Boards were not made elective. Under the old system the Land Boards represented the provincial authorities, who, in their turn, were responsible to their Provincial Councils; and all their acts could be examined. But you destroyed all that: you destroyed the institutions that existed; you razed the whole fabric. And you cannot now make these and other Boards elective, because you cannot find or create the constituencies to elect them. I will now briefly refer to another of the charges alleged against the Government. I never heard any member of the Government—I have no recollection of hearing any member of the Government—or any member of this House, attribute to the people of Taranaki any of those motives which the honorable member for Grey and Bell believes have been attributed to them. They may have been attributed outside this House; but, so far as the Government and the members of this House are concerned, I have certainly never heard any other expression than that of admiration with regard to the conduct of the Taranaki people throughout the very serious difficulty in which, for some months past, they have been placed. I thoroughly appreciate the warmth of the honorable member's feelings when he speaks under the impression that his constituents had been traduced—

Colonel TRIMBLE.—It has been said within twenty-six hours of the present time.

Major ATKINSON.—And by a Minister of the Crown.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Name!

Mr. MOSS.—I think the honorable member must have heard some idle talk outside. I should like to ask the honorable member if he heard the Minister himself say it.

Colonel TRIMBLE.—I heard the same Minister say it on a former occasion.

Mr. MOSS.—I am sure, if he said such a thing, he would not be supported by his colleagues or their supporters. Then, Sir, the honorable gentleman says that before the present Government came into power everything was peace. In saying that, however, the honorable member makes a great mistake. Why, it is only some four or five years since, within fifty or sixty miles of Auckland, the then Government was obliged to employ armed men in the construction of the Waikato Railway. So recently as 1875 there were murders in the Waikato—there were the Sullivan, Todd, and other murders. Can the honorable member call that a condition of peace? When the predecessors of the present Government were in office we were told, "Above all things, preserve the peace; because, if you do not, the whole finances of the country will be deranged, and all sorts of trouble and disaster will ensue." That was then the cry. Now honorable members ask for a spirited policy. I know I am perfectly correct in what I say of Auckland Province. As to Taranaki, I am not prepared to say what was the condition of things there, but I know that since this Government came into office matters have become very much more secure on the Waikato frontier. Meetings have been held with the Natives, and the veil has been lifted which previously obscured what was being done in that part of the country. We now know that the people there are perfectly safe. We have not heard the slightest fear expressed by the settlers there whilst all this trouble has been in existence on the West Coast. I had occasion last session to mention that I was present at the great meeting at Te Kopua, which I heard described as a failure. I was present for nine or ten days, and to me it appeared one of the greatest successes ever achieved. It dissipated all fear of the Natives beyond the border so thoroughly that no one has raised the voice of alarm since. And it is upon that border that the greatest number of Natives are located. Again, I would like to remind honorable members that we do not stand alone among nations in dealing with the Natives in this respect. In the Indian Territory, in the United States, sixty-five thousand Indians are located, and, although here and there a Resident Commissioner is settled, no European is allowed to settle there—to buy land there; no European has been able to buy land there, except upon one condition—that he marries a native woman and becomes one of the tribe; and that is a rule that not many Europeans will conform to. You see that we are not the only people who are dealing with Natives in the manner that has been pointed out, when a powerful country like the United States allows a large portion of its territory to be isolated, and the native people to govern themselves. I will not trouble the House with many more remarks on the subject, because I feel I shall only be, to a certain extent, repeating what I said last session; and I feel therefore somewhat half-hearted in speaking on the matter; but I could not allow the opportunity to pass without explaining why two members who, I believe are thoroughly in accord in their political principles—the honorable member for Grey and Bell and myself—are not at this moment both found on this side of the House. I attribute it to my having had experience of the way in which affairs have been conducted in New Zealand which the honorable gentleman has not yet had. I believe that when the honorable member has been longer in the country, when he has thoroughly studied the history of the past, it will shake his faith in the party to which he seems wedded at the present time. We are now all Liberals in this country. The Opposition say they are Liberals: but their liberalism is of very recent date. This the honorable member for Grey and Bell will soon find. He will find that not long since it was the custom to deride public opinion in this House.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Oh, oh!

Mr. MOSS.—I state what I know to be true. When great meetings were held to protest against the Abolition measure, not the slightest attention was paid to the opinions of those outside—they were told that they were the opinions of the mob. Not the slightest attention was paid to these opinions. And now we are all Liberals. To show what a sudden change must have come over them, I will refer to some specimens of the liberalism we had when the party opposite was in power. The first State prosecution—which I hope to be the last in this country—was instituted by their Government, and instituted in order to crush an individual.

Mr. Moss

That was the way in which the late Government dealt with persons who opposed them: they crushed them, if they could, if they found that they were at all troublesome and there were no other means of silencing them. If the opinions of the late Government were liberal, why did they support the Waka Maori, in defiance of a vote of this House—for which they now profess so much respect—until it was brought up and the Government had to dispense £6,000 in paying for a libel? Was that the action of a Liberal party, who will not allow the smallest error on the part of the present Government? When we hear so much talk about the "Hinemoa," I would ask who purchased her, and, so far as I recollect, without any vote of the House? Who was it that entered into great railway contracts involving many thousands of pounds, and, after bringing a contractor into the country, had to make arrangements with him on account of the specifications not being ready? I refer to the Brogdens. Who did that? We hear of waste; we hear of extravagance; and we hear it from a party that for years supported a Government that admitted it had for its own purposes wasted one and a half millions of money. Has the present Government ever done anything to be compared with the acts of the Government that preceded it? I say, No. Again, we hear to-day of gross wrongs being done to the Civil Service of the country by putting over the heads of others men who have no claim to be so placed. Why, Sir, the whole of the offices are filled with men brought out from England by previous Governments—brought out from England because there were not men good enough in the colony, and that by members whom we now hear reproaching the Government for neglecting the interests of the Civil Service. Any honorable member could count on his fingers half a dozen instances of the appointments that I refer to. Again, we hear of newspapers being bribed by paltry advertisements. Why, Sir, the newspaper history of the colony is one record for years of the attempts of previous Governments to get the Press into their hands by means of forming companies—companies of all kinds, and means of all kinds used to effect that end. Why, in those days the Government of the country cared little what means they employed to obtain support, so long as they got it. I believe that more wrong was done by the late Government in five years—that there was more nepotism, more friends put into office, more wrong done to the Civil servants, and more wrong done to the country during those five years—than the present Government could be charged with for the next twenty years, if it remained in office. They tell us also that the policy they adopted was in the interests of the whole people. Take the public works policy. There is a policy in which millions of money have been borrowed, and enormous burdens placed on the people. How has that money been spent? Has it not been spent in increasing the value of the enormous properties held by a comparatively few people? When that borrowing was first agreed to, was it not one of the chief conditions that any deficiency in the payment of interest that might be found on the working of the railways was to be charged to the districts through which the railways ran? But no sooner are the railways made than we find that burden, too, thrown on the people; and any man who dared to oppose this is denounced as a Communist. Then, again, look at the whole system of taxation of the country. We now find honorable members earnest and sincere Liberals on that side of the House—anxious to see a change in the incidence of taxation. May I ask when that desire first sprang up in their minds?

Mr. HURSTHOUSE.—Four years ago.

Major ATKINSON.—We advocated that long ago.

Mr. MOSS.—I challenge the honorable member to tell me when.

Major ATKINSON.—I will tell you when I speak.

Mr. MOSS.—I challenge the honorable member to deny that, until there arose a cry from this side of the House that the incidence of taxation was unfair—that the taxation was such that the inevitable result must be to make the rich richer and the poor poorer—I challenge him to deny that, until the cry arose from this side of the House for a change in the incidence of taxation, Governments were utterly deaf to what they now admit to be so grievously wrong. And yet we now hear they are all Liberals, strongly imbued with liberal principles, only eager to get on those benches in order to carry their principles into effect. So far as the land-tax is concerned, I was never a very ardent admirer or supporter of that. My own predisposition is to leave transactions of that kind alone as far as possible. I have no antipathies to landholders. I say let them enjoy their land; but do not let them get into a position in which they will rule us who have not these large possessions. I would not interfere with land, except to deprive it of privileges which do not attach to other kinds of property. We hear it said that there is no difference between parties—that the sympathies of all are world-wide—that each party embraces all men. I venture to say that is contrary to human nature. There must be a set of men in every community who believe exclusively in their own class—there must be men who think that, if their own particular sect is prosperous and wealthy, the world is at peace. These men are not Liberals; they cannot be Liberals. A Liberal must be a man who can raise himself above the idea of caste, and look upon all men as having equal rights to have a voice in the management of the affairs of the country. That is my test of Liberalism, and I hold no man to be a Liberal who cannot in-dorse the opinion that every man has a fair and equal right to a fair and equal voice in the government of the country, whatever his position or wealth. In that lies the great issue before us. Then why do we hear such speeches as we have heard to-night from the honorable member for Grey and Bell—why should he support the bill of indictment laid before the House simply because there have been a few errors in administration,—matters which could be easily remedied without turning the present Government out of office—matters which cannot justify the exertions that are being made on that side of the House to turn the Government out of office? When I notice the persistency of the attempt to oust the present Government, I must be excused for doubting the genuineness of the professions of Liberalism we hear so strongly expressed on that side of the House. I admit there must be some members on the other side of the House who feel differently,—men who have fought hard for the cause of Liberalism, but who now consider that these errors of administration are sufficient to justify them in turning out of office the only really Liberal Government that we have ever possessed in the history of New Zealand—a Government that has proved itself during nearly three years' tenure of office—

Hon. MEMBERS.—Two years'.

Mr. MOSS.—I hope it may be five years'. A Government that has proved itself less self-seeking than any Government that we have ever had in office before, a Government—I speak of the members individually and collectively—that has proved itself more earnestly desirous of bringing the great mass of the people under the shadow of the new Constitution which we are now building up than any previous Government has ever shown itself to be. I will challenge the members of the Government which demolished the old Constitution to show what single thing they did to restore to the people the power that they took from them. Did they propose any extension of the franchise? Did they propose to redistribute the seats in this House. Did they propose to inaugurate a system of real local self-government. Did they propose to have triennial Parliaments, which we hear they are now so anxious to get. No: even when this Government came into office and proposed these measures they were opposed and thwarted in every way. Even the dissolution to which the Government were fairly entitled was refused; and to this wrong—it is a fact that ought to weigh heavily on the shoulders of the Governor who refused the dissolution—are to be attributed the evils which have since occurred. The Premier had to meet a House in every respect hostile to him, and he had to select his colleagues from among a body of men who were not united among themselves. And what do we find is the result? Errors committed by these individual members of the Cabinet are laid upon the head of the Premier himself. Of course, we all know that the Premier must, constitutionally, be held responsible for the acts of the Government individually and collectively, and I have no wish at all to shield him from that responsibility; but I do say one thing: that, knowing that for the acts of extravagance, acts of partial appointments to offices, and so forth, which are the basis of the indictment now brought forward—so well brought by the honorable member for Selwyn—the member of the Government less censurable than anybody is the Premier himself. I am sorry indeed to hear from all sides of the House statements that the Premier is the person who must be got rid of from the Ministry. We are told, "Oh, get rid of Grey, and you will find the whole thing will be right." I cannot understand it, and it makes me doubt the sincerity of some of those who raise the cry, and believe that there must be some other reason than that of anxiety for liberal measures, as they would have us think. I should like to refer to one other matter connected with a late Government, a very late Government: the honorable member for Egmont no doubt will know the Government I refer to. It made a great impression upon my mind, so great an impression that it influenced me greatly in forming my opinions. It was a scene that occurred upon the floor of this House. The Hon. the Premier, as Superintendent of Auckland, charged the Government with illegal conduct in connection with certain land transactions, and the statements of that gentleman were denounced as untrue. He sent a telegram to the Commissioner of Crown Lands to learn the particulars at the official source, in order that he might substantiate his charges, when it turned out that the Government, at the moment they were denying the statements on the floor of this House, had actually despatched a telegram prohibiting the Government Agent in Auckland from giving the information desired. That is the pure sort of Government we are asked to restore, and it is the party who could do such things that now make charges against this Government and ask us to act on those charges. The honorable member for Selwyn made a charge that the Government used the steamers in a most improper way, to influence votes—that they used public property for electioneering purposes; and the honorable member quoted from the records of the Imperial Parliament a resolution which set out that certain conduct was highly improper, and altogether subversive of the liberties of the people—the conduct being interference by Ministers with parliamentary elections. I was very much impressed with that, and thought it a most proper quotation, until I looked it up, and found that the interference so stigmatized was interference by the Government with dockyard employés to coerce them to vote for Government candidates. Why, there is not the shadow of a suspicion of anything of that kind against the Government. They certainly took the "Hinemoa" in order to convey the Premier to Christchurch and other parts of the colony; but does that justify these charges of corruption? Then it was said the telegraph had been brought into use for electioneering purposes; but where is the proof? One little miserable telegram is alleged to have been sent.

An Hon. MEMBER.—One specimen.

Mr. MOSS.—An honorable member calls it a "specimen." Well, all on this side of the House are disposed to believe it was the only instance, and I challenge any honorable member to prove that there were any more. Will the honorable member give us the slightest ground for believing it is not the only one? Still, I must say it took me by surprise. I cannot understand it, and know nothing about it. But, after all, these charges are, comparatively speaking, very trivial—charges such as were never before made against any Government that has had in its charge such measures as this Government have charge of. I think, before honorable members are induced to give their votes against the Government on such charges as these, even if true, that it would be well to ask who are to come after—who are to succeed those gentlemen on the Treasury benches. That is what I should like to know. Are we to have a repetition of that wretched state of affairs when one man directed the Assembly, when the most base influences were brought into play, both inside and outside this House, if opposition was manifested? I am personally prepared to prove this, if any honorable members will put me upon the proof. I can prove that most base and unworthy influences were brought to bear against newspaper writers who opposed the Government, and against any one who raised his voice in opposition. I ask, are we to have a repetition of that, or are we to have a Government on those benches that will content themselves with merely professing Liberalism? Is that what the Liberal party is dividing itself for? Honorable members need not tell me that this party, once broken, can be brought together readily, when a Liberal Government is driven from those benches. When a new Government once gets there, and is possessed of power, it is a very difficult thing to dislodge it.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. MOSS.—Unless their following is composed of men like the honorable member for Cheviot, who come into the House as supporters, and then vote against them. But even that process takes time; and I ask you, when we are defeated—if we are defeated—and the shattered members of the Liberal party seek reunion, do you suppose that will be an easy task? I confess I look forward with great doubt and dislike to the prospect, and therefore intend to give a hearty and cordial vote for the Government; until, at least, we have allowed them to avail themselves of this the first—the very first—opportunity they have had to carry into effect the policy they have so long promised the country.

Mr. GISBORNE.—Sir, I think, if there is one point which must have struck old members of the House with considerable surprise, it is the remarkable contrast which exists between the amendment moved by my honorable friend the member for Selwyn, and that moved last session by the then leader of the Opposition, Sir William Fox. When I look at the amendment moved to the Address in Reply last session by the then leader of the Opposition, I find that no policy was then indicated on the part of the Opposition. The mind of the Opposition was then a tabula rasa, susceptible of inscription afterwards. I suppose it was going to be educated. But now we see the germ of a policy in the amendment of the honorable member for Selwyn; but that policy is not theirs: it is ours. I congratulate the Opposition upon having at last achieved something like a policy, although it is rather an appropriation of the property of others. And the difference that exists between the amendment of my honorable friend and that of the leader of the Opposition last session is that the amendment of Sir William Fox was a sort of general commination of the Ministry. It consigned the Government to absolute and instant political perdition. The amendment of the honorable member for Selwyn is rather a mild moral lecture, and is couched in terms calculated to lead sinners to repentance: it really holds out to us a sort of prospective purgatory. Although we may be surprised at this important difference between the two amendments, we have not far to go to seek the cause of it. We have, since last session, undergone the process of what is called "going to the country." We still have a vivid recollection of that ordeal; and what the country insisted upon was the policy indicated in the Governor's Speech last session. That was impressed upon the minds of the Opposition, and they have profited thereby. Then the violent outcry that was raised against the Government last session has fallen quite flat upon the ears of the people of the country. The people have annulled the verdict on appeal to them during the elections. I say that, if the people believed one tithe of the grave charges which were levelled against the Government last session, there would not now be a majority of fourteen against us, as there was then, but a majority of forty. And I ask, do the most sanguine members of the Opposition believe that there will be a majority of even four against the Government? I believe in that calculation you might read the word "majority"—"minority." Where are the fourteen gentlemen who represented the majority against the Government last year? They have disappeared. They have gone to the country and there they have remained. They are virtually rusticated from Parliament. We see, then, the cause of this difference between the two amendments. And there is also a great difference in the manner of their introduction. The speech of the honorable member for Wangai last session was almost outrageous in the language used, while the speech of my honorable friend the member for Selwyn was quiet and calm to a degree in contrast to that of the preceding leader of the Opposition. But, Sir, the amendment of my honorable friend is open to criticism. It begins by saying, "We are prepared to give effect to the liberal measures desired by the country." What does that mean? It means that some of the Opposition will be reluctantly compelled to vote against their convictions, in order to keep their seats in Parliament on principles which they pretended to advocate in the speeches that gained them those seats. That is not satisfactory. Then we come to the censure of the Government, and it is, that the Ministry, "as at present constituted," have not the confidence of the House. What do the words "as at present constituted" mean? I do not suppose this House could have confidence in a Ministry "as not at present constituted." Therefore these words are introduced with some intention. I fail to find any precedent for the use of such words, excepting in the case, in 1866, when the present honorable member for Ashley moved a want-of-confidence motion in the same words—Mr. Stafford being Premier at the time. What was the effect of that motion? The effect was, that the Premier got rid of three or four of his colleagues, and took over Mr. Hall and two or three others from the Opposition side to form a new Ministry. Does the honorable member for Selwyn desire a similar process on this occasion?

Mr. HALL.—Certainly not.

Mr. GISBORNE.—Then what does he mean? Does he mean that he wishes to displace the Premier? If so, surely he has sufficient knowledge of constitutional practice to be aware that if he displaces the Premier he displaces the whole Ministry. What, then, is the object of the words "as at present constituted"? The honorable gentleman, in order to catch some stray votes, has put in those words; but I cannot see any other object in them. If the Premier resigns, the whole Ministry resigns, and the honorable member for Selwyn says he does not want to come over with some of his friends and join the Premier on these benches. I should like to say a few more words with regard to this amendment. It is to me quite a new phase of political morality for a great party in opposition to say to a Government, "We will take your places, and will pass your policy." I say it is unprecedented, and inconsistent with every principle that should govern morality in party and Parliament. There are occasions on which the party in power are pledged to administer the measures of their predecessors, and even to pass measures proposed by their predecessors; but there is no precedent, as far as I am aware, in the history of any constitutional country, for an Opposition to say, "We will turn out the Government, and then we will adopt their policy and pass their measures." When Sir Robert Peel was converted to the repeal of the Corn Laws he was in power; but what did he do? He at once resigned office, saying it was proper that Lord John Russell, who had advocated that measure, should have an opportunity of forming a Ministry to pass it. Lord John Russell was unable to do so, and Sir Robert Peel came back into office, and passed the repeal of the Corn Laws, but was turned out of office immediately afterwards for holding the anomalous position of passing the measures of a Government to which he was opposed. Before I proceed to the charges raised by the honorable gentleman against the Government, I should like to say a few words on the general question. I ask, if the Opposition come into power, have we any guarantee or reliance that they will give practical effect to the Liberal policy? How are the people, how are we here, to know that they will do so? We know that some members of that party are opposed to the extension of the electoral franchise; we know that some of them are against triennial Parliaments; we know that some of them do not believe in an alteration of the present incidence of taxation, and even go so far that they would wish to repeal the land-tax, and reimpose the duties that have been reduced on the necessities of life; we know that some of them wish the present system of private purchase of Native land to go on, and be even more unrestricted than it is at present. We also know that there are some of them who would wish to see local government minimized and put altogether into confusion in order that they might have one central body—one Legislature—dealing with all matters from the seat of Government. I ask, Are these elements which should inspire confidence in the people of New Zealand that the Opposition who now seek power would do justice to the policy on which the people have set their hearts? I would ask honorable members—and I would especially ask new members, who are now at the outset of their parliamentary life, when a false step more than ever may compromise the public usefulness of their future career—to ponder well concerning the vote they are about to give. If they disapprove of the policy, then let them reject the policy and reject its authors. But, if they approve of its principles, do not let them sacrifice the policy to any personal feeling of prejudice against its authors. I ask them not to send the sheep-dogs to the forest, and bring in the wolves to watch the fold. What would you do in private life? Would you place a precious and cherished charge in alien and suspicious hands? Would you ask Brigham Young to take charge of your wives, or Mr. Squeers to educate your children? Well, then, I say, show the same solicitude for public interests. Do not imperil, do not emasculate, this policy by intrusting it to the sinister charge of a party half of which cannot agree with its principles and half of which has no faith in its merits. I will now proceed to the charges which the honorable gentleman has made against the Government, and I must say, with regard to those charges, that they are less like articles of impeachment than like some scandal picked out of the gossip of a Sunday newspaper. They are more like some miscellaneous lot of articles put up to auction. But, Sir, as far as they go, I will refer to some of them. I have seen something of Ministries in my life, and I will guarantee, in a day, with a pair of scissors and the Blue Books, to frame a much more formidable indictment against any Ministry which has held office for at least a year—not excepting the Ministry of which the honorable member for Selwyn was a distinguished member for three years. I will take, first, the expense of steamers. Now, I ask honorable gentlemen who know anything about it—and I speak on this subject without any personal concern, as I have not, since I have been a Minister, travelled in either of the Government steamers—I ask any one who knows what Ministerial duties are, what would be the effect of a Minister always travelling in the ordinary coastal steamers? Take the East Coast, for instance. Suppose a Minister has to go to Napier and be engaged there for a day, and then has to go to Poverty Bay, and perhaps on to the East Cape and to Auckland. Very well: if he takes an ordinary steamer, it will land him at Napier, but will not wait long enough to enable him to transact his business and go on to Poverty Bay; and he will have to remain in Napier, doing nothing, for a week, until another steamer comes up the coast. Then, again, the steamer may not stay at Poverty Bay more than three or four hours, and perhaps the Minister may be unable to go on, and may have to remain there for several days; and the same thing may happen at the East Cape. I say that any man who has had any experience of the duties of a Minister ought to be well aware that it is generally much cheaper to use the "Stella" and the "Hinemoa" than to take passages in the ordinary coastal steamers. Then I come to the question of Native affairs. It is said that Native affairs are in a worse position now than they were in 1877, when the present Ministry came into office. Now I am not prepared to admit that. It does not follow because the outward symptoms of the Native difficulty are more manifest now in a point of view which is injurious to the country, that therefore Native affairs are in a worse position than they were when the symptoms were concealed. An internal disease is often much more dangerous than an external one, although the symptoms of the external one may be more manifest than those of the internal one. The proper and just comparison would be to say what would have been the state of Native affairs now if they had been continued to be intrusted to the hands of the preceding Ministry? That is a proper comparison to make; and I say, after my experience of these two years which have passed, that I believe, if the Grey Ministry had not succeeded to office, we should have been in a much worse position than we are now with regard to Native affairs. I believe we should have had a war on the West Coast; and what war means has been very well described by preceding speakers. Then, Sir, with regard to this very West Coast, what is the Government blamed for? The late Government ordered the survey of the Waimate Plains to be made. This Government gave instructions for that survey to be postponed until they made further inquiries. They made those inquiries, and then ordered the survey to be proceeded with. Then the surveyors were turned off the plains, and a disturbance occurred. But are the Government blamed for delaying the order of their predecessors; or are they blamed for putting the surveyors on afterwards? They cannot be blamed for both. Either they were premature in putting the surveyors on the plains, or they were too cautious in delaying or withholding the order of their predecessors; but they could not be too cautious and too premature at the same time, and therefore one charge counteracts the other. Then, with regard to Te Whiti: What is the fact? There are 150 fighting men in prison, who, I believe, but for the judicious conduct of the Native Minister and the Premier, would have been fighting against us. Those men may perhaps in future be usefully employed in the interests of the country, and in a more advantageous manner than they would have been if it had not been for the action of the Government. At all events they are now restrained from fighting against us. The next point is that of finance. The Premier was blamed for not making an elaborate Financial Statement last session. It was at the particular request of the then leader of the Opposition that he did not make an elaborate Financial Statement. But he made such a Statement as he thought right; and he accompanied it with tables which showed the position of the country.—(No.)—They would show the position to any one who would take the trouble to examine them. In reference to the important part of the financial question, it is conceded by my honorable friend the member for Selwyn that the Minister for Public Works made a lucid and satisfactory Statement. Well, that is the Statement which people at Home look at. They want to know what our railways pay. They do not want to see departmental details which are contained in an ordinary Financial Statement; they look to the Public Works Statement. After all, it is not what the Colonial Treasurer says that is of importance, but the tables and returns; and the position of the colony is gathered from those returns, and from the newspapers, and what people write about the country. These are what the capitalists in England judge from, and not from what the Colonial Treasurer of the day happens to say in his Financial Statement. Then, Sir, I come to the charge about Government advertisements, and I think that my honorable friend the member for Selwyn must regret that he spoke as he did on this subject. In one breath the honorable gentleman spoke of the Press as the palladium of colonial rights, and in another breath he characterized it as a venal and degraded Press, whose patriotism was to be gauged by the price of a few Government advertisements. I think it is really derogatory to himself, and derogatory to the public Press of New Zealand, that he should make such an accusation. What a colonial palladium it would be! A palladium that could be hawked about and sold by auction to any Government that chose to bid a few pounds' worth of advertisements! Why, Sir, the constituencies of this country have returned many journalists to this House. It is an insult to those gentlemen, and a libel upon them and upon the papers which are under their charge, to say that they would be influenced, either in their action in this House or in the conduct of their papers, by any bribe the Government might offer in the shape of a few paltry advertisements. And, Sir, the honorable gentleman seems to have a mean opinion of constituencies which return members to support the Government. He spoke of myself, and of the constituency I represent. I pass by the remarks which he made in reference to myself, as I think they were made in the spirit of good-humoured raillery. I do not suppose he meant to impute to me that I was guilty of political corruption, or that my constituents were corrupt, or that he meant to convey that impression. But I must protest against my constituency being represented as having returned me without opposition because I turned the sod of the first section of the Mikonui Water-race. The honorable gentleman talked of my constituency as being a very small one. But he must remember that a mining constituency is not represented by the mere names on the roll. There are many miners who vote by virtue of their miners' rights. Their names do not appear on the roll, and the honorable gentleman cannot judge of the size of the constituency by merely seeing the roll.

Mr. HALL.—I did not say the number on the roll. I said that the population was only 2,600.

Mr. GISBORNE.—I thought the honorable gentleman was referring to the number on the roll. But he made another mistake. Ross is one centre; but there is another large centre—Woodstock—quite unconnected with Ross, and there are other centres of population in the district also unconnected with Ross; and, if the electors in any centre had been dissatisfied with my parliamentary conduct, nothing could have been easier for them than to have put a candidate up in opposition to me. But what I want to protest against is the imputation made against my constituents that they were actuated by mercenary motives. I went, two and a half years ago, to that constituency and contested it, on very short notice, and as a complete stranger, and not as a Government candidate, and I was opposed by two local residents who were necessarily better acquainted than I was with the local wants, and more interested in them; and I was returned by a large majority. And I say, on behalf of that constituency, that there is no more intelligent or honorable constituency in New Zealand. I wish to refer to another remark the honorable gentleman made, and which I was very sorry to hear. He made an imputation, as I understood, against the Returning Officer for being present on the occasion of the turning of the first sod of the Mikonui Water-race. Now, the Returning Officer is Dr. Giles, than whom there is no more honorable and able gentleman in the Civil Service. He was Under Secretary for Lands under the administration of the honorable member for Egmont, and now holds a high judicial office; and he is universally respected in the district in which he lives. I say there can be no imputation against Dr. Giles for being present on the occasion referred to. It was the inauguration of an important public work; there was no party question involved; and Dr. Giles said nothing at all on that occasion—and I was close to him—which could be in any way imputed to him as a fault. It is a very curious thing that the honorable gentleman should show his appreciation of the Civil Service by making undeserved imputations against one of its most eminent and distinguished officers. With regard to the Civil Service, what charge did the honorable gentleman make against the Premier? That during the course of two years one person, Mr. Luckie, has been appointed to a special office—that is, as Commissioner of Insurance—and that an old Civil servant was not appointed. Why, I could mention four or five instances in which the Ministry of which my honorable friend was a member put persons who had no claims upon the Civil Service right above the heads of Civil servants—persons who had no claim to anything at all. I do not suppose the honorable gentleman wishes me to name a case. Well, Sir, under these circumstances some allowance should be made. Surely the errors of judgment—if they are errors of judgment—of a Ministry which has been only two years in office should not be charged against them as high crimes and misdemeanours. Then I come to the charge relative to the care of the lunatics. It was said that the lunatics in the asylums of the colony had been greatly neglected. Why, Sir, what was the condition of these asylums when they were handed over to the Ministry? It was worse than at present. When I came into the House two years ago I myself asked a question about the asylums, and I found that, out of the money actually appropriated by the House for their maintenance and management, the Government of the honorable member for Egmont had saved £19,000, which they claimed as a reduction of expenditure. The money which they ought to have spent, but did not spend, they claimed as a saving. Now, just let the House mark the difference in circumstances. Instead of saving £19,000, the present Government has contracts in hand to the extent of £50,000 for the improvement of the lunatic asylums. I come then to the question of the telegrams. The honorable gentleman has pounced upon one stray telegram, which it seems was not paid for; but has he any ground for saying that the Ministry as a whole have despatched their electioneering telegrams at the public expense? I can say at once and without hesitation that every telegram connected with my election was paid for by me, and I feel confident that I can make the same statement on behalf of my colleagues: at all events, they are here to speak for themselves. Therefore that charge falls to the ground. To lead the House to believe that it was a permanent practice on the part of Ministers to forward electioneering telegrams at the cost of the public is a misleading statement which ought not to have been made upon insufficient grounds. I was perfectly well aware of the contents of the report of the Telegraph Committee of 1871, and acted in strict accordance with the recommendations of that Committee. Well, Sir, I will not delay the House any longer. I will only say, in reference to this great impeachment, that it really resolves itself into a personal attack upon the Premier. It originated in a feeling of spite on the part of some, because he has roused the country to a sense of its rights, and because he rudely awakened a slumbering Ministry. I say it is due to my honorable friend that this liberal policy is now in the position in which it is in the popular mind. If it had not been for his efforts we should have heard very little about the policy on this side of the House, and we should have heard nothing at all about it on the other. Well, Sir, the Opposition have been compelled to advocate this policy, and in expiation of their inconsistency they wish now to sacrifice the author of the policy. My honorable friend can well afford to be indifferent to such attacks, for in vindication of his public character he can well appeal from the clamorous and cavilling criticism of to-day to the judicial verdict of posterity. In after-generations the name of my honorable friend will stand high in the catalogue of statesmen. During a long course of public life it has been his happy lot to fulfil successfully two distinct characters—two characters which, so far as I know, have never before been combined in one individual. For nearly twenty-five years, as the representative of the Sovereign, he has rendered eminent services to outlying portions of the British Empire; these services are imperishably recorded in the annals of South Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa: and in his maturer years, as a representative of the people, he has devoted his great ability, not to the acquisition of wealth, not to the achievement of personal distinction, but to the improvement of the political and social condition of his fellow-men: not men who are to be found among the titled, the wealthy, and the powerful, but men who compose the masses of the people—whose life, from the cradle to the grave, is as a rule a continuous series of privation and suffering. I hear some honorable gentlemen laugh. This may be a ludicrous matter to them, but I say that the efforts of my honorable friend have been successful in giving a strong onward impetus to a movement which is now agitating mankind. I believe the outcome of that movement will sooner or later regenerate the civilized world. It does not invade rights; it only redresses wrongs. Without that movement civilization can only become rotten to the core—a mere whitened sepulchre. That movement involves mighty issues. The object of that movement is to obliterate as far as possible the painful, the calamitous conflict which, throughout the civilized world, prevails between the concentrated accumulation of inordinate wealth on the one hand and the general diffusion of abject poverty on the other. The object of that movement is to adjust the relations of capital and labour—those gigantic agencies in the conduct of human affairs—so that neither shall vex or oppose the other, but that both jointly shall work together in securing the greatest good to the greatest number. The object of that movement is to minimize pauperism, to bring contentment to every home, to secure the rights of the people, and to establish all over the world liberal and humane government. Sir, engaged in that heroic work my honorable friend can well afford to regard with indifference passing misrepresentation and obloquy. They are as the dust of his chariot-wheels. I trust my honorable friend may live to reap the reward of his labours in seeing gratitude “smiling in a nation’s eyes.” I feel sure that his public services will have materially contributed to raise a monument of good which lapse of time can only strengthen and enlarge, and that he will leave behind him a name which will be held in grateful remembrance in the hearts of thousands of sons of toil, as the name of one who was the champion of their cause when that cause found but little favour and much hostility in high places—as of one who has eloquently asserted in their behalf the sacred principles of freedom and of justice.

Mr. DICK.—I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches delivered during the present debate, and I observe that the Northern members especially seem to be well informed as to what is going on, and to make a strong defence of the Ministry. The honorable member for Auckland City East, though a young member, seems to know a great deal about what has been done. He gives us his opinions in abundance of words, and perhaps says almost too much. He seemed as if he had something of a little importance to tell us; and, in fact, he rather alarmed a young member like myself. He told us that in a session or two, when certain Bills were passed, we should probably have to go back to our constituents, and that if we failed to support the Ministry we should be sent to the quiet retirement of our homes, and never be allowed to show our faces here again. I hope that he is mistaken; but, if he is not, I must run the risk of the solemn threat which he has given, and venture, not only to vote, but to speak in opposition to the Government as at present constituted. The honorable member also referred to certain Native matters, which I am not thoroughly up in, but which I venture to have an opinion upon, notwithstanding that I am a Southern member. I think he did an injustice to the Opposition in telling us that when Ministers went to different parts of the country in order to settle disturbances amongst the Natives it was found that members or delegates of the Opposition were there to interfere with and upset the work which the Government undertook. If the papers report rightly it is not so. There are persons who are called land-jobbers, who, I believe, do get in there occasionally, and upset, to a certain extent, the work of Ministers when they are trying to set the country right; but I do not think it is fair to charge such a thing as that upon honorable members of the Opposition. Now, in reference to those Native affairs, I have been watching with some interest what has been going on recently in regard to them. I know that a short time ago there was an effort made to reach the Native King, and to induce him to be guided by the advice and teaching of the Premier and the Native Minister. Watching the progress of that affair, I think our Government, with the Premier and his supporter, did not do themselves or the country justice in hanging on and using all sorts of humble efforts to reach the King Natives and to get a little talk with them. It seemed to me that a better and more successful course would have been to have kept entirely aloof from the Natives, to have taken no notice whatever of them, and then to have allowed them to hold a meeting and go away home again. However, the Premier seemed to think otherwise, and got amongst them. So far as his action after that goes, I, for one, am not prepared to condemn it. I think he acted rightly in the position he took up in withdrawing from them, and in a determined manner giving them notice that the proposed arrangements were withdrawn. But I think the subsequent course taken by the Government was undignified and unfair, in taking hold of a chief as they did, flattering him, spending money upon him, and treating him as they would not have treated any European of the highest class—making the Natives believe that all they had to do was to make a disturbance first, and then become our friends, when they would be sure to be tenderly treated, flattered, and have money spent upon them to any amount. I do not know how this chief Rewi will get on; but I venture to say that such a course as that is a very profitable one for Native chiefs. It will probably not be long before he has another excuse for getting at variance with the Government, in order that he may have a few more thousands spent upon him, in order that he may again be flattered by Premiers and Native Ministers showing him round as they did the other day, with telegrams about him flying all over the country, making a noise about him as if he were superior to Kings, Governors, Premiers, and every one else in the colony. Then, after that, there was naturally a disturbance on the West Coast, and the Native Minister went down to settle that matter. In that case there was, I think, a very marked want of decision and of firm action. I do not profess to know anything about how these things should be carried on, but, judging from the telegrams in the newspapers that reached us, and from what appeared to be the proper course, I think that, instead of waiting until the Natives began ploughing the land and obeying Te Whiti, the more honorable and courageous course would have been to humour Te Whiti in his desire for martyrdom, by arresting him instead of those poor fellows who obeyed his commands, by bringing him to Wellington, and by keeping him here until matters were quiet on the West Coast. Of course I am not skilled in these concerns; but that seemed quite a simple thing to do in order to put matters right. Native matters generally seem to be in a sort of confused and unsettled condition, which does not support altogether the claim which those honorable gentlemen make to have the management of Native affairs. We know that the Premier has for many years considered himself a great power amongst the Natives. We remember that, when the war at Waitara broke out in 1860, the Premier was at the Cape, and as soon as the news reached him we are told he sent word to the English Government offering his services to come to this country to put that war down and settle the Native question entirely for the future. He did come; he was appointed Governor of the country for the second time; and he probably did something as Governor towards settling the Native question. I will not for one moment refuse him what is his due as Governor of this colony, but I think he has not as Prime Minister, and in company with the Native Minister, displayed that decision and that clearness of action which we might have expected from his long experience, and from his warm desire to do justice to the Native question. The honorable member who spoke last complimented the Premier, and told us how his name would go down to posterity in the most glowing colours that could possibly be conceived. I will not say how the Premier's name will go down to posterity. I hope all his evil deeds will be buried with his bones, and that his good deeds only will live after him; but I do think that posterity would have had a better account of him if he had never departed from his position as Governor. If he had never taken his position on the floor of this House, and had never taken an active and, to my thinking, an unsuccessful part in the management of the affairs of the country—if he had never taken a position beneath that of Governor—his memory would have been more respected, and his action more completely such as men would consider right. When the honorable gentleman took office nearly two years ago, I confess I heard it with some degree of satisfaction, because I had previously read of the wonderful things he was going to perform, in the way of improving the affairs of this country, reducing the expenditure, and in every respect making his a model Government, and this country a model country for the whole world to look at. But I find that it has been rather the reverse, and that after two years the honorable member has failed to carry out most of those promises which he made to the House. We were informed before he took office that he would reduce the expenditure of the country by £100,000 in a very short time—that if he were permitted to retire for half-an-hour he would come back with the estimates reduced to that extent. When I read that, I thought that surely he was the Premier that the country needed; because we had been spending very freely, and getting into debt more and more. It struck me that, if he could reduce the expenditure in such a way, there must really be tremendous extravagance somewhere. Well, now we find there has been no reduction. We find that, although the former Government chastised us with whips, this Government has chastised us with scorpions. The expenditure on the Civil Service and the outlay for the management of the country have become greater and greater. The honorable member for Auckland City East tells us that that must be so, that no Government can reduce the expenditure, and that any Government coming in will still increase the expenditure. I am not prepared to say that, but I am prepared to say that, when honorable members make promises that if they are put upon the Government benches they will completely and successfully reduce the expenditure, we have a right to look to them to perform their promises, and if they fail to do so we have a right to say, We shall not follow you any further. Then the Premier, when out of office, talked a great deal about the "Hinemoa" and other vessels. His late Treasurer also stated that that vessel or another would be sold very quickly. To-day I asked what had been done in the matter, and we were informed that those vessels were absolutely needed for the service of the country. I am not quite up in the affairs of the country in that respect, but, after watching the course of the "Hinemoa," it seems to me that a very great part of her time is occupied not in taking troops, or for other purposes connected with the service of the country, but in taking Ministers, and especially the Premier, while engaged in doing services to their party. I remember that at the time when there was some demand for the steamer on behalf of His Excellency she seemed somehow or other to find her way up to a small island near Auckland, and to remain there for an extraordinary length of time. Then, Sir, I was disappointed to find that the "Stella" brought the honorable gentleman down south at the time I was trying to get in for the City of Dunedin. I really began to fear that my chances of getting in were in danger, because it was threatened—at least, almost threatened—that we should be turned to the right-about if we did not support his views. He went to Invercargill, and there, I am informed, he succeeded in reducing the majority of the gentleman who is returned to represent that town. He then came to Dunedin. I do not know what the effect of his address there was; but I know that on the Saturday evening he gave us his views at a public meeting, and on the Sunday morning he took a special train for Lyttelton. I know that from there the steamer carried him north, and at such a rate that it has been unfit for anything since. That seems to be the work which the "Hinemoa" is intended to do, and, if so, I agree with the opinion of the Premier when he was in opposition, that that vessel ought to be sold. I was disappointed and grieved to hear the honorable gentleman last night say that he would do the same thing again if he had the opportunity. I do not know how the honorable member can square it with his conscience to use the property of the country to go on electioneering tours, and to try and advance what he calls the liberal opinions of his party. But the honorable member knows best what is really right according to his own conscience. I hope that, if this is his view, he will very soon not have the power to carry it out again—that he will not have an opportunity of turning the electors with shame and sorrow from the liberal principles which he professes to advocate. I say that more injury has been done to the Liberal cause by such courses as these than can be possibly conceived. I, for one, though a Liberal, have through such proceedings as these been turned from being willing to support the honorable gentleman who is now at the head of the Government. Then we have, as my honorable friend beside me (Mr. Moss) has told us, a Government in a disunited state. We are told that a house divided against itself cannot stand. We have seen in past times how the Government was divided against itself, and it was painful to read in the telegrams how the members of the Government seemed to disagree. I suppose it is quite probable that there was something more made in the telegrams of these dissensions than really was the case; but it was manifest that the Government were not united in any way amongst themselves—that they had simply a sort of cohesion, but each one was left to a certain extent to do what was right in his own eyes. We saw it in the case of an appointment made in the Insurance Department. I do not defend the action of those who appointed Mr. Luckie to that position; I think it was wrong; I think that the action in that matter was improper; but I also think it was a strange thing for the Government to come to such loggerheads about the matter after it was completed. I believe that the Hon. the Premier was right in resisting the appointment if he had resisted at the right time; but he came to it too late, and failed in consequence to do what was the right thing. He made the Government appear ridiculous, quarrelsome, and divided in the eyes of the country. I do not think that at the present time the Government as it exists displays altogether united action. Probably the Premier is gathering up the reins now, and trying to drive the team all united; but hitherto it has not been so, and perhaps it is almost too late to begin to try to bind them together. I trust that it is so. Then it has been said that this debate is not upon the actions of the Government, but is in reality an attack upon the liberal purposes, intentions, and views of the Government. I, for one, most heartily deny that. I am not here to oppose liberal measures; I am here most sincerely to support everything which is truly liberal and for the advancement of the country. My honorable friend here says, Let us pass these liberal measures, and then let the Government retire to the Opposition benches. I say that that is not what should be done. My opinion is this: that when the honorable members towards the close of last session found themselves in a minority of fourteen, and found the Opposition declaring that it was not the measures they were opposed to, but the men, the Ministry at that time should have retired, and said, "Well, since this is your opinion, since you are dissatisfied with us and not with our measures, we are quite willing to retire and let you carry through these measures." They should have taken from them a promise that these measures would be carried on; they should have stated that they would support their successors in carrying through those measures which were so dear to the hearts of those gentlemen who call themselves Liberals. When those measures were carried—some of them had been carried before almost in their entirety—when those measures were carried, and the new electoral districts were marked off, then would have been the time to have gone to the country and to have taken the votes of the people on the new laws which had been passed for the benefit of the country. My honorable friend the member for Totara has attacked previous Administrations for the way in which they have acted. Now, I am not prepared to defend previous Administrations. I do not think we are here to put into the Government just those gentlemen who on previous occasions have been on those seats. I trust we shall find men here who are fit to take the reins of office and to carry forward the most liberal measures for the country—men who are not in the position of some who have in previous Ministries done one or two things which are objected to. I am not prepared to say that there are not some members of this House who have done one or two of these objectionable things. When we find men, whoever they may be, or to whatever class they belong, doing an injustice to the country, taking an advantage of their position to advance their own interests, or to injure the interests of the community at large, I say that in that case they forfeit to a certain extent the support of this House and of the country, and, in so far as they have done so, they should not be supported in the future. There are in the Opposition and in the Government men who have been objected to. I would rather give a chance to those not objected to than allow those to continue in office who by their mismanagement of the affairs of the country are carrying it fast to ruin—a ruin which is the more sad because it is done in the name of liberalism and justice. I have heard it argued that there has been no attempt on the part of the Government or members of the Government to set class against class in this country, and that the thing was done years ago more than it is done now. My honorable friend (Mr. Moss) says that in former times members who are now in the Opposition were those who set class against class in this country. I do not think he is quite correct in making that statement. I do not think so much has been done in that direction in any previous time as has been done within the last two or three years. Formerly men were actuated by a desire to help forward the interests of New Zealand in every respect—men who were working into the possession of land, or those already in the possession of land—we were all working together as willing co-operators in the advancement of this colony. It is true there were occasional troubles between different parties in the country. There were those who were called squatters, against whom some of us had to struggle occasionally pretty earnestly; but we fought our battles, and we found that they were not so bad, after all, as they were sometimes represented. They were willing that their land should be taken under fair circumstances and divided for the benefit of those who desired to purchase land, and we have now no reason whatever to fear that that class, at all events, will do us the least injury in this country. There has been a charge of a system of gridironing the country in a certain part. I will call to the remembrance of my honorable friend the member for Parnell a fact which will perhaps be in his memory as taking place in Otago. One whose name is revered and respected by us all—a determined friend of those who wanted to get land—I refer to Sir John Richardson—did not do the "gridironing" in Otago, but went in for a system of what we called a draughtboard division of the country; and we thought that, in doing that, we were so laying off the land that it would be impossible for persons to possess themselves of large districts of country; and it seems to me that this "gridironing" is something of the same system, though perhaps it has not worked in the same way. I am not acquainted with what was done in Canterbury with reference to the land, but I do know that we thought in Otago that by setting one block apart from another we should manage to keep the country from being possessed in large blocks by single individuals. Now, Sir, we have been at peace amongst ourselves, not dividing class against class, until recently. We had our provincial system, which I am glad to unite with the honorable member for Parnell in considering an excellent system. I was glad to see in the Parliament before last the firm fight that was made and the strong stand that was taken for our provincial institutions. I most heartily sympathized with the then Opposition; but it is not fair to this country to say that this House resisted the will of the country in abolishing those provincial institutions. The members were returned to this House from the country; they were the representatives of the country; the question was fairly debated by the country, and there was a majority returned from the country of members who were authorized to do away with the provinces, and to establish a central system of government. I regret that that was done; I think it has not been to the interest of the country that it has been done; but, now that it has been done, I think it becomes us to submit to the necessity of the case, and to work out to the very utmost of our power a system of government which shall be to the interest of the country at large. There is a proposal to increase the powers of local bodies. I do not know that it has yet become law, or that it has been brought down before us in the shape of a Bill; but the honorable member for Port Chalmers has urged—and I agree with him—the idea of extending the counties, and giving them increased powers, so that, to a certain extent, at all events, this centralizing policy may be reduced in its evils, and the various parts of the country may once again have the power of spending the money in their own districts, and so working out that provincial system which has been done away with by the resolution of a majority of this House. I hope that that idea will be carried out to some extent in this House, and that we shall, by giving away some of the power which we have to those districts, utilize these counties, and benefit the districts in that way. I feel that this House, as at present constituted, is doing work which it should not do. There is, and there has been, in this House, a taking-up of details—a discussion of small matters which should be left to districts, with power to carry them out apart from this House; and I think we should as much as possible endeavour to carry out principles and administer laws for the general government and well-being of the colony, leaving these details to those large districts which may yet be formed. There has been within the last few sessions an amount of—well, Sir, I do not like to call it log-rolling—in this House—because perhaps it is not; but there has been a sort of bargaining for railways and works in certain districts which I think should be placed beyond the power of individual members. I feel that the temptation is exceedingly great for a member to go out of the way to get a certain benefit for his own district. I know that when gentlemen are at the hustings they are asked questions and made to give promises for certain things in their districts. It should not be in the power of members to do anything of the kind in this House. These things should be beyond the power of honorable members. There should be Commissions or something of that sort to arrange these matters, and it should not be left to individual members to go and say to the Government, “I will give you my vote if you will give me a bridge;” “I will give you my vote if you will give me certain support in a small line of railway;” or anything of that sort. I do not think Governments should be put in such a position; and therefore I am anxious to see that this power is given away to districts formed by this House. If we want to see the result of such things as these—of such bargainings as this—we have only to read some of those discussions, remarks, speeches, and questions which occurred lately in the different districts of this colony. I remember, Sir, that an honorable member from the South, in canvassing his district, claimed for himself essential credit, and the support of all those who had a vote, because of the way in which he had obtained a number of little things for the district he had represented; and he seemed to think that he had a perfect right to claim the votes of the electors on that ground. I noticed that a gentleman who was standing for a constituency on the West Coast, before he retired from that position, asked a number of questions, entirely and absolutely connected with that district, of the gentleman for whose benefit he was retiring. He did not ask a single question as to the general principles or policy that the candidate was going to support—whether he was in favour of triennial Parliaments, extension of the franchise, and so on. He asked about bridges, roads, and railways in that district, and nothing more; and when the gentleman said, “Yes, I will support all these,” then the other said, “I will retire.” When these things are left in the hands of members, or, rather, when they are thrust upon members, there is a great danger of log-rolling, and dealing unjustly and unfairly with the true interests of the country, and the grave objects for which the Assembly, representing New Zealand, has met here. The question we shall now have to decide is, not as to what Bills shall be carried, but which party shall carry them. I do not agree with those who think it is a question between Liberals and others. I, for one, am a Liberal, and am prepared to support liberal measures, but I am prepared to see these liberal measures carried by some others than those at present holding seats on the Government benches. They have had two years at their disposal for bringing forward these measures; they have had two years for carrying out all the improvements which they promised us; they have had two years to carry out the economical arrangements which they insisted should be carried out, and on condition of doing which they got their seats there; and now we find them not one whit advanced, and, worse than that, having involved us in difficulties, having trifled with the moneys of the country, having failed to give anything like a statement of how financial matters stood—so much so that I believe we are all in trembling and fear lest it should be found that we are many thousands behind what is thought to be the case—lest the country should find that we are involved in difficulties not beyond remedy, but still so deep and so heavy that our breaths will be taken away when the true state of the case is laid before us. I am prepared to vote for the amendment proposed by the honorable member for Selwyn.

Mr. IRELAND. — Sir, it would hardly be proper on my part if I did not give my reasons for the way in which I intend to vote on the question now before the House. I may say at once that I entered this House upon the votes of those who were in favour of supporting the Grey Government; and I will now proceed to give my reasons why I purpose supporting that Government whenever the division comes off. I will not travel over the ground which has been already gone over by previous speakers this evening and yesterday: indeed, even if I were capable of doing so, I think it would be very injudicious on my part to attempt to add anything to what has already been said. I listened to the honorable member the leader of the Opposition attentively when he spoke against the Government; but I found his speech was composed mainly of simple assertions, not arguments, and, taking them for what they were worth, they could not be considered as proving the charges made against the Government. The honorable gentleman who has just sat down entered largely into the question of Native affairs, and condemned the Government; but I cannot help thinking that had it not been for the course pursued we should now have been engaged in a Native war. However, I am not going into that—I will leave it to wiser heads; but, nevertheless, I cannot but adhere to the opinion I have expressed. I may state at once that I have not watched the course of politics for some years past, and I am therefore not posted up in the course politics have lately taken; but I must say this: I have been struck with one matter in connection with this debate, and that is, that no arguments of any weight have been brought forward why we should vote against the present Government. Even if it were true that the Ministry had made promises, and had not fulfilled them, is it surprising, seeing they have not been in office long—two years? Surely it is only fair and just to give Governments, as well as individuals, a fair trial before you condemn them. No such liberal policy as was enunciated in the Governor's Speech has ever previously been before the House; while the late elections have shown that those measures are desired by the people. Nor can we forget that the Premier was the first man to enunciate these measures. From the time of Sir Julius Vogel to the present time ample opportunity has been given to Governments to propose liberal measures if they thought fit; but I cannot find that it has been done. I do not mean to say that successive Ministers have not been sincere in their convictions, and in their desire to advance the interests of the country; but they have not proposed measures of so wide and comprehensive a character as those of the present Government, and I am not at all surprised that immediately upon those measures being introduced an attempt should be made to strangle them. I believe that had there been manhood suffrage—and that is a matter that has been very dear to my heart ever since I began to think for myself, because I have always gone on the broad ground that every man should have a vote in respect of his manhood—had manhood suffrage, I say, been in operation during the last elections, the result would have been very different from what it is. I believe that the present Ministry would have had a very large majority in this House. The gentlemen on the opposite side may think differently; but the real truth, I suspect, is that those honorable gentlemen are afraid of manhood suffrage. My own belief is that, although they profess to be Liberals, if they got into office to-morrow they would not carry out their promises. The policy they have in their hearts differs greatly from the policy of the Government. As to triennial Parliaments, I think that is a step in the right direction. In point of fact, I agree with the whole policy of the Government; and I hope we shall not see them supplanted until effect has been given to the measures which the country has approved. The honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Dick) has charged the Government with many sins of omission and commission; but we heard so much of these matters last evening, and they were so thoroughly replied to, that I think I should be wasting the time of the House were I to go into these assertions again. I think every honorable member who seriously considers the state of the country will recognize that the measures of the Ministry are good and wise measures, and will pass over any little shortcomings with which the present Government can be justly charged—assuming that they can be so charged. In the event of the Opposition being successful, it would be very interesting to watch the course those who may take the place of Ministers would pursue. It is very well for them to profess approval of these measures, but it must not be forgotten that up to the present time these measures have not been carried; and before the Opposition turn out the Government they should give some guarantee that the programme of the present Government will be carried out. The honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Dick) has read the Premier and the Native Minister a lecture, and has told them that it would have been better to do this and that. It is a very easy thing for members to condemn what is past; but I should like to see the honorable member in office as Premier or Native Minister, and see how he dealt with such difficulties. When I say I should like to see him in office, I use the phrase in the way of argument. I should not really like to see him or any other person placed in the position of the Premier or the Native Minister, because I believe that this colony has been in a most critical condition, and that, had it not been for the skilful management of Native affairs exhibited by them, the country would now have been plunged in bloodshed. The honorable member said he was a Liberal, and would support liberal measures. Why does he not do so? It seems singular to me; though perhaps it is only reasonable to expect that he should be looked upon with jealousy by gentlemen who are so greatly inferior to him politically—gentlemen not capable of taking his place or understanding his mission. It has been said in the course of debate that Ministers have not carried out their promises. It seems to me it would have been impossible for them to have done so last session, for, immediately on Parliament assembling, the then leader of the Opposition proposed an amendment on the Address in Reply, so that no opportunity was given to Ministers to carry out their policy—none whatever; and then the cry is taken up and continued by the Opposition, that the Government will not carry out liberal measures. The Ministry have been given no chance to carry them out. If it had not been for the firm stand taken by a few persons a session or two ago we should have had very little liberty left; but I believe the public mind is being educated, and will not stop short of anything but real and true Liberalism. I believe one of the most effective measures to that end will be manhood suffrage, and that it will have a wonderful effect in educating the people politically to matters which affect the well-being of this great colony. I hope that, in addition to the measures already enunciated, provision will be made for opening up the land of the country, not in small patches, but in large tracts, so that an opportunity may be afforded to the community at large to obtain land. I believe what was said last night was perfectly correct—namely, that unless some step is taken in the direction of putting a stop to land speculation, we shall, in a very few years, be really worse off than people in England as to land. I can speak for the district I have the honor to represent. For years we struggled to get a few acres of land thrown open, and when we got them they were snapped up in a few days. The people of that district are crying out for land, and I hope, if the present Ministry remain in office, we shall be given an opportunity of occupying the lands of the colony. I was very glad to hear the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Dick) say he regretted that Provincial Councils were done away with. I have ever regretted the abolition of those Councils, believing, as I sincerely do, that they were perhaps as wise a form of government as it ever entered into the brain of man to conceive. I only hope that the county system which we now have may be so improved as to be able to do the same good work. I stated that my object in speaking this evening was to give the reasons why I intend to vote for the Ministry, and I will now just sum up those reasons. The measures proposed by the Ministry in the Governor's Speech are such as I heartily approve. There is only one point in the policy there enunciated that I have any doubt about, and that is with reference to the fostering of native industries. I should be sorry to see those industries fostered in such a manner as in any way or form to take the shape of Protection. I am a staunch Free-trader, and I believe it is the only system to make a country great, and noble, and prosperous. Some years ago—I believe when the Government of Sir Julius Vogel was in office—protection was afforded to distilleries, and the result was, that the revenue was so affected by the protective duty, in the shape of so much per gallon less on the manufactured article, that the colony had to buy the distilleries out at a pretty high figure. But I believe our present Government is too wise to adopt such a measure as that. I need say no more, except that I shall give my vote to the present Government, believing that in the existing state of the colony it is just the Government to carry out measures which will be for the benefit of the country.

Debate adjourned.

The House adjourned at ten minutes to twelve o'clock p.m.

Mr. Ireland

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Wellington Harbour Board Bill, Native Lawsuits Bill, Licensing Bill.

NGARUAWAHIA SUBURBAN LANDS.

Mr. WHITAKER asked the Minister of Lands, Why the Government has not yet offered for sale the suburban allotments in the vicinity of the Township of Ngaruawahia? He hoped the honorable gentleman would give a clear and explicit answer to the question, as the matter was of great importance to the people in the township mentioned.

Mr. THOMSON said the Government were taking steps to have the land opened up for sale, and he hoped it would be placed in the market before long.

HOTEL FIRE-ESCAPES.

Mr. SEYMOUR asked the Premier, Whether he will take such steps as may be necessary to compel hotel and lodging-house keepers to provide and maintain facilities for escape from upper rooms in case of fire? It would be within the recollection of honorable members that at a fire which took place in this city there was an unfortunate loss of life. Whether it was attributable to the want of the precautions referred to in the question, he was not prepared to say; but he was sure of this: that, at the more recent terrible tragedy which took place in Dunedin, the loss of life was distinctly attributable to the want of proper means of escape. That was his justification for putting the question, and he hoped the Government would give a satisfactory answer and take the matter into consideration.

Sir G. GREY said the Government would take the matter into consideration. They would also consider, if such provisions were made, to what extent they ought to go, and whether the means of escape should not be provided for the inmates of private houses also. The whole subject would receive careful consideration.

LAND-TAX.

Mr. SEYMOUR asked the Premier, If he will lay before this House a return of the value of all properties in New Zealand under the Land-Tax Act, showing in such return the amount for each borough and county separately, and giving the value with improvements and without improvements?

Sir G. GREY said the return was nearly completed. It had been in course of preparation for some time, and would be laid on the table in a few days.

GOLD PROSPECTORS.

Mr. BEETHAM asked the Government, if it is their intention, during the present session, to introduce a measure providing protection for prospectors for gold in districts that have not been proclaimed gold fields?

Mr. GISBORNE said that prospectors now received assistance from the Government under certain conditions; and, if they discovered a payable gold field, they were entitled to a reward from the £5,000 which had been already voted by the House. With respect to the question itself, he could only say that the whole subject of what protection can be extended to prospectors outside gold fields was under the consideration of the Government, and he was now in communication with the Law Officers in order to ascertain how the law stood, and to see whether any arrangement such as that suggested could be made.

DROMORE GOODS-SHED.

Mr. WRIGHT asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether any instructions have been given for the erection of a goods-shed at Dromore in time for the next grain season? It would perhaps be advisable to give the Minister for Public Works a little information as to the probable traffic that might be expected from the erection of this station during the ensuing season. The Dromore Station stood about midway between Ashburton and Chertsey, and was fully five miles from either of them. It was the outlet for something like 40,000 acres of agricultural land, of which 7,000 acres were under crop; and, with an average harvest, the weight of grain that would be carried next season might be set down at something like 5,000 tons, and with a good season 50 per cent. more. The settlers in that neighbourhood did not wish to ask for any unreasonable expenditure, but, inasmuch as the station at present was represented by a naked siding and a small platform for passengers, they thought it only fair that they should have the accommodation that would be afforded by the erection of a goods-shed before next harvest. It made a great difference to persons in the locality whether they made one or two trips a day with their teams, and was a matter of great importance to the settlers of the district. He laid stress upon this question, because application was made to the Commissioner of Railways about this time last year, and the reply given was that the probable traffic of the station would not justify the erection of a goods-shed. But the traffic would follow the erection of the shed, and without that accommodation the settlers were driven to the alternative of carting their produce either to Ashburton or to Chertsey. He hoped the Minister for Public Works, in his reply, would be able to say that instructions had already been given.

Mr. MACANDREW said there had been several communications on the subject, and the matter had been referred to the department to be reported upon. A full report had been sent in, from which he found it was considered that further accommodation was not necessary. There was already a siding there, and the stream of traffic flowed in the direction of Chertsey and Ashburton. Under the circumstances, he was advised that the present accommodation was ample. At the same time, after the statement of the honorable member, he would have the matter again inquired into, and perhaps a different conclusion might be arrived at. It was rather a difficult matter to deal with, because they could not have goods-sheds at every second mile on the line. He thought that perhaps the siding and platform might answer the purpose in the meantime.

S. PHILLIPS.

Mr. SWANSON asked the Government, What action, if any, has been taken in the matter of the petition of Samuel Phillips, presented and reported upon during the last session of the Assembly by the Public Petitions Committee?

Mr. THOMSON replied that no action had yet been taken by the Government in the matter; but, from inquiries they had made, they were of opinion that the petition should be referred back to the Committee in order that further evidence might be taken. He proposed to give notice of a motion to that effect.

OTAGO CENTRAL RAILWAY.

Mr. PYKE asked the Minister for Public Works, When the Government will cause the survey of the Otago Central Railway to be completed from Clyde to Lake Wanaka? He was induced to ask the question at this early period of the session, because the counties were prevented from making roads and building bridges, and the Government were prevented from selling land in the country indicated, until the route the railway would take was known. Under present circumstances, the settlement of the country and the prosecution of public works were at a standstill.

Mr. MACANDREW was informed that the survey was about to be resumed, if, in fact, it had not already been resumed. He had no doubt whatever that it would be completed long before they were in a position to construct that portion of the line. However, for the reasons mentioned by the honorable member, it was desirable that the survey should be completed.

TELEGRAPH OFFICIALS.

Mr. STEVENS asked the Postmaster-General, Whether it is a fact that it is proposed by the Government that operators and other officers in the Telegraph Department should not receive payment for overtime; and that, in addition to morning duty on Sundays, they will be expected to work from five to seven o'clock p.m. without payment for that duty?

Mr. J. T. FISHER said it was proposed to abolish the system of overtime at all large stations; but this would not be done until the staffs were so strengthened that no operator would be called upon to do more than eight hours' duty. The proposed system would prove much more acceptable and pleasant to the officers than the present one. The staffs of the following stations had already been brought up to the standard, to enable the overtime to be suspended from the 1st October—viz., Hokitika, Greymouth, Timaru, Oamaru, Auckland, Nelson, Grahamstown, New Plymouth, and Wanganui. The extra duty on Sunday was from six to seven p.m., and no overtime for this would be allowed; but, as Sunday duty was taken alternately, it would not bear heavily upon any particular officer.

SYDENHAM MARKET RESERVE.

Mr. STEVENS asked the Minister of Lands, When the title to a piece of land in the Borough of Sydenham, commonly known as the Cattle Market Reserve, will be completed in favour of that borough? Just before leaving home he was informed by the authorities of the borough that this transaction had not yet been completed by the Government gazeteting the necessary notice, although they had undertaken to give this piece of ground to the borough. He wished to know when the transaction would be completed.

Mr. THOMSON said it appeared that the piece of land in question was purchased by the Provincial Government of Canterbury as a market site for the Borough of Christchurch, but, as the land was within the Borough of Sydenham, that borough had the control of the land in the meantime.

Mr. STEVENS would like to ask the honorable gentleman to complete his answer. He wished to know when the matter would be completed in such a manner that the land would become the property of Sydenham, as had been undertaken by the Government.

Mr. THOMSON had given the honorable gentleman all the information he possessed on the subject. He was simply informed that this market reserve was within the limits of the Borough of Sydenham, and that until certain claims which the Borough of Christchurch might have upon the land were settled the Municipal Council of Sydenham had control.

AUDIT OF LOCAL BODIES' ACCOUNTS.

Mr. FINN asked the Government, (1) Whether it is their intention to introduce a measure providing for the audit, by public officers, of the accounts of Municipalities and other public bodies; and (2) whether they will also provide for a similar audit of benefit and building societies? He begged to point out that provision was already made for the audit of County Council accounts, but no audit was provided for municipal and other local bodies' accounts. As to the latter part of the question, he was sure that the Government, owing to the revelations in other parts of the colony, would see that it was absolutely necessary that such a provision should be introduced.

Sir G. GREY said the Government had had under consideration the propriety of subjecting to audit the accounts of all the bodies receiving any Government moneys. Some of the details of what should be done had been agreed upon. In regard to the latter part of the question, the Government had not, up to the present time, considered the subject. He thought it was well worthy of consideration, and it would be taken into consideration at an early date.

KAIAPOI RAILWAY WORKS.

Mr. BOWEN asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether the Public Works Department will make good the damage done by the railway works to the protective embankments formed by the Kaiapoi Borough Council, as shown by the report of the Resident Engineer, dated 14th November, 1878? The Minister for Public Works would remember that on several occasions he had drawn the honorable gentleman's attention to the fact that the railway works on the Waimakariri River were damaging and destroying the embankment constructed by the Borough Council. The honorable gentleman promised that an inquiry should be made; and the result was, that the engineer reported that an alteration would have to be made. The department, however, had maintained the groin above the Railway Bridge for a long time, greatly to the detriment of the borough. He understood the honorable gentleman to admit at the time that if it were shown that such damage had been done it would be a liability of the department. The engineer who made the report estimated the damage at something like £500. The borough was by no means a rich one. They had had great difficulty in keeping the water out of the town, and he hoped the honorable gentleman would see the fairness of the claim which they made, that the department should make good the damage shown to be done by the manner in which the bridge and groin were originally put across the river.

Mr. MACANDREW said that this had been a questio vexata among experts, and there had been several reports upon it. He was inclined to think the damage had been done, but he was not exactly prepared to say that £500 was the amount of damage. He would cause further inquiry to be made to arrive at a definite conclusion. He thought loss had been sustained, and that the Government would have to make good that loss.

GREYMOUTH-HOKITIKA RAILWAY.

Mr. SEDDON asked the Government, Whether they intend to keep the promises made to the Borough Council of Kumara and the County Council of Westland, relative to authorizing a survey of country between the Rivers Teremakau and Ararua, with a view of deviating from the present surveyed line of the Greymouth and Hokitika Railway, and making a detour so that, when constructed, the line would pass through the towns of Kumara, Goldsbrough, and Stafford? This was a matter of very great importance. Two hundred thousand pounds had been voted by the House for the construction of a railway between Hokitika and Greymouth. Since that line was originally surveyed, a population of five thousand souls had sprung up at a place called Kumara, and it would only require a slight detour in the line to include this township and the townships of Goldsbrough and Stafford. There had been an agitation in favour of making this detour, and the Government were asked to authorize the survey. In a letter to the Borough Council they promised to refer the matter to Mr. Blair, the Engineer for the Middle Island, and to place at the disposal of the borough the report of the surveyor. This was only a short time ago, but, seeing that his colleague had on the Order Paper a motion for a Select Committee to inquire into the matter, he thought it only right to ask that this survey should be made, in order to lay the surveyor's report before the Committee, because upon that would greatly depend the construction of this detour.

Mr. MACANDREW replied that there had been a great deal of correspondence with regard to this detour, and he had been asked to make a flying survey. He was told that the detour would involve an expenditure of £250,000, and, that being the case, he had not pressed forward the survey. At the same time that amount was speculative, and in order to set the question at rest it might be well to have the survey made. He would therefore give the necessary instructions. He had really thought that the amount named was altogether beyond their means—at present, at all events; otherwise the survey might have been through before now.

Mr. SEDDON explained that the length of the detour was only eight miles, and at £6,000 per mile it would only cost £48,000. The amount involved altogether in the railway from Grey-mouth to Hokitika was £220,000, and £20,000 extra would pay for this detour.

MANUKAU COUNTY TOLLS.

Major HARRIS asked the Government, if they will have any objection to lay before this House—(1) copies of all correspondence between the Government and the Manukau County Council relative to the abolition of Otahuhu and Slippery Creek toll-bars; (2) a return showing the receipts and expenditure of tolls collected at each of the foregoing toll-bars for the year ending 30th June last; and (3) a return showing receipts and expenditure of tolls collected at Tamaki Bridge for the year ending 30th June last?

Sir G. GREY replied that the correspondence and returns asked for would be laid on the table.

GOVERNOR'S INSTRUCTIONS AND COMMISSION.

Mr. BOWEN asked the Government, if a copy of the Royal Instructions, together with His Excellency's Commission, will be laid before this House at an early date? A promise had been made by the Premier last session that a copy of the Royal Instructions would be laid on the table. An alteration had been made in the form of the Commission and the Royal Instructions, and it was customary to lay such documents on the table of the House.

Sir G. GREY said the Government would apply to His Excellency for a copy of the papers, and when obtained they would be laid on the table of the House without delay.

BRIBERY BILL.

Mr. SAUNDERS asked the Government, if it is their intention to introduce a Bribery Bill this session? In asking this question, he should like to make a few remarks not of a debatable character, because it was one of those subjects which he should be sorry to prostitute for party purposes in that House. He trusted that all sides of the House would see the importance of a measure of this kind being introduced. He asked the question notwithstanding the present position of the Government, because he found it was necessary that a Bill should be introduced early in the session, or it got slaughtered amongst the innocents. This Bill had been unusually unfortunate in that respect once or twice. They had a Bill, which he thought a very good one, introduced by the Government the session before last. That Bill was unfortunate, and was never passed. He looked upon this question as one of the most important in connection with the power of the electors in this colony to send men to Parliament under equal circumstances, whether rich or poor. It was very important that they should introduce a Bill of this kind as one of the liberal measures. He hoped, no matter what Government sat on those benches, they would be prepared to carry out such a measure. Although he had put the question in the form in which it appeared on the Order Paper, there were two other words which he should like to insert. He should like to put the question in this form: Whether the Government intended to introduce and support a Bribery Bill?—because, when the measure was introduced before, the Government did not support it.

Sir G. GREY replied that the Government had prepared a Bribery Bill, which was already printed, and it was their intention to introduce it at the earliest possible date.

TIMARU UNEMPLOYED.

Mr. WAKEFIELD asked the Government, Whether they have received any communication from the unemployed at Timaru, and whether they will be able soon to employ on public works any considerable number of those who are now seeking work there?

Mr. MACANDREW said the Government had received no communication from the unemployed at Timaru. They had received no communication from the Mayor of the borough or anybody else.

Mr. WAKEFIELD would like the honorable gentleman to answer the latter part of the question.

Mr. MACANDREW said his answer to the latter part of the question was "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." No application had been made to the Government on the subject, and no steps had been taken to meet the case.

Mr. WAKEFIELD did not make any remarks in putting the question, as he assumed that such a communication had been received. He had seen from the newspapers that such a communication had been sent to the Government.

Mr. MACANDREW said no communication had been received by the Government.

COMMISSIONER OF RAILWAYS, MIDDLE ISLAND.

Mr. DICK asked the Minister for Public Works, If he will lay before this House copies of all correspondence and reports relative to the permanent location of the Commissioner of Railways for the Middle Island?

Mr. MACANDREW replied that there would be no objection to lay the correspondence on the table, and it was now being copied.

HAMILTON RAILWAY BRIDGE.

Mr. WHITAKER asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether the amount required for the construction of the railway-bridge over the Waikato River, at Hamilton, was not included in the sum of £168,000 voted by this House in the session of 1878 for the construction of the Thames-Waikato Railway to Omahu, and part of which vote has been expended between the Thames River and Grahamstown? He was led to ask this question by the somewhat evasive answer given to the House on this subject by the Minister for Public Works. It was stated then by him that the Government would enter into a contract for the construction of the railway bridge at Hamilton so soon as the money was voted for that purpose.

Mr. MACANDREW did not know whether it was exactly parliamentary to characterize the reply of any member of this House as evasive. He supposed the honorable member was new to the forms of the House. He thought the honorable member, in common with others, was labouring under a misapprehension upon this subject. In the first place, no such sum as £168,000 had been voted by this House for the construction of this railway. The sum was £30,000, which he believed was insufficient to include the erection of a railway bridge. That amount was in course of expenditure on the railway from the Thames to the Waikato, as voted by this House.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HALL.—Mr. Speaker, I beg to ask the indulgence which is usually granted by the House to honorable members who may wish to bring before it any matter affecting their personal character. I have had my attention called to a letter in the New Zealander of this day, signed by a person who calls himself "J. C. Brown." Sir, this person makes statements which affect my character, and therefore I trust the House will bear with me for one or two moments. The statements made are two in number. They are statements affecting my character in the discharge of my duties as a Minister of the Crown. The second statement I shall only briefly advert to. It is, that I was a party to sending the Government steamer "Luna" down to Otago to bring up two particular gentlemen to Wellington. I can only say with regard to that, that it is an entire mistake, as any honorable member will find out, on making inquiry, that the steamer on that occasion was sent to Otago to carry back the San Francisco mail, and on returning it is true that she did bring up those gentlemen. That will no doubt be found from an examination of the records of the Post Office Department at the time. The other statement is contained in the following paragraph of that letter. This person writes, he is not likely to support a Government with John Hall as Premier.

Mr. BROWN.—Hear, hear.

Mr. HALL.—Well, I can only say that that is a statement which is very satisfactory to John Hall. This person then goes on, "My own experience of a Government of which the leader of the Opposition was a member—I refer to the Vogel-cum-Hall Government of 1872, when that Government was on its last legs, on the eve of the division which brought the Stafford Government into existence—is this: The Hall Government offered to myself anything I chose to name for my vote. My reply was, that I required nothing for myself, but that they should be honest in their dealings." Sir, this is a statement made not in this House. Of course, any statement made by a member in this House affecting my character, or any statement from which I was compelled to differ, I should express my dissent from in the usual parliamentary terms; but this is a statement made by a person in a public newspaper outside the House, and I have the right of characterizing that statement in very plain English. Now, Sir, the gentlemen who were members of the Government with myself at that time were—the late Sir Donald McLean, Mr. Fox, Mr. Julius Vogel, Mr. J. D. Ormond, Mr. William Reeves, the Hon. Henry John Miller, and the Hon. William Giesborne, who is now Minister of Mines. The testimony of Sir Donald McLean cannot now be obtained. The testimony of Sir Julius Vogel and Sir Edward Stafford cannot be obtained soon. The testimony of Mr. Reeves, who was Minister of Works for the Middle Island—with which part of the colony I understand this person is connected—I shall endeavour to obtain with the least possible delay. I have appealed to Mr. Ormond and the Hon. Henry John Miller, and I shall appeal to the Minister of Mines presently. There is no difference whatever in the testimony of those honorable gentlemen. Sir, the statement in the letter is, not that any overtures were made by any one connected with, or on the part of, the Government, but it was by the Hall Government itself; and the evident intention of that statement is to implicate myself, and to bring discredit on myself at the present time. I have now only to ask the House to believe this: that that statement is an absolute, unblushing, and unmitigated falsehood—that there is not one particle of truth in it.

Mr. BROWN.—I think, Sir, I shall claim the privilege of this House—

Hon. MEMBERS.—Order, order.

Mr. BROWN.—I speak to a point of order. The point of order is this: that the person who is leader of the Opposition refers to a statement which appears in this day's paper as being an unblushing—

Mr. HALL.—An absolute, unblushing, and unmitigated falsehood.

Mr. BROWN.—I, Sir, will give him an opportunity of calling for a Select Committee to prove that every word I have said is true.

Mr. SPEAKER.—What is the point of order?

Mr. BROWN.—The point of order is this: whether the member has a right to designate another member by such a term as he has done?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The question of privilege protecting what a member may say does not extend beyond the words that are used in the course of debate in this House.

Mr. HALL.—Neither myself, nor any members of the then Government to whom I have referred, have the slightest recollection that the name of this person, J. C. Brown, was ever mentioned in the Government. Sir, I have now only to say that I think any further comment on my part is unnecessary. I feel confident that neither myself nor my then colleagues will suffer from any statement made by that person. I will conclude by asking the Minister of Mines whether he has any recollection of the circumstance, and whether he believes that statement I have read to be founded on truth or not.

Mr. GISBORNE.—An appeal has been made to me. I was a member of the Government at the time. I have certainly no knowledge of such an offer having been made as is described in the letter, and I certainly should have been no party myself to making it. I would not consent for a moment to sit in any Ministry which agreed to make an offer of the kind expressed in that letter.

Mr. BROWN.—I think it is necessary that I should say a few words. I say that John Hall was a member of the Government without portfolio at that time; and that he will admit. I challenge that honorable gentleman to call for a Committee of Inquiry, and I will prove there all that has been stated in that letter, and maybe more. The Government, on the occasion referred to, descended to all manner of means for support. They were continually in the lobbies, full of promises. I exonerate my friend the Minister of Mines, Mr. Gisborne; I also exonerate Mr. Hall, he being at the time in the Upper House. If required I will bring positive proof that such offers were made.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Name, name.

Mr. BROWN.—Call for a Committee, and the truth will come out. A great deal more than this was done. Let him call for a Committee: I challenge him to do it.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Name, name!

Mr. BROWN.—I say he was a member of that Government. When I entered Parliament in 1870, he was one of two who introduced me to the Speaker. I was not a supporter of the Vogel Government. He came up to impeach them, and the next session he was in office with them—politically, a Johnny H-all-sorts.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must call on the honorable member for Tuaepeka to withdraw that language. I cannot allow such language to be used here.

Mr. BROWN.—What am I to withdraw?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The very offensive nickname you thought proper to apply to the honorable member for Selwyn.

Mr. BROWN.—If it is necessary to withdraw it, I consent.

Mr. BOWEN.—The honorable gentleman, I understand, was making a personal explanation.

I do not know whether it would be reasonable to ask him why he called the Ministry the Hall Ministry, when he wrote the letter.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think the honorable member for Kaiapoi has a right to interpose in this discussion.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Mr. J. T. FISHER.—Sir, it is not my intention to take up the time of the House to any great extent, but, as a member of the Government having the confidence of the country, it is only right I should say a few words. My honorable friend the leader of the Opposition told me the other day that if his predecessor had had the use of the Government steamers he would have been in the House in my place. Well, Sir, the honorable gentleman and his party did all they could to keep me out of the House; but they could not do it: and I should not have been afraid had that honorable gentleman come down to fight me. I had once the honor of contesting the seat with a first-class knight, and, if he could not beat me, a second-class knight would have had very little chance. Now, in connection with the Opposition, what is the main feature that presents itself? They are a disunited Opposition—I will not say a factious Opposition, but it is rather a near approach to it—an Opposition so disunited that, while they are agreed to turn out the present Government, they were not united enough to choose a leader from amongst themselves. They were obliged to go to the Upper House to select a leader who could carry out their liberal measures. It is a remarkable thing that honorable gentlemen should profess Liberalism, but what most surprises me is that they should have the effrontery to do so, seeing that these gentlemen, though calling themselves Liberals, have never done anything liberal in their lives. I think this is the second time the honorable member for Selwyn has come down from above to take part in the proceedings of this House; and I remember that on one occasion he was very glad to get out of here again, for fear the doors of the place above should for ever be closed against him. I was exceedingly disappointed with his speech the other night. To my mind it was weak in the extreme. I expected something vigorous from the honorable gentleman; but it appears to me that when he jumped into the mantle of his predecessor he found it to be cold and damp, and that that fact had a very depressing effect upon him. The charges he brought forward were very much the same as those brought forward by his predecessor; but I must admit that his attack was not characterized by that coarseness which had marked the speech of the previous leader of the Opposition on a similar occasion. I have always taken a great interest in my honorable friend the honorable member for Selwyn, because we commenced our life in the colony together. However, he soon took to polishing up "the handle of the big front door" of a provincial office in Canterbury, while I remained where I was. By-and-by he was able to make provincial laws, and got so far advanced as to make them pleasant and beneficial to himself and his friends. He was one of those gentlemen who voted for giving runs to the large squatters, in spite of a protest by a large number of members, which protest still remains on the records of the Provincial Council of Canterbury. This is the honorable gentleman who aspires to lead the Liberal party. Then I remember he started a small local industry in the way of manufacturing those celebrated gridirons, and afterwards went in for the creation of pre-emptive rights—both striking instances of his advanced liberal ideas. I really think the honorable gentleman has made a mistake in coming forward as a Liberal leader. Unfortunately for the country he has never done anything to show that he is liberal; and when, after making use of provincial institutions for a while, he got into the Upper House, he there assisted to kick over the ladder which had done so much for him, and which had been a blessing to the country.

Mr. HALL.—The honorable gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. FISHER.—Then I apologize. I was under the impression that he did attempt to kick over provincial institutions. At any rate, he joined the Government which did kick over the old provinces.

Mr. HALL.—I was in England at the time.

Mr. FISHER.—I mean the Stafford Government. It was they who brought in the New Provinces Act, and the Westland County Act, and these Acts were the first blows levelled at the provinces. The honorable gentleman was a member of that Government, as well as of other Governments; and, in fact, he ought to be regarded as a political Vicar of Bray. Now he objects to the Land-Tax Act; but, after the benefit he has derived from the prosecution of public works in the colony, he ought to be one of the last to object to the land-tax. I believe that that tax is one of the best that could have been levied. Surely the large estates that have reaped such immense benefit from the public works of the colony ought to pay their fair share towards meeting the interest on the debt we have incurred thereby; and the honorable gentleman more particularly ought to feel grateful that a line of railway has been run through, or, at any rate, very close to, his estate, and has been of the utmost benefit to him. I will not refer in detail to the various charges that have been brought against the Government; but there are just one or two matters that deserve notice. My honorable friend referred to the "Hinemoa;" but I should like to know who purchased the "Hinemoa." Not this Government, but a prior Government, who purchased her for a yacht; and, if the present Government have used her, it has been for a purpose that the late Government never attempted to use her for. The present Premier has used the "Hinemoa" for the purpose of visiting various parts of the colony, and informing the people of the steps that were intended to be taken for their benefit. The late Government certainly did not do that; and why? Simply because they had no policy, unless you can call their destructiveness a policy—a policy for destroying the provinces, but not a policy for putting anything in their place.

An Hon. MEMBER.—There is time for that.

Mr. FISHER.—Well, it is time that time arrived. They never cared for using the "Hinemoa." All the "continuous Ministry" cared for was to destroy the provinces, and to take "political rest," with an occasional cruise in the steamer. The steamer has been used for a beneficial purpose since the present Government came into office. The Premier, by using her, has not only been able to do the work of the country, but has mixed among the people, and has been able to learn what the wants of the country are. Another charge that has been made against the Government is, that they have interfered improperly with the Civil Service of the country by putting outsiders into it; but I think the Opposition have only been able to discover one instance. Other Governments have done much worse than that. I remember a Government which made four such appointments, two of the appointees being members of this House at the time. That cannot be done now; but still it should be remembered, that that Government actually appointed two members of Parliament to the Civil Service. I have a strong feeling with regard to the Civil Service of the colony. I think great care ought to be taken that no outsiders are placed in the Service. When persons in the Service are capable of performing the duties required for a particular office, they should be promoted. What chance is there of a good Civil Service, if outside men are to be taken and put above the heads of old Civil servants? I have a strong feeling in the matter, for I once belonged to a class of men who prayed for promotion. Had any one been placed over my head after I had served the two years to entitle me to promotion, I should have felt very much aggrieved; therefore I hold that, if we can find men in the Service capable of doing the work we require, we should not go outside the Service to fill up the vacancies that may occur. Then we had a charge about a clock—that the Premier had for political purposes presented a clock to his Christchurch constituents. Well, Sir, I can only say that the clock had been lying useless in Christchurch for years; and really I cannot see what political dishonesty can be attached to an action of that sort. It is not worth my while to refer to the many other statements that have been made; but I should like to say a few words on the allegations that we have heard regarding immigration. Any gentleman in this House must know what has been going on in the colony of late, and must know that we must deal cautiously with immigration in the present state of affairs. Why, we have now hundreds of men travelling through the country seeking for employment: still, a few months ago we had great pressure put upon us to bring more immigrants out. We know the class from whom that pressure comes; but we do not want to see a lot of men running about the country looking for something to do. There are plenty of men in the colony who object to the present condition of things, and say wages are too high. Those gentlemen would like to see repeated here a state of things in which men get but 4s. a day, with work but three days a week, and have to pay 8s. a week out of their earnings to get a miserable two-roomed shanty. I have had practical experience of these things, and I do not wish to see men brought out here to such a life as that. There are now a great many immigrants on their way—some nominated and some paying their own passage—but, in the present state of things, I do not know where they are going to find employment. I suppose the Government will be expected to find them employment. To my mind all the charges that have been made against the Government are very trumpery. They are not statesmanlike, and I certainly did expect something better from the mover. Altogether, I think the House will do well to pause before they affirm such a motion as has been brought by the honorable member for Selwyn.

Mr. MURRAY.—Sir, I do not wish to allow this debate to come to a close without expressing some of the views which I hold with regard to the amendment of the honorable member for Selwyn. I was one of those who did not take any part in the division which resulted in the defeat of the Ministry last session and the consequent dissolution of the House. I failed to see at the time the grounds upon which His Excellency was advised to grant a dissolution. The House had expressed itself as favourable to all the liberal measures which the Government proposed as their political platform. The Electoral Bill was passed by this House and by the other branch of the Legislature in almost the identical form in which it had emanated from the Ministry. We should naturally suppose that that measure was the result of the united wisdom and deep consultation of the honorable gentlemen who occupy those benches; but my own conviction is that it was not so, but that the measure was the result of the labour of an honorable gentleman whom we all regret to see absent from the House—I mean the late Attorney-General, Mr. Stout. When, however, that measure was prepared and placed before this House, it suddenly seemed to occur to one or two gentlemen connected with the Ministry, who were well acquainted with the Native people, and particularly partial to them, that they should confer a special privilege upon the Native race which Europeans do not possess. In fact, following out a peculiar characteristic of the administration of affairs in New Zealand, we were called upon to regard the Maoris as vastly superior to the Europeans. But the Upper House very properly declined to say that the Anglo-Saxon race was inferior to the Maori or any other race. They would not say two Europeans were only as good as one Maori, and therefore they returned the measure to the House in the exact form in which it emanated from the Ministry. The House is consequently not to blame for that measure not being the law of the land now; and on that ground there was no necessity for granting a dissolution. As to the redistribution of seats, I would ask, What has this Ministry done during the years it has been in office? And what did the Ministry who preceded them do? Neither of them made any attempt whatever to put the representation of the people on a fair basis. The proposal which was placed before Parliament in 1875, and which was passed into law, simply added a few more members, and the result certainly did not go to show that an increase of members tended to the more efficient discharge of public duties. As many honorable gentlemen know, that is a matter in which I myself have taken an active part on several occasions, and have endeavoured to get a fairer distribution of the representation. The late honorable member for Riverton, Dr. Hodgkinson, son, also moved in the same direction; but he could get no response from the honorable gentlemen on the Ministerial benches. It is therefore no fault of this House that that measure has not become law; and, if the House does not fairly represent the population of the country, we are not to blame, but the gentlemen who lead the House. The House last year represented the country just as well as it does now, and consequently that was no fair ground on which to advise His Excellency to grant a dissolution. I do not regard the question of triennial Parliaments as a burning cry, and I told my constituents so. I look upon it as only one of those political cries raised by the Chartists in England years ago, and under entirely different circumstances; and therefore we, in this colony, are called upon to adopt the measure. The Imperial Parliament two hundred years ago tried the system of septennial Parliaments, and have never since seen cause to change it. I say that if a man be returned by a constituency for five years, or even three years, and they see cause for losing confidence in him, they should not be compelled to retain him for even one year. Let us make a fair compromise, and have our Parliaments elected for four years instead of five, if you think that too long, but leave it open to any constituency to sign a petition and send it to you, Sir, as soon as their representative has lost their confidence; and you should there and then be compelled to issue a new writ, so that no constituency might necessarily be misrepresented for more than one year. On these grounds I see no reason why the country should have been put to an expense of at least £100,000 by the last elections; why the constituents should have been put to all this trouble at the most inconvenient season of the year—they should have been taken away from the useful employment of putting seed into the ground merely to play at politics. And all this was done purely on personal grounds. Who opposed the measures of those honorable gentlemen? Nobody. The question that was sent to the country was simply whether two or three gentlemen whom the House had by a large majority declared to be unfit to govern the country were still to remain on those benches. This action of His Excellency—and I say it with all respect—appears to me to have put the House in this position as a precedent for all future time: that it must submit to the grossest misgovernment; or, if it does not, a Ministry can say, "We will put the country to an expense of at least £100,000 by advising the Governor to grant a dissolution." That is the effect of granting a dissolution, not on a policy, but on the question of whether gentlemen who have lost the confidence of the House are to remain on the Ministerial benches. Having made these remarks on the policy of the Government and on the question of dissolution, I will now turn to the question immediately before the House—namely, His Excellency's Speech. His Excellency says, "It is matter for congratulation that, notwithstanding the severe monetary pressure and commercial gloom which have for some time past prevailed throughout the world, the position of this colony is thoroughly sound." We are asked to affirm that proposition without any information being laid before us. Where is the Financial Statement? Where is the information we ought to have as to the financial condition of the country when we are asked to affirm such a proposition as that? I will state a few facts which I have collated, notwithstanding the reticence as to financial matters of the honorable gentleman who occupies the position of Colonial Treasurer at the present time. I find that the bank returns show that the advances made during the year 1878 amounted to £12,633,497, and for the year ending 30th June last £14,017,707, showing an increased indebtedness to the banks of £1,384,210. The mortgage indebtedness of the colony to the commencement of the year 1878 was £14,065,351; the mortgages during the year 1878 amounted to £7,872,821, and the releases to £2,720,297, showing an increase to the amount of the mortgage indebtedness of £5,152,524, and making the amount of mortgages up to the end of 1878 £19,217,875. Taking the mortgages for the present year at the same rate they would amount to date to £3,600,000, making the private mortgages at the present time £22,817,875. I have not been able to arrive at an exact estimate of the indebtedness of local bodies, but I think it may be fairly estimated at about £2,000,000. Adding these to the bank advances, we have a total indebtedness in these respects of £38,835,582. The public debt of the colony at the present time is £23,222,311. Add to this the new £5,000,000 loan, and we have a total private and public debt of £67,057,893, from which deduct the Sinking Fund Account, £1,709,007, and we find that the debts of New Zealand to internal and external creditors amount to £65,348,886. I challenge any of the honorable gentlemen on those benches to disprove my figures. This is not all due to external creditors, a considerable amount being represented by creditors in the colony, and by depositors in the banks; but, taking a fair estimate—and I am borne out in it by gentlemen of considerable acquaintance with such subjects, the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse amongst others—I believe the total yearly debt-charge for public and private debts due to external creditors amounts to upwards of £3,000,000. So that we have to send out as a tribute to the foreign capitalist more than the whole value of our wool exports. Taking, now, the import and export returns, I find them in the same unsatisfactory condition. In 1871 the value of our exports was £5,282,084, and in 1878 £5,192,487, or a decrease of £90,597. My figures as regards the exports for the present year do not agree with those of the Government, because they estimate the whole of the wool exported at 1s. 1½d. a pound, whereas I estimate it at 10d. That is about the net price to the people of New Zealand, after deducting freight and all charges. I am sure honorable members who know anything of the subject will agree that my estimate of 10d. a pound in the colony is a high estimate, and shows that the Government have over-estimated the value of our wool exports for last year by £823,213. Our imports for 1878 amounted to £3,755,667; and, if we deduct the value of the exports from that, it leaves £3,563,180 as the excess of our imports over exports. We have to meet this in some way, and we have also to meet the charge on our public debt outside the colony, so that there is a deficiency of £8,563,180, to be met either by introducing foreign capital or increasing our public debt. These figures will, I think, show us that there are some grounds for apprehension, and that the financial condition of the colony is not in so satisfactory a condition as His Excellency's Advisers would lead the House to suppose. When we have these facts staring us in the face—these enormous liabilities which the colony has to meet—it appears to me to be trifling with the matter to be talking about great constitutional questions, and about future generations in the colony. What we have to do is to set ourselves to work to consider gravely the present condition of the colony, how we are to bring in foreign capital to assist us, how we are to provide for the unemployed and for those who are in distress and destitution; and not to talk about bringing up our children to be statesmen, and about the poverty and misery in which people live at Home, or of the grinding rapacity of the rich there. We have nothing to do with them. What we want to do is to pass such liberal measures as will induce foreign capital to come here. Now, what has the Government done to carry out such a proposal as that? Who was it raised the price of land in New Zealand? Who was it compelled the deferred-payment settler to pay £3 an acre for his land? Who was it sold the deferred-payment land by auction, and in some instances compelled the struggling settler, whose cause they championed, to pay £17 10s. an acre for it? Not to pay it—for of course they could not; and in two years' time many of those industrious men who had saved up a few hundred pounds and taken up locations, were forced by this auction system to pay enormous prices, and now they are penniless. They have lost the labour of years, their savings have gone, and they must go forth to seek employment and begin the world anew; and this is owing to the Government who claim a desire to settle the working-men upon the land of New Zealand. As foreign countries have been referred to, I may perhaps be allowed to allude to the position of the French agriculturists; and it is a matter of importance for us to consider the position they occupy, as it has been frequently referred to by other speakers, both in the House and outside. I find that in France there are no less than 4,000,000 freeholders, and that 4,500,000 of the French people hold the French rentes, whereas in England only 238,000 of the people hold the national debt. Now, this comparison is very suggestive, and is one which we should do well to consider in shaping our land regulations and our system of government; because it appears to me that if in England, with the system of taxation spreading over the whole community, the national debt is held by such a small number of people, the tendency must be to increase the disparity between the rich and the poor. And if in England the position is unsatisfactory with regard to the taxation going into the hands of a few consol-holders, how much more unsatisfactory must it become in New Zealand, where the whole of the charges on account of the public debt do not return to fertilize the soil and enrich the people, but leave the colony as tribute to foreign bondholders! These are reasons why we should be particularly careful in the administration of the public funds of the colony. It was hoped that when the Premier took office he would restore the finances of New Zealand to a satisfactory condition, and we were told that he intended to reduce the estimates by a very large amount. I remember him saying that he would go into that room and in half-an-hour reduce the estimates by £100,000. Well, that has not been done. We were told that one of the Government steamers was to be sold. The Ministerial residences were to be disposed of. The honorable member for Tuaepeka has ceased expressing his virtuous indignation against those Ministerial residences which he used to object to so much when they were occupied by the previous Government. Why are not those motions regarding the sale of the Ministerial residences now placed on the Order Paper? Then we were told that there was to be a wonderful change in the administration of Native affairs. Now, I will just read what the Premier said on that point:—

“With regard to the Native lands, we propose at once to withdraw the Native Land Sales Suspension Bill. I find, on consultation with my colleagues, that they agree in the pretty general opinion that this measure is not popular with the Native race, and not likely, in its present form, to produce the advantages that were expected from it. But we find that really all necessary powers are conferred upon us by ‘The Native Lands Act, 1873.’”

And then he goes on to say,—

“Generally, with regard to the Native race, the House may depend upon this: that our policy will be one of continued amalgamation, of instruction of the Native race, of an attempt to encourage the most friendly relations with them. I hope that, our acquaintance with the Native race being now so large, our dealings with them having existed for so many years, a policy such as I have stated may be greatly successful. Of this I am sure—the fact of my having to aid me as a colleague a gentleman born in New Zealand, knowing the Natives from his childhood, and much regarded and esteemed by them, will be to me an advantage such as could not have been enjoyed by a Ministry in New Zealand at an earlier period of its history, because no person so born, so educated, and with such a knowledge of the feelings of the Native race, was then to be found in this country.”

That is the very high character which was given to the present Native Minister. Therefore, if the Ministry have failed in their management of Native affairs, it must have been through their own fault, acting as they did under such very advantageous circumstances. Here is what Mr. Sheehan then said:—

“Apart from the fact that the chance of a Native outbreak is something below zero, all the evidence points in the direction that we need not any further dread a Native war. We know that the Natives themselves wish to be reconciled to their European friends, and that they are desirous of becoming amenable to the law. They are settling down into steady habits, and the King Natives have invited to live amongst them a large number of the most loyal Natives in the colony—I mean the people of whom Te Wheoro is a leading chief. There is another reason why I think we may dismiss from our minds the idea that there is any possibility of a Native outbreak, and that is that the King country is split into two parts.”

I hope honorable members will remark this, because it has been claimed by the present Ministry that they have detached Rewi from the King. But this was during the session of 1877, when the Ministry had only been a few days in office:—

“On the one side we have the King and his party, and on the other side we have Rewi and his party; and I do not think they would unite again to wage war with the Europeans.”

Therefore the great card in the Ministerial game, Rewi, was detached from the King before they had assumed the reins of government; and all these stories we have heard about Rewi coming to us with an offer to make a railway are simply sham and bunkum, and are only used as a means of misleading the southern members, who do not know anything about Native matters. Those gentlemen who represent the part of the country more immediately affected, and who have stood by it resolutely, are those who disbelieve in the Rewi craze. We were told that Rewi was to give land to make a railway from Taranaki to Waikato. Now, I have been making inquiries about this, and I understand that Rewi has not ten thousand acres of his own to give, instead of five million acres. The whole of his hapu only own 140,000 acres, and where, therefore, are the five millions which he is to give to make the railway? Mr. Sheehan goes on to say,—

“It is just as well that we should know this, because there is nothing that could do more harm to the colony than to have the impression go abroad that there was any danger of another Native war. We must remember that our public works policy is unfinished, and, if that policy is to be made the success which its promoters intended it to be, it will be necessary to show to the money-lender in England that the borrowed money will not have to be spent in putting down Native outbreaks, but in carrying on the public works which have already been undertaken. I look upon the money which has already been spent in putting down Native outbreaks in the light of money thrown away."

And in this I quite agree with Mr. Sheehan. But what does he propose to do? To spend £360,000 out of the five-million loan for the very purpose against which he expressed himself so strongly. Well, Sir, that was the manifesto delivered when the Ministry came into power. When they again met the House we were treated to the following passage in His Excellency's Address:—

"I congratulate you on the fact that peaceful relations have at last been established with the Waikato and Ngatimaniapoto tribes. Complying with the pressing and frequently-received invitations of the leading chiefs of those tribes, the Premier and the Native Minister visited them on several occasions in their own districts, and met them also at the Waitara. Papers on this subject will be laid before you. They will show that the long period of serious difficulties with the Native race may reasonably be considered to be approaching a termination. There is now a fair prospect that before long European enterprise and settlement will be welcomed by those great tribes, and that they will gladly avail themselves of the advantages which roads, railways, and telegraphs will bring to their magnificent territory, by which its value, and consequently the wealth and happiness of that portion of the Native race, so long estranged from us, must be largely increased."

And the Governor then went on to the probable construction of a railway from Auckland to Taranaki. The extracts I have read will show the difference between the promises of the Government and what they expected. And what is now the state of Native affairs? In the West it now depends upon the caprice or fanaticism of one man whether or not this colony shall be plunged into a Native war. In the North we find that loyal Natives are in civil discord, which has resulted in the loss of more than one life. We find that surveyors have been shot at the Thames—a place which I know something about; and I think I know the man who was shot; and I may say that this unfortunate occurrence could only have resulted from the grossest contempt on the part of the Maoris for the Government—a contempt which has arisen in consequence of Ministers demeaning themselves and humiliating the colony by grovelling before rebel Natives. It is not sufficient that Her Majesty's Ministers should do honor to rebels, but even His Excellency himself was taken to do honor to Rewi, and to escort him to his home. Troops who have always been ready to defend the colony, and who are prepared at the present time to defend it, were demeaned by having to present arms to a man who had never surrendered to the Queen's authority. This has had a most pernicious effect amongst those Natives who have been loyal and faithful to the Government. What encouragement is it for those Natives to continue loyal, when they are left out in the cold, and see the Government cringing and humiliating themselves before rebels? Now, Sir, I will refer to the land question. His Excellency's Speech says, "A Bill will be submitted for your consideration to suspend plurality of voting in cases of elections of local governing bodies, whilst those bodies are subsidized out of the general revenue of the colony." The Premier told the electors in Auckland that he would not rest satisfied so long as one part of the colony was enjoying affluence and another part was sunk in poverty and destitution, while the public estate which belonged to the colony as a whole was available. We took away the public estates from Otago and Canterbury and made them colonial, but left 20 per cent. as an endowment to the local bodies. His proposal is, under the specious pretence of abolishing plural voting, now to take away that 20 per cent. from the local bodies unless they will agree to submit to a great wrong. Local representation is different altogether from the question of the representation of the people; it is a question of business, and plural voting in the case of the local bodies is perfectly justifiable. The representation of the country is an entirely different matter. Every man who is sane, who is not a drunkard, who is not a criminal, should have equal voting power, because, after all, the laws are only contracts, and only those who are parties to those contracts should be bound by them. And I go further. I agree with the honorable member for Grey and Bell, who is an honor to this House, and a credit to the constituency that returned him, that female suffrage should be adopted in this colony; and if he will bring forward that proposal he shall have my support. I shall now sum up a few of the charges I have to bring against the Ministry, and in doing so I wish to say that my opposition does not extend to the Ministry as a whole. There are gentlemen on those benches who have been my loyal allies in former fights in this House, and I regret that they should have to be judged by the company they keep. I hope that in any change we may make we shall not consider merely personal issues; but I must say that it is not altogether a question of public policy that is now dividing the House—it is a question whether certain gentlemen are capable of conducting the business of the country. In our own private affairs, if we have any particular business to do, we get the best men we can to do it. If we want a lawyer to conduct our business, we employ the most able man we can get; in short, in all branches of business we look for the most trusted, the most capable men; and now that we have these large liberal measures to pass through the Legislature, and various large financial proposals to discuss, we want to have capable men on the Ministerial benches, and not men who have proved themselves to be untrustworthy. In regard to financial reform, the Government have utterly failed. They have confiscated the Land Fund of Otago and Canterbury; they have largely increased the taxation of the colony; they have raised the price of land, and thereby discouraged capital and settlement; and they talk of bursting up the estates of the 414,000 Europeans, who have paid £12,000,000 for 14,000,000 acres of land, while 40,000 Maoris are encouraged to hold 20,000,000 acres unimproved and untaxed. Does not this show special favour? Then, again, it is said the laws of entail and primogeniture must be abolished, and the estates of Europeans be subdivided; but we hear nothing of applying this principle to the vastly greater Maori estates. I need not refer to the promises of the Government to sell the Ministerial residences and the State yachts, or to the proposal to reduce their own salaries. None of these things were done; but they are comparatively trivial matters. But this is the Ministry which increased the honorarium to £210; the Premier now proposes to give salaries to members; and would it not be an ungrateful House that would vote against such a Premier as that? What is to be the salary? Perhaps £500 a year; and what does that mean? An expenditure of about £60,000 a year, which I maintain would be much better spent upon reproductive improvements than in bringing men here to talk politics. Then, again, the Government have used the Legislative Council, the Bench, the magistracy, the public service, and the public property in an unusual and inexcusable manner for party purposes. The Legislative Council has been a credit to this country; but previous Governments, seeing that it was necessary to bring that body more into accordance with liberal institutions, refused to make any further appointments to that House, in order to make the change more easy, but this Government has made a vast number of appointments of a character which I think will not tend to perpetuate the existence of an Upper House. Now the question arises, What change shall be made in the constitution of the Legislative Council?—for the appointments made by the present Government show that a change is necessary. We cannot permit the other branch of the Legislature to be transformed into a sort of museum, to which members are to be sent as a reward for political services. In New South Wales the nominative system is in force; in Victoria the elective system prevails; but neither seems to be thoroughly successful, and it is necessary that some other system should be adopted, and on a future occasion I shall take an opportunity to explain my views upon that point. Then I have another complaint to urge against the Government. They pledged themselves to introduce a Drainage Bill, which is a measure of considerable importance as affecting my own and many other districts in the colony, where its advantages are understood. But, though they did not introduce the Drainage Bill, they did reduce the duty upon sugar, without conferring any practical benefit upon the general consumer. A merchant told me that the general public was not benefited at all, but that the brewers were benefited, for they now largely used sugar instead of malt. But let us look at the matter in another way. The importations of sugar into New Zealand amount to £500,000 per annum, and if inducements were held out for the establishment of sugar factories here we should save a large portion of that amount. As it is, the Government have reduced the duty and lost £100,000. We cannot afford to dispense with our revenue in this way, unless new gold fields are discovered in some parts of the colony; and the next best thing to do is to encourage local industries and save the money of the colony in that way. In France, the production of beet-root sugar amounts to about £10,000,000 sterling annually; the French producers are now sending sugar into England in large quantities; and if we could establish such an industry in New Zealand it would not only be the means of settling down a valuable class of agricultural settlers, but it would save a great amount of money which is sent out of the colony at the present time. I am afraid the Government, by their "liberal" measures, are inflicting serious injury upon the colony. Instead of their Native policy being successful, the so-called Maori King, who previously had very humble pretensions, now claims that the whole of New Zealand is under his sovereignty. Then there is another matter that demands notice. The Premier, I regret to see, has been using his position in a manner which I consider altogether unconstitutional, and unworthy of his antecedents, to raise class feeling throughout the country. During the last want-of-confidence discussion in this House a public meeting was convened in this city, with the object of intimidating the Parliament. That in itself ought to stamp any man as not being the friend of free institutions. Then there is the railway from the Waikato to the Thames, which was to assist in extending the railway system of New Zealand, and, by tapping the navigation of the Thames River at Te Aroha, give the benefit of railway communication to the inhabitants of the Thames Valley and the people at Grahamstown; but, instead of this, the Premier went down to the Hauraki Gulf, and turned the first sod of a railway which was of little advantage to the district. He spent something like £67,000, and it is probable that the £168,000 mentioned in the Public Works Statement, to complete the authorized line of thirty miles from Waikato to Te Aroha, will be swallowed up in this one portion; and when they arrive at Te Aroha there will be a blank of thirty miles between Waikato and the Thames which will not be filled up—the district will not have the advantages of railway communication with our railway system, while the railway constructed will run parallel with the Thames—a fine, navigable river. If the railway between the Waikato and the Thames is found to succeed, this House would probably have to extend the line to Shortland and Grahamstown; but that is a matter for future consideration. However, I must say that the gentlemen who would do these things are utterly unworthy of the confidence of this House. I need not refer to the conduct of the Premier in regard to the Land Act—other members have spoken of that matter; but, when I first heard of it, it appeared to me to resemble the trick of the Heathen Chinese who shoved the "right bower" up his sleeve. Now, no one can approve of such acts. What should I say if I sent a clerk to the Bank with a number of cheques, and found him slipping one up his sleeve? Many years ago, when we were fighting against the squatting interest of Otago, my honorable friend the member for Port Chalmers knows well that he was returned with my assistance to defeat schemes for locking up the lands in the hands of the squatters, and that the Governor at the time did not see fit to exercise the privilege which he undoubtedly possessed of disallowing those Bills. He prefers, when Governor of the country by the will of the people, to act in an unconstitutional manner and try to prevent a Bill becoming law which was the property of both Houses of Parliament, and which he was constitutionally bound to see carried into effect, even supposing he did not approve of it, although, as was the case, it had been passed by his own Government. The Premier also claims to have conferred on the people of New Zealand the priceless boon of free education. How did the Premier confer that boon? Was it by taxation on the Island of Kawau? No. It was conferred by means of the taxation of the whole people of New Zealand: free education of which a large and important section in this community cannot, from conscientious convictions, avail themselves—free education for which all have to pay, but of which only a portion can avail themselves. Now, the plurality of voting is another objection. I have heard that the Government do not intend to press their measure to abolish that: but, if they do not intend to press it, why bring it forward? I say, with Cromwell, we should never engage in battle unless we are determined to press on to victory. If a man does not intend to fight to the bitter end, it only weakens his prestige and influence to engage in battle; and the Government ought not to have placed that paragraph in His Excellency's mouth as part of their proposals. With regard to changes in our system of government, I would say it is not well that we should be continually altering our forms of administration. The welfare of the country is more dependent upon good management than upon continued alteration of the character of its institutions. I opposed the abolition of provinces altogether for that reason, and I think the present Government are now acting in an injudicious manner in trying to stir up class feelings. In saying the present Government, I exclude my friends from Otago and Canterbury. Our endeavour ought to be rather to try to stir up a feeling of generous emulation among the inhabitants of New Zealand to press forward as a united people to fulfil the destinies of a great nation, avoiding class distinctions or party animosities. In the words of Tennyson, let us

And ancient forms of party strife;
Ring in the nobler modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws.

While I hope that, in this new House, we shall have a better state of feeling than appeared to characterize us in the last Parliament, I regret that many of my old friends and some of my opponents, who were an honor to this House, should now be absent. But I am proud to see that the electors of New Zealand have been determined that there should not be all loss as the result of the general election, and have succeeded in returning many men who, I trust, will be faithful to their pledges, and honest to the people of New Zealand. I would suggest to them all that we should endeavour to encourage capital to come amongst us—that we should not, by indiscreet utterances, attempt to drive it away. The Premier, in his speech at Dunedin, said we did not want capital. He said, "Let them take away their capital, and leave us the land." But I ask, what would a man do with fifty acres of land which he would have to cultivate by scratching it with his finger-nails? But give him a plough and a horse by means of capital, and you will soon see a very different result. With regard to immigration, I have read the speeches of the Premier and of the Minister for Public Works. Now, you have all heard what the Premier said with regard to the wickedness of the landowners of New Zealand in trying to bring into the country a lot of men to starve. But what does the Minister for Public Works say?—

"We are told now that there is not sufficient employment in the colony for those whom we have got in it. Well, gentlemen, when I came here, nearly thirty years ago, just exactly the same story was told. I found that immigration was suspended. There was little or no employment at that time: in fact, men were glad to work for 3s. or 3s. 6d. a day. I have no doubt there are some here to-night who can bear me out in my statement. What is more, gentlemen, I am happy to be able to point out scores of people who are now very wealthy men in the province, and the foundation of it was that 3s. 6d. per day. I should like to know where the colony would have been had it not been for immigration then. Why, it was the resumption of immigration which led to increased employment and increased wages. I am persuaded, gentlemen, for my own part, that the same principle should hold good still. If this colony is to prosper, its population must be greatly increased, and the more people we have in the country the better it will be for all. (Cries of 'Oh!') That is my opinion. (Applause.) New Zealand is now, comparatively speaking, a wilderness; and, instead of supporting 400,000 people, I believe it will take many millions of people to beneficially occupy this country. I am more than amazed to hear men trying to woo the electors by decrying immigration. Whilst pandering, as they think, to the prejudices of working-men, they are, in reality, no friends of the working-man."

That is the speech of a statesman and of a man who understands the requirements of New Zealand, and I leave these eloquent words of my honorable friend to answer his chief. My honorable friend the member for Newton, in dealing with this question of immigration, made a most generous and liberal offer to give any man a farm to live upon, and the honorable member will be able to say whether any one responded to that generous offer. In Auckland a homestead law is in force, and the Government may give the land away there for nothing. I do not know what has been done in that direction; but it appears to me that, in dealing with the land, there should be one law all over the colony. Land should not be given away for nothing in Auckland, and in the South be sold at a very high price. In the South we could afford to give a high price, because the system which prevailed there was that a large proportion of the money should go back to the land in the shape of roads and other public works. In dealing with the land question we need not be guided by English precedent alone; we may go back still further in history, to a state of affairs more analogous to the position of New Zealand than in England—when the feudal laws still influenced landed estates. In ancient Rome, referring to the Licinian agrarian laws, Livy says,—

“The greater part of the public domains had been let out to nobles and powerful citizens at nominal rents, and were cultivated by slaves. Instead of farmers and yeomen to constitute an agricultural middle class, the bailiff of the absentee landlord drove slaves into the field to till the soil. The harvest was gathered in due season; but its profits left no trace of wealth where it had grown.”

We must avoid the same evil in New Zealand. We must try to encourage resident proprietors and avoid absenteeism. If we get resident proprietors—not men who have acquired large estates of a hundred thousand acres under Sir George Grey's land regulations, but men who have sufficient to keep them in comfort, with holdings not too small like those of the French “habitans” of Canada, who starve upon holdings infinitesimally subdivided—if we do this, and if we secure wisdom in the administration of affairs, I believe that, notwithstanding the large amount of our debt, New Zealand will be in a sound condition. But I feel that, so long as we have got a Government as at present constituted, there is no hope for such a state of things. Therefore, however painful it may be to vote against friends, I am bound to vote according to my convictions. On this occasion I shall not walk out of the House, but I shall vote against the Ministry as at present constituted.

Mr. BARRON.—Sir, I should not have taken this opportunity of addressing the House had it not been that it seems customary for new members to give some reason for the manner in which they are about to record their votes upon so momentous a question as that now before us. I would rather have the reputation in this House of a useful worker than of a persistent talker. Still, it is a very great pleasure indeed to be able to lay before the House the reasons which actuate me in the vote I propose to give on this question. When before my constituents, I disclaimed entirely being considered a party man—as being considered one of those who will vote straight with the party, and ask no questions. I lay claim to independence of action in every respect. There is probably no member of the House who is freer from the trammels of promises or the trammels of party than I am. Still, it will cause me very great pain indeed should the present amendment be carried. It would be a pity, for instance, to spoil an excellent Opposition by converting them into a bad Government. To secure both sides of all questions being properly represented, it is highly necessary that we should encourage a good Opposition. I do not know what is the experience of older members, but I have a high opinion of some of the gentlemen who constitute the Opposition. They are, in many respects, just in their proper places. If we retain them in opposition, we shall probably have a far closer and keener criticism of the actions of the Government than if we allow them to succeed in the strong efforts they are now making. They have many excellent qualities. They seem to possess a quality which we always admire—to go straight. We have been given an opportunity of judging how straight they can go by the straight course they have taken for the Treasury benches. Probably, in all other actions they may take, they will be equally actuated by a desire to go straight. No doubt they are justified in taking a straight rather than a devious course in order to acquire what they have evidently set their minds upon. It must be the effort of members on this side of the House to keep them from altogether succeeding. We should remember the historical donkey-boy, who had an animal which worked faithfully so long as he was prudent enough to keep a carrot dangling before its nose, just out of reach of its mouth. But, in a moment of weakness which did much more credit to his heart than his head, he allowed the donkey to get a nibble at the carrot. At once the carrot was gone, and the donkey was demoralized. The “fierce light which beats upon the Throne,” according to the poet, is much like that which a well-organized Opposition directs on the actions of a Ministry. The illumination is always intense; it is always capable of picking out any little spots. We have seen here that it has discovered some spots—probably a little shady in themselves, but which have been blackened by the Opposition. However objectionable any Government may be, it should not be displaced unless it is proposed to place in its stead men who have the confidence of the country, and who are more likely to introduce and give effect to measures which have the approval of the country. The result of an appeal to the country has shown that the present Government has its confidence, because more Opposition members of the last Parliament than the fourteen who constituted the majority that succeeded in carrying an adverse vote have offered themselves to their constituencies for re-election and have been rejected. A great many well-known gentlemen who have achieved a political reputation, who have been for many years in this House, have failed to be returned to this Parliament. When we remember that during the last session, on a question similar to the one we are now considering, a majority of fourteen voted with the Opposition, and when we consider that, in the Parliament as it is now constituted, not only is there no majority with the Opposition, but that probably there will be a majority for the Government, we must accept such undoubted proof that the feeling of the country is entirely with the present Government. I have to-day looked over the division list on the no-confidence motion of last session, as recorded in Hansard, and, with the permission of the House, I should like to have an opportunity, although I may probably infringe the rules of debate, to point out the results that list clearly shows when analyzed. I will take, first, the list of those who voted with the "Ayes" against the Government on exactly the same issue as that now before the House. This shows the Government to have gained an extraordinary victory, when you consider that the well-known character and public services of each of those men gave them an immense advantage over any one new to political life who sought to oppose them. Amongst those members who voted against the Government we find Mr. Baigent. Well, he seems to have retired from political life, and another gentleman has been elected in his stead who is going to support the Government. I do not know that Mr. Baigent had entirely forfeited the confidence of his constituents; but, had he stood for election again, it is not at all likely that he would have been returned. Then, we find Mr. Barff in the same position. He was claimed by the Opposition, and his rejection is a victory to the Government. Mr. Curtis was in the Opposition, and he was not returned. Mr. Cutten is also in the same category. Sir Robert Douglas was also claimed by the Opposition. Mr. Fitzroy retired, and did not attempt to offer himself for re-election. Mr. Green was defeated by a gentleman who now graces the Treasury benches. Mr. Hobbs was beaten by Mr. Harris. Mr. Hart was beaten by Mr. Wright, who no doubt acquired a very great deal of prestige from the fact that he declared himself to be an independent Liberal. Well, Dr. Henry, no doubt, would be claimed as an Opposition member. Mr. Hunter was not returned again. The defeat of Mr. Macfarlane is no doubt a victory for our side. Mr. Moorhouse apparently had no chance for Christchurch, and, thinking discretion the better part of valour, he left the field to his opponents and went to the Ashley District. That gentleman's name is a household word in Canterbury, and it would be a pity if any constituency there refused to return him. Captain Morris was defeated, also Mr. Murray-Aynsley; and Mr. Richardson failed to be returned again. Mr. Rowe had no support, when proposing to stand, sufficient to justify him in entering upon a contest, and he also retired. Mr. Tawiti, Mr. Whitaker, and Mr. Williams were not again elected. Mr. Woolcock had no qualification. I cannot tell whether he would have been re-elected by the same constituency, but probably it was a lucky thing for him that he had no qualification. Mr. Fox was defeated, and his defeat is, undoubtedly, a victory for the Government. This exhausts the names of those members who sat in the last Parliament, and who voted in favour of the no-confidence motion. Now, I will take the other side—those members who voted with the Government on that occasion and who do not now hold seats in this House. Mr. Barton did not offer himself for re-election. He probably would have been elected had he done so. Mr. Carrington was opposed by Colonel Trimble, who is also an independent Liberal.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. BARRON.—Well, Mr. Carrington, I

should have said, did not offer himself for re-election. Mr. Feldwick was beaten by Mr. Bain, and his defeat is undoubtedly a victory for the Opposition. We will allow the Opposition to claim that victory, as Mr. Feldwick was beaten by five or six votes only. Mr. Manders was opposed and fairly beaten by a gentleman who, I am happy to say, has taken the proper side in politics, and who will vote with the Government. Mr. Nahe did not offer himself for re-election. Mr. Rees was disqualified, owing to an alleged informal registration paper; but I have no doubt he would otherwise have been again returned to this House. Mr. Seaton, owing to ill-health, did not seek again to be returned to Parliament. The result of the election for that seat may be claimed as a victory for the Government, as Mr. Cutten, one of the Opposition candidates, was defeated by myself. The electors of the Taieri District returned Mr. Fulton—a gentleman who is very much liked, and who is so greatly respected that there is not the slightest doubt he would have been returned by the Taieri people, no matter what side in politics he represented. They desired to be represented by a local man, and he is a local man in every respect. They had not many eligible local men in the district, and they found one in Mr. Fulton. Therefore I do not give him as a victory to the Opposition, although he will no doubt vote with them. Mr. Goldie did not offer himself for re-election. Dr. Hodgkinson was beaten by Mr. McCaughan. He was beaten by that gentleman, because Mr. McCaughan took up the other political side. Mr. McCaughan contested the election, not as an independent Liberal, but as a supporter of the present Government. There is no doubt that Dr. Hodgkinson was beaten by one who ostensibly led his constituents to suppose that he would vote with the Government. How he will vote is left to be settled between his own conscience and his constituents. Mr. Jackson was beaten by Mr. Mason, and Mr. Joyce by Mr. Henry Hirst. Mr. Masters was also returned by his constituents on the clear understanding that he would support the present Government. I think honorable members on both sides of the House will agree with me that the Government have gained an immense victory, when we consider the state of parties before the Government appealed to the country, and the state of parties on both sides of the House now. I do not know that it is necessary for me to say very much more about the state of parties in the House, but I should like to have the opportunity of saying a word or two about the opinion of the country, and about those gentlemen who wish to carry the measures which the Government claim the credit of putting before the country. The principal measures embodied in the policy of the Government, as stated in the Governor's Speech, have undoubtedly been approved by the country. The recent elections have given an emphatic declaration on that point. We must admit that the party who have initiated these measures are much more likely to bring them fairly before the House and pass them into law than are the members of the Opposition. It is not necessary to refer to the text-book of the Opposition members—the Biglow Papers—to prove this. I will refer briefly to some remarks which were made by the honorable member the leader of the Opposition when he stated that he did not believe much in triennial Parliaments. He said that the present duration of Parliament was long enough and short enough. The honorable gentleman said he was perfectly willing to make a compromise—that he was quite prepared to consent to Parliaments having four years' duration as a substitute for triennial Parliaments. I understood that that was what the honorable gentleman stated. However, it may be of little consequence. The members of the Opposition can scarcely be considered as being exactly in earnest when they propose to carry the measures which have been brought down by the Government. Their whole political experience and our personal knowledge of their character convince almost every member of this House that the carrying of these measures must put a strain upon the consciences of those honorable gentlemen which they are scarcely able to bear. I have always admired very much the elasticity of that wonderful appliance—the human conscience; but a little experience of parliamentary life has convinced me that it is capable of bearing a far greater strain than ever I thought it was capable of bearing; and it may enable those honorable gentlemen to secure seats on the Treasury benches under the promise that they will carry those measures into law. But, so surely as those gentlemen get on those benches, so surely shall we find that for some reason or other they have had to change entirely the whole policy now before the country, and will not pass those measures on which the Government have obtained the approval of the country. If we were to throw down the challenge to both the Government and the Opposition to at once pass these measures—to affirm the principle of triennial Parliaments, to readjust the boundaries of electoral districts, to place the franchise on the basis it is proposed by the present Government to place it—and then go to the country, there is not the slightest doubt what the verdict of the country would be. Give us an extension of the franchise as proposed by the Government, and give us a greater number of polling-places, so that the polling will not fall comparatively into the hands of the wealthy classes, as now. The polling-hours are not such as to meet the case of workmen who are not independent in circumstances. These men are practically shut out from recording their votes. No conveniences sufficient are afforded them for that purpose. If you will extend those hours to ten at night, and open the booths early in the morning—say at seven o'clock—and if you make the polling-booths more numerous, you will meet the requirements of the working-men. Make every schoolhouse a polling-booth: schoolhouses are generally in the centres of population, and would therefore be most convenient places. Do all these things, and then, if both sides agree to go to the country, we shall have a Parliament sent up here which will give no uncertain sound as to which side it supports. There will then be no necessity for shepherding one vote. But until both sides make up their minds to do that, we must be met with difficulties almost every day in this House. Parties are too evenly balanced, and they do not now represent the opinion of the country. I hope both sides of the House will see it to be their duty at once to agree to pass these measures, then go to the country, and afterwards come back prepared to do the work of the country in an efficient and straightforward manner.

Mr. MASTERS.—Mr. Speaker, I did not rise for the purpose of making a speech at the present time, but simply to deny the assertions made by the honorable member who has just sat down. He states that I was distinctly returned by my constituents upon the understanding that I was to support the Grey Ministry. To this statement I give the most positive denial. As all sorts of rumours have been going about lately, I will read to the House what I am reported to have said in my address:—

“To the electors of Grey Valley.—Gentlemen, —As I am afraid it will be impossible for me to visit all the centres of population in this electorate, I take this means of communicating my views. I shall support the Grey Ministry so long as I have reason to think it is their intention to honestly carry out the principal public works promised by them, and absolutely necessary for the prosperity and actual vitality of the Grey Valley.”

This is correct. This is a portion of a printed address which I published in the early part of my canvass. I had a very large district, containing about twenty polling-places, and I was very much afraid that I should not be able to address all those centres of population. That was the reason why this address was published. Being called upon so suddenly, I am not prepared to refer to other papers containing reports, but I know generally what they say. I addressed all the principal centres of population in my electorate, and nearly all the smaller ones. The constituents of those districts whom I did not address know me perfectly well, and have sufficient confidence in me to trust me to represent them. In all those centres where I addressed the electors, I stated my sentiments in as clear and honest a manner as any candidate could do. I gave no uncertain sound. I did not lead my constituents to believe that I was a supporter of the Grey Ministry, but I honestly admit that I did lean that way to a certain extent. I commenced every address in this way: “I come before you as an independent candidate. By this I mean I decline to go into the House pledged to support any man or body of men.” I said, “This is one of the largest constituencies in New Zealand, and it would be beneath the dignity of any such constituency to return men pledged to any particular man or body of men.” I said, “If I am returned I go up to the House as your representative, and shall consider that I go with the full confidence of my constituents, and that the people who send me there have sufficient confidence in me to leave to my judgment and discretion all matters of interest likely to come before the House for consideration.” Those were the statements made by me. I said, to have an opportunity, although I may probably infringe the rules of debate, to point out the results that list clearly shows when analyzed. I will take, first, the list of those who voted with the "Ayes" against the Government on exactly the same issue as that now before the House. This shows the Government to have gained an extraordinary victory, when you consider that the well-known character and public services of each of those men gave them an immense advantage over any one new to political life who sought to oppose them. Amongst those members who voted against the Government we find Mr. Baigent. Well, he seems to have retired from political life, and another gentleman has been elected in his stead who is going to support the Government. I do not know that Mr. Baigent had entirely forfeited the confidence of his constituents; but, had he stood for election again, it is not at all likely that he would have been returned. Then, we find Mr. Barff in the same position. He was claimed by the Opposition, and his rejection is a victory to the Government. Mr. Curtis was in the Opposition, and he was not returned. Mr. Cutten is also in the same category. Sir Robert Douglas was also claimed by the Opposition. Mr. Fitzroy retired, and did not attempt to offer himself for re-election. Mr. Green was defeated by a gentleman who now graces the Treasury benches. Mr. Hobbs was beaten by Mr. Harris. Mr. Hart was beaten by Mr. Wright, who no doubt acquired a very great deal of prestige from the fact that he declared himself to be an independent Liberal. Well, Dr. Henry, no doubt, would be claimed as an Opposition member. Mr. Hunter was not returned again. The defeat of Mr. Macfarlane is no doubt a victory for our side. Mr. Moorhouse apparently had no chance for Christchurch, and, thinking discretion the better part of valour, he left the field to his opponents and went to the Ashley District. That gentleman's name is a household word in Canterbury, and it would be a pity if any constituency there refused to return him. Captain Morris was defeated, also Mr. Murray-Aynsley; and Mr. Richardson failed to be returned again. Mr. Rowe had no support, when proposing to stand, sufficient to justify him in entering upon a contest, and he also retired. Mr. Tawiti, Mr. Whitaker, and Mr. Williams were not again elected. Mr. Woolcock had no qualification. I cannot tell whether he would have been re-elected by the same constituency, but probably it was a lucky thing for him that he had no qualification. Mr. Fox was defeated, and his defeat is, undoubtedly, a victory for the Government. This exhausts the names of those members who sat in the last Parliament, and who voted in favour of the no-confidence motion. Now, I will take the other side—those members who voted with the Government on that occasion and who do not now hold seats in this House. Mr. Barton did not offer himself for re-election. He probably would have been elected had he done so. Mr. Carrington was opposed by Colonel Trimble, who is also an independent Liberal.

Mr. BARRON.—Well, Mr. Carrington, I

should have said, did not offer himself for re-election. Mr. Feldwick was beaten by Mr. Bain, and his defeat is undoubtedly a victory for the Opposition. We will allow the Opposition to claim that victory, as Mr. Feldwick was beaten by five or six votes only. Mr. Manders was opposed and fairly beaten by a gentleman who, I am happy to say, has taken the proper side in politics, and who will vote with the Government. Mr. Nahe did not offer himself for re-election. Mr. Rees was disqualified, owing to an alleged informal registration paper; but I have no doubt he would otherwise have been again returned to this House. Mr. Seaton, owing to ill-health, did not seek again to be returned to Parliament. The result of the election for that seat may be claimed as a victory for the Government, as Mr. Cutten, one of the Opposition candidates, was defeated by myself. The electors of the Taieri District returned Mr. Fulton—a gentleman who is very much liked, and who is so greatly respected that there is not the slightest doubt he would have been returned by the Taieri people, no matter what side in politics he represented. They desired to be represented by a local man, and he is a local man in every respect. They had not many eligible local men in the district, and they found one in Mr. Fulton. Therefore I do not give him as a victory to the Opposition, although he will no doubt vote with them. Mr. Goldie did not offer himself for re-election. Dr. Hodgkinson was beaten by Mr. McCaughan. He was beaten by that gentleman, because Mr. McCaughan took up the other political side. Mr. McCaughan contested the election, not as an independent Liberal, but as a supporter of the present Government. There is no doubt that Dr. Hodgkinson was beaten by one who ostensibly led his constituents to suppose that he would vote with the Government. How he will vote is left to be settled between his own conscience and his constituents. Mr. Jackson was beaten by Mr. Mason, and Mr. Joyce by Mr. Henry Hirst. Mr. Masters was also returned by his constituents on the clear understanding that he would support the present Government. I think honorable members on both sides of the House will agree with me that the Government have gained an immense victory, when we consider the state of parties before the Government appealed to the country, and the state of parties on both sides of the House now. I do not know that it is necessary for me to say very much more about the state of parties in the House, but I have the opportunity of saying about the opinion of the country gentlemen who wish to see the Government claim the country. They are in the policy of the Government proved to have given much more than moreover, that with one or two exceptions I never had even seen the members of the Government; that I had taken infinite pains in reading all the speeches in Hansard during the want-of-confidence motion of last session, and that I was unable to give a decided opinion on the subject. I stated then that upon my arrival in Wellington I should be able to form a decided opinion, and in a very short time be able to judge for myself. I told them that, when I saw the parties on both sides, I should be able to decide in my own mind. Since I have come to Wellington I have so decided. I have weighed all matters in connection with this subject, and I have come to this conclusion: that, whilst I cannot conscientiously place confidence in the present Ministry, I can see in the ranks of the Opposition men in whom I could entirely trust the present and the future of this colony. So far as the matter stands between me and my constituents I have only this to say, that that is purely a matter which I have to explain to them, and the responsibility of it rests on my own shoulders.

DEFICIENCY BILLS.

Sir G. GREY moved, That the Standing Order which provides that "the House will, in future, appoint the Committee of Supply and Ways and Means at the commencement of every session, so soon as an Address has been agreed to in answer to the Governor's Speech," be suspended to enable the House to go into Committee of Supply for the purpose of agreeing to a resolution authorizing the Government to borrow a sum of £180,000 from the Bank of New South Wales on deficiency bills. He explained to the House that the necessity had arisen from this circumstance: An Order in Council was issued by the Governor before the House met, which enabled the Government to raise money on deficiency bills to the extent of £400,000; but by the terms of the Order in Council the Government was only authorized to raise this money from the Bank of New Zealand, and it seemed that, although authority was given to raise the money, that authority did not empower the Government to go to any other bank except the Bank of New Zealand. At any rate, the question had been raised whether they had power to do so by the Order in Council, and it was thought that it would be better to get power to raise the sum now required—£180,000—from another bank. It was provided by law that, if the House was sitting, a resolution must be passed by the House authorizing the Government to raise money in the manner he had spoken of on deficiency bills. The Government having entered into an agreement, the purport of which he had stated to the House, he now asked the House to allow the Committee of Supply to be set up at once, for the purpose of passing the resolution of which he had spoken.

Motion agreed to.

IN COMMITTEE.

Sir G. GREY moved the following resolution:—That, in accordance with the provisions of section 18 of "The Public Revenues Act, 1878," the Treasury is hereby authorized to borrow upon deficiency bills from any bank or other person a sum not exceeding £181,800, to be applied towards the redemption of other deficiency bills issued under section 14 of said Act, by virtue of certain Orders in Council dated the 15th and 17th days of April last.

Mr. HALL said that the Prime Minister had explained to him the circumstances of the case; and as it was necessary to pass the resolution, the money having already been raised from the Bank of New South Wales; and as the Order in Council had to be supplemented by a resolution of the House; and as the resolution would not involve the borrowing or spending of any further money; and, furthermore, as the Premier had explained that it was desired to send the resolution by the steamer going to Sydney next day, he thought it was his duty to support the resolution.

Major ATKINSON inquired how much money had been borrowed on deficiency bills.

Sir G. GREY explained that the amount included in the resolution was to replace deficiency bills to the extent of £180,000, which were to repay moneys borrowed from the Public Works Fund. This would make out the total amount of deficiency bills—£400,000.

Mr. DRIVER would ask the honorable gentleman the conditions on which this money had been borrowed from the Bank of New South Wales, and why it had not been borrowed from the bank with which the colony did its business. It occurred to him, hearing that the Bank of New Zealand had given notice to terminate its arrangement with the Government, that possibly that was the reason why the money was not borrowed from that bank.

Mr. McLEAN would also like to know whether the borrowing of this money from the Bank of New South Wales had anything to do with the notice given by the Bank of New Zealand to terminate its agreement at the present crisis, and whether the money was to be borrowed to pay an advance made by that bank which it declined to renew. It might be as well, also, if the honorable member would give some insight into the reasons which had induced the Bank of New Zealand to give notice of the termination of its agreement. He was not aware that the Government was obliged to take money on deficiency bills from any particular bank. He imagined that they had sufficient power to go to any bank they chose.

Sir G. GREY might say that he had no knowledge whatever of the reasons which had induced the Bank of New Zealand to give notice of its desire to terminate its arrangement with the Government. The termination of that arrangement had nothing whatever to do with the present transaction. He believed that notice of the termination of the agreement was given subsequently to this transaction being entered into—in fact, it was either on the same day or the day before—so that there was no relation whatever between the two matters. The Government thought it advisable to borrow from the Bank of New South Wales because that bank had made a general offer of assistance to them.

Other circumstances also led the Government to the conclusion to make an arrangement with the Bank of New South Wales by which money could be at once obtained. The terms on which the money was raised were 6 per cent., and $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. commission.

Mr. SHRIMSKI would like to know whether this was the first time of borrowing money from the Bank of New South Wales, that so much fuss was made about it. He believed the honorable member for Waikouaiti himself went over to Sydney on one occasion to borrow money from that bank for the Government, and no fuss was made about that.

Mr. McLEAN was making no fuss about the present transaction. He had merely stated that he believed the Government had as good a right to borrow from any other bank as from the Bank of New Zealand. He had borrowed money from this bank in Sydney for the Government, and was sure that it was a better transaction than this appeared to be. Although he belonged to what might be called an opposition bank to the Bank of New Zealand, he did not desire that at any time, and especially at a time of crisis like the present, any bank should suffer at the hands of the Government; and he considered that the bank which did the business of the colony had suffered at the hands of the present Government. In such a crisis as the present the Government ought to be acting with the greatest care, and endeavour to ease their bankers instead of borrowing, as they were doing, to the full extent of their power. As he did not wish to delay the no-confidence debate, he would refrain from making any further remarks, but would take an opportunity, when an Imprest Supply Bill was introduced, to inquire further into the circumstances of the termination of the agreement with the Bank of New Zealand.

Mr. JOHNSTON would like to have some explanation as to the authority under which the Government borrowed £180,000 from the Public Works Fund. The Public Revenues Act gave the Government authority to do so by Order in Council during the recess, but if Parliament was in session they must obtain authority by resolution of Committee of Supply. On the 16th of July last he asked the Treasurer whether any deficiency bills had been issued during the past financial year, and, if so, to what amount. To that question the Premier replied, "Deficiency bills were issued during the past financial year to the amount of £184,000, but they were redeemed within the year." They came then to the sitting of Parliament with no deficiency bills outstanding, and with no power existing for the Government to take any money whatever from the Public Works Fund. He could not find at the moment that the Committee of Supply gave the Government any such authority. Perhaps the Treasurer would be good enough to state on what date he obtained authority to take this money.

Sir G. GREY had stated to the House the date of the Order in Council, and it had been held that, the Order in Council having been issued authorizing the issue of deficiency bills to a certain amount, that Order in Council prevailed and continued, although Parliament was sitting. If an Order in Council were issued in the recess for a greater amount of deficiency bills than were disposed of during the recess, that Order in Council could be acted upon when Parliament was sitting, or subsequently to its being in session.

Mr. J. C. BROWN would like to ask the Premier whether there was any truth in the report that the Bank of New Zealand held something like £750,000 of trust moneys, and that they were not in a position to give the colony accommodation to the extent of £400,000.

Sir G. GREY could not tell the precise amount of securities held by the Bank of New Zealand. It was a considerable sum; but he could not, without inquiry, tell what it was, because all sorts of funds were mixed up together. But the Bank of New Zealand had not refused the accommodation referred to. There was no application made to the bank. In point of fact, he thought himself at the time, and still thought, that in not requesting the bank to do this the Government was relieving the bank from pressure.

Resolution agreed to, and reported to the House.

On the question, That it be read a second time, Major ATKINSON said he wished to guard himself from expressing approval of this transaction. He could not quite understand it, and did not wish to detain the House just then by referring to it. All he wished to do was to guard himself, so that he might be at liberty on any future occasion to make any comments he might think necessary. He simply agreed to it because he understood that the Government considered it necessary in the interests and for the credit of the colony.

Resolution read a second time, and agreed to.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Debate resumed.

Mr. SEDDON.—Mr. Speaker, I rise, for the first time, to say a few words on a question which has not only engrossed the attention of this colony, but also received serious consideration at the hands of our sister colonies. I must first say, however, that my thanks are due to the House for the courtesy shown me this afternoon by the adjournment of the debate. I rose on that occasion without premeditation, and in consequence of the action of the honorable member for Grey Valley Mr. Masters. I may say that, when asked last night to speak on this question, I absolutely declined, considering, as I did, that there were grave and experienced men here who knew more than I could pretend to know upon the subject under discussion, and being aware that it was the duty of the young members to act the part of jurymen, and to decide on the arguments used by those who were here before them, and also upon what had been said to the constituents during the late elections. Such being the case, I trust that, though I may differ from the experienced politicians in this House upon the great principles that have been engrossing the attention of the country, yet they will bear with me in the remarks I am about to make. I will not, like the honorable member for Auckland City East, say that I dare them afterwards to attack my remarks, for I feel that, owing to my inexperience, those remarks will be open to be assailed. But, Sir, with the experience I have had and the knowledge I have gleaned while serving in the position of a representative on local bodies, I shall try to convince some of those members who are on the Opposition benches that in the course they are adopting on the present occasion they are not doing that which is right and good, and that which will be beneficial to the colony at large. I stand in the responsible position of being a representative of a class of men who are the first in this colony to whom has been granted the right of manhood suffrage. That responsibility alone ought to have great weight with me in what I have to say, because it is an experiment that has been tried since the year 1865. I allude to the Miners Representation Act, which was passed in that year. That measure gave manhood suffrage to the miners of the colony, and being, as I am, purely a miners' representative, I say that I am responsible to the constituency I represent, which is a very important one. Knowing this—knowing the responsibility that rests upon my shoulders, and knowing also that every member of this House should weigh all he has to say in the same scale in which I shall weigh what I have to say, and remember that he is the elected of the people at a very important time—at a time so important that I think never in the history of the Colony of New Zealand have measures so large been submitted to the people—I say, Sir, that, knowing as I do that the four members from Hokitika and Greymouth represent constituencies comprising 16,000 souls, and that I myself am responsible to 3,500 souls, I feel that we should weigh well with those members in this House whose responsibilities are very small indeed, though their parliamentary experience may be very great. Now, Sir, what is the position of affairs? When the motion was brought forward last session condemning the Government for maladministration, it was alleged, and endeavoured to be proved, that they had mismanaged the affairs of the colony. An appeal was made to the country; and what has been the response? How is it you see so many new members sitting on these benches? Simply because the voice of the people is with the Ministry. It is said that the only questions submitted to the country were those of manhood suffrage, triennial Parliaments, a redistribution of seats, and those other measures that were introduced by the Government; but I say more than that was submitted to the people. It was a question as to whether, those principles having been enunciated by the present Government, they were the fit and proper persons to be entrusted with the carrying of them out. What has been the verdict in the large centres of population? In Christchurch we find Sir George Grey and Mr. Andrews returned. At Greymouth there were also two members returned as pronounced Greyites. At Hokitika we find the same result. We go to Auckland—another large centre of population—and we find that the people there have also elected Greyites. The only centre of population which has declared against the Grey Ministry is Dunedin; and the people there have declared against more than that. I remember the days well when the Victorian miners came there and landed in numbers—men who were prepared to “do or dee,” as the saying is—men who were prepared to come there and develop their country for them, and make it such a country as it had never been before. These men were told by the Old Identities, “Gang awa’ out of this, with your clout-houses; we dinna want you here—we dinna want you here.” I say that if you take the aggregate number of votes that were recorded for those candidates who declared themselves Greyites, and the aggregate number of votes polled for those who stood forward in opposition, you will find that we have polled throughout the length and breadth of New Zealand three votes to one. That will be proved when the returns are laid on the table showing the names of the various candidates and the number of votes polled for each. Take the Grey Valley, or the district I have the honor to represent, take the West Coast generally—and what has been the verdict of the electors? It has been this: 5,600 votes were recorded in favour of those candidates who declared for Sir George Grey, and 600 in favour of the gentlemen who had the audacity to stand as oppositionists against those candidates. That is a very significant fact, as showing what the result would be if the principle of manhood suffrage existed, because it is in the mining district principally that the manhood-suffrage vote would be exercised. Now, I will ask whether, when the last vote of want of confidence was passed in this House, any of the charges made were proved. Let any member read through the answers made to the charges. The arguments were scarcely worth listening to, and you will find that nothing of a serious nature whatever was proved. When I heard the leader of the Opposition deliver his speech the other night, I was astonished at the frivolous nature of the charges; for frivolous they were when placed in contrast with the great principles that have been submitted to the country. In saying that, I feel bound to remark that the West Coast is in a peculiar position at the present moment. The people of Canterbury are our neighbours—they have been connected with the West Coast since the first introduction of population into that part of the country; and the name of the leader of the Opposition is a name which is highly respected there. He is looked upon there as an able, honest man, and a conscientious politician; and his action on the present occasion has placed us in the peculiar position of which I have spoken. What is the past history of the West Coast? It is this: Up to the present time we have not received our rights. The representatives of Otago and Canterbury have deprived us of our privileges, and we, together with the people in the extreme North and in the extreme South shall have to band together to insist upon obtaining the rights to which we are entitled; although it must be borne in mind that we contribute more to the revenue than either Canterbury or Otago. I speak with diffidence, because it has been said of the West Coast members that they are accustomed to stand up and make long speeches with very little in them; and, knowing that, I wish to be very guarded in what I say. Still, I feel bound to bring before you the grievances of the people of the West Coast, and strike home to those persons who are best entitled to bear the blame of our past injustice and neglect. When the West Coast Gold Fields broke out the people of Canterbury treated us shamefully. They treated us as the people of Dunedin treated the Victorian diggers who went there on the breaking-out of the Otago Gold Fields. And who was our champion then? Mr. Hall. He incurred a good deal of odium for what he did in our behalf. The people of Canterbury said he was doing too much for the West Coast. He insisted upon opening up communication between the two places, just as Mr. Moorhouse insisted on opening up that communication between Christchurch and Lyttelton, which so much benefitted the City of the Plains. Well, Sir, the West Coast was first populated and fostered by the honorable member who now leads the Opposition; and Canterbury as usual reaped the benefit. As we progressed we found that we had amongst us a few disappointed lawyers, political carpet-baggers, and printers who had no real interest in the place, and who desired separation. These people got up a petition and presented it to this House. Well, Sir, Westland had to be experimented upon. It was not right to give us a province such as existed throughout the length and breadth of the land. We were regarded as outcasts who must be experimented upon, and we were experimented upon by being created the first County Council in New Zealand. What was the effect? As a certain amount of territory had been taken from Canterbury—a territory composed principally of mountain gorges and pine-trees, with gold and other minerals hidden in the earth—it was decided that an adjustment should take place; and an experienced person was sent over to value the estate. And how did he do it? The award was made out on the basis of population. Now, let any man seriously think of the idea of fixing an award on the basis of population on a gold field, where two or three shafts may be sunk to-day, the field proves a “duffer,” and the men go away. That was the case with Westland. The people went away, and it was a long time before we could get them back. But the award was made, and the country was so completely impoverished that we had no money to make roads, bridges, or anything else. It was as much as we could do to get tracks to go through the country. We had had an adjustment: did we get a readjustment? We applied for it; but no, there was no readjustment for us. Canterbury, Shylock-like, would have its pound of flesh. Those who were in power—a number of them are in the House now—refused it. But what did they do? They gave us a province. After the experiment was proved a failure we got a province and the privileges of the provincial system. But I think it is only right to say that at the time this agitation took place for separation a petition was presented to this House against it. That petition was sent by persons in the Westland District who resided on the Teremakau, in the Grey River District, and on the Nelson South-West Gold Field. They protested; and how was their petition treated? Perhaps it will be as well if I read from Hansard of 1867 to show how it was received:—

“That the petition received from certain inhabitants in the District of Westland be ordered to be printed, and be referred to a Select Committee to report thereon, with power to call for persons and papers; to report in a fortnight. Committee to consist of Major Atkinson, Mr. Burns, Mr. Moorhouse, Mr. Reid, and Mr. Curtis.”

I find that Mr. Stafford moved that the petition be discharged, and consequently it was discharged. And the members of this House who voted for its discharge, who denied us this modicum of justice, ask us now to allow them to sit on those benches, and do for us what they have done before—that is, refuse to give us justice. I find that on this question the honorable member who now leads the Opposition and the present member for Ashley, Mr. Moorhouse, differed. Mr. Moorhouse, in the course of a very forcible argument, which is recorded in Hansard, said that it was injudicious—that it was not a petition emanating from the diggers, but from disappointed lawyers, printers, and people who wanted situations under the new form of government. On this occasion Mr. Hall and Mr. Moorhouse came to very high words, and called each other madmen. Here is a short passage from the discussion that took place between them:—

“Mr. HALL.—If the honorable member chose to stigmatize the petition from 2,600 of his own constituents as a piece of madness, it ought to be known to his constituents, and he (Mr. Hall) would see that it was. It was not fair of the honorable gentleman to make such a use of his position in that House; he knew what the honorable member would have said if he had made such a remark.

“Mr. MOORHOUSE.—I believe the honorable member himself is quite susceptible of the madness I spoke of.

“Mr. HALL.—Did the honorable member attribute madness to him? If so, he would say one of the two might be mad, but he would leave it to the House to determine which of them it was.”

From that it appears that there is not much difference between the two. The honorable member for Cheviot has accused the Premier of imbecility; but, as Mr. Hall has accused Mr. Moorhouse of madness in times gone by, and Mr. Moorhouse returned the compliment, it is evident that this is not the first time these terms have been used, so that I hope the Premier will take little notice of the honorable member for Cheviot. But to proceed with this county question. We find that the same old member whom the honorable member for Ashley was unable to shake off still wished to grasp power, and insisted on inserting in the Act a nominee Chairman. We were to have the privileges of the county system, but we were not to have a Chairman elected by the people or by the Council. I will read the 14th section of the County of Westland Act, which is to this effect: "The said Council shall consist of seven members, whereof one, who shall be Chairman thereof, shall be appointed by the Governor in Council." But the best part of the matter, as regards the selection of the Chairman by the Governor, was this: Who was the nominee of the Governor? Mr. John Hall. There seemed, from the result, to have been a method in his madness. Why, Sir, they treated Westland as they wish to treat this House and the members of it who have been elected by the people. They said, "You are not the people to choose who are to sit on the Government benches. We are the persons to do that; and we will carry out the principles which, in 1867, were recorded on the Statute Book of the colony." I am not going to say that Mr. Hall did not make a good County Chairman. I only wish we had had as good a Chairman the whole time. I do not wish to reflect upon his administration: it was perhaps a judicious choice. The principle is the thing I differ from. I differed from it at that time, and I differ from it now. I do not believe in nominee-ship, as regards either local government or the government of the colony generally. The next point to which I wish to refer is this: After this award was made, and when the Bill was introduced to make Westland a province, the question of our financial affairs came up for settlement. Then, the members of this House who had been instrumental in running us into debt and placing us in this peculiar position, were the very persons who would not make us an exceptional case, and we still had to bear these burdens until the provincial system was swept away by the Abolition Act in 1876. I ask, Was there any improvement made then? I ask members on the Opposition benches whether, in passing the Act of 1876, they made any improvement on the previous system of government. They did nothing of the kind so far as Westland was concerned. They certainly took over the Canterbury debt and added it to the consolidated debt of the colony; they certainly relieved us to that extent, and we were thankful for it; but, notwithstanding that, they left us in the same position as all other gold fields. While large Government subsidies were given to counties in which there were large rateable properties, they gave nothing whatever to the gold-fields counties. They said, "We make an exception of you. We give you the gold duty, and we will not give you a subsidy from the consolidated revenue." What does the gold duty mean? It means additional taxation. It means that at the Port of Hokitika alone we have exported 2,000,000 ounces of gold, on which we have paid £200,000 as a special tax. When they gave us the gold duty why did they not take it as taxation, and give us a subsidy of pound for pound upon it, in the same way as they give subsidies according to taxation in those counties where there are large agricultural properties? But we got nothing of the kind. The subsidies were promised to last only five years. What does that bring us up to? The money was borrowed from the Home-country for the construction of these public works; and where was it spent? It was spent principally in Canterbury and Otago, and, having been spent there, the Government which constructed those works, and so increased the value of property there, was then forced for five years to pay from the consolidated revenue a subsidy upon the very improvements that made those properties valuable. We now find that the position of affairs is this: The local bodies in Canterbury and Otago possess large amounts to their credit; and in the North Island and in Westland—and in gold fields districts particularly—the local bodies are in debt, and are simply asking charity from the Government. Certain mites have been thrown to them from time to time, not only by the present Government, but by past Governments. That is bad legislation, and I say that those men on the Opposition benches are responsible for that bad legislation. Now, we were promised at that time that we were to have roads and bridges. It was said that the peculiar geographical position of Westland did not entitle it to railways, but we were to have a main trunk road from Nelson down to Jackson's Bay, and bridges across the rivers. What is the result? This took place in 1865, but until the latter part of 1877 the roads were not constructed, and neither were the bridges made. It is true that amounts were set down on the estimates by the Government which was turned out of office by the Grey Ministry; but no doubt they would have suffered the same fate as other amounts which were set down in previous years, but which were never expended. Under the present Ministry we got our bridges and roads. Those gentlemen who now occupy the Opposition benches, and who wish to get on the Government benches, are responsible for the loss of life which has occurred through the want of those works. There are orphans in Westland who are at the present time crying for bread, and there are widows crying for the men who used to win that bread, and who have lost their lives through the want of roads and bridges. There are sixty cases of that kind on record, besides many more that we know nothing about. I lay the responsibility of those deaths upon the men who would not give us railways, and who promised us roads and bridges which we never got. With regard to the accusations made against the Government by the honorable member for Selwyn, I ask, Was his charge proved with respect to the financial position of the colony? Did not the reply given by the Premier sufficiently set that at rest? The Premier was accused, first of all, of not having brought down a Financial Statement. Now, the position of affairs was this: There had been a verdict given by the House that the Government was guilty of maladministration, and after the judges had delivered sentence they actually asked that the Treasurer should come down and prove himself innocent. That argument reminds me of Kentucky law—Hang a man, and try him afterwards. I have no doubt that when we do get a Financial Statement from the present Government—as I trust we shall—it will be a satisfactory one not only to the House, but to the whole colony, and to the Home-country, where we borrow our money. The honorable member for Selwyn told us that the present Government had corrupted the Press. As far as I am individually concerned, there is no man in my locality who has been so much abused by the Press, but somehow I flourish under the abuse, simply because the people in our part of the colony look at both sides of the question, and have come to the conclusion that I have acted honestly as regards local affairs. As far as we possibly can we must always encourage and foster this institution. As an abler speaker than I am has said, "the Press is a grand institution—an institution that the people, not only of New Zealand, but of the whole world, have to thank for the liberties they enjoy." Such being the case, it does not speak well for the Opposition that because they wish to get into power they say the Press of New Zealand is corrupt. It goes further than that. Astute as the honorable gentleman who now leads the Opposition may be, who does not know what the effect of his words may be elsewhere? How are we judged abroad? Are we not judged by our Press? Do not our Parliamentary debates go abroad? I say that the statement that a Government which has been in power for two years has been retained there by a corrupt Press, must injure the credit of the colony. That being the case, any honorable gentleman wishing to hold the position of a Minister ought to be very careful as to the words he uses respecting the Press of the colony. I say that we have not got a corrupt Press in New Zealand. The next question to be answered is, What would you do with the Press? I know that in the local body in which I sit we called for tenders for advertising, and we found that it was not satisfactory. Some papers have a larger circulation than others; but papers conducted at a very low cost and having a very small circulation can successfully compete with better ones as regards the price to be charged for advertisements. It is, consequently, not always fair to give the work to the lowest tenderer. The honorable member for Auckland City East said that we should pay no newspaper for advertisements. I disagree altogether with that argument. We must, as business men, advertise for the benefit of our business. As members of the House we must advertise for the benefit of the colony. To say that you would pay no newspaper for advertisements would mean that the papers could not afford to go on, and we should therefore have no publicity. What I would say is, that encouragement ought to be given to the whole of the papers, and I would leave it to the men who sit on the Government benches to say what should be given to the whole of the papers for the advertisements. If that were done we should find that the papers would be able to be independent, and we should not have the bickering which goes on at present. We should find then that the Press would ably assist those in the position of legislators, and would, as it sometimes does now, perhaps take the weak side of an argument and make the most of it. We should place the Press in an independent position, and one honorable to those gentlemen who have so far ably conducted the Fourth Estate in the Colony of New Zealand. I now come to the question of lunatic asylums. The honorable member for Selwyn made a very serious charge against the Government in connection with this question, and I must say that until I heard the explanation afterwards given there seemed to me to be something in it; but when I came to reason the matter over I said to myself that surely the honorable member for Christchurch City (Mr. Stevens), the honorable member for Selwyn, and other Canterbury members, were to blame for having tolerated such a state of things. If such a state of affairs existed with regard to the West Coast, I am sure that the members from that district would continue to make long speeches until justice was done. Another attack was made by the honorable member for Selwyn against the Hon. the Minister of Mines, and I must certainly say that at the time I felt pained by the remarks of the honorable member. They have been made jocularly, but they will appear in the historical records of the House; and I do not think I should be doing justice if I did not resent the insult cast on the miners of the Totara District. The honorable member for Selwyn said that, because certain favours were showered by the Government on that district, it would be more than a man's life was worth to go down to Ross to oppose the Minister of Mines. I was astonished at that remark, because no man knows the class of men there better than the honorable member for Selwyn. I say that if he went down there—I do not care what principles he propounded—the miners would have said, Give him fair-play. They would have listened to him, and, whether or not he succeeded in convincing them, there would be no lives lost. I am bound to say that there is no ground whatever for such an accusation. When the construction of the Mikonui Water-race was first brought forward the honorable member for Selwyn was a member of the Government. It was proposed to give the Messrs. Brogden twenty chains wide of land along the whole extent of the Mikonui Water-race, if they would undertake its construction. If those terms had been agreed to, that water-race would no doubt have been constructed; but what would have been the effect upon the people of the district? The miners would have been serfs under the Messrs. Brogden, and they would have been compelled to work at a certain price; or men would have been brought from the Old Country, and perhaps Chinese would have poured into the district. We refused to have the Mikonui Water-race constructed on those terms. There had been a constant agitation going on for the construction of this water-race. The late honorable member for Totara, Mr. Tribe, earnestly, persistently, and strenuously advocated the construction of this race. He was so far successful that the Government agreed to give £20,000 if certain local bodies would guarantee a certain amount towards its construction. Under a peculiarly-constructed Act there was no power given to the local bodies to give the guarantee required. In April last I was one of a deputation that waited upon the Minister for Public Works and asked him to give a certain sum of money to enable them to make a commencement, and he promised to comply with our request. I can say, from personal knowledge, that there was no foundation for the statement that the money was given as a sop at election-time to secure the return of the Hon. the Minister of Mines. It was nothing more than carrying out what was promised by the Minister for Public Works in April last. I think I have replied to the principal remarks of the honorable member for Selwyn; I will now refer to some of the statements made by the honorable member for Cheviot (Mr. Saunders). When I came into this Chamber I naturally expected that at all events no comparisons would be made between the old members and the new. When I found that the young members returned to this House—the young Greyites—were compared to greyhounds, then I thought, with Mrs. Malaprop, that “comparisons are odorous.” When I heard the honorable member speak, there was a certain doggedness in his style of speech that did not tend to raise him in my estimation. He seemed very bitter. He seemed to be a person whom the world had not treated well. It appeared as if his temper had been soured by something done to him which was not calculated to raise his fellow-men in his estimation. The honorable member will find, with regard to the young members, that, whether or not their colour be grey, or whatever it may be, there is a watchfulness about them. If the honorable gentleman had said we were watch-dogs, I do not think I should have found fault with him. He will find, no matter who sits on the Government benches, that the young members will watch carefully so as to secure that which is best and most conducive to the welfare of the colony. The honorable gentleman referred to the members on the Government side as greyhounds, and said they were “running cunningly.” Whatever their running may be, I hope it will be straight. What will be the effect if they run crookedly or cunningly? They will find themselves in the same position as the honorable member referred to—Mr. Hobbs. I suppose it was a piece of cunning when that honorable member referred to the Native Minister in terms which I believe were not only condemned by this House, but by the whole country. For the good of the country at large, it was only right that that gentleman should be relegated to obscurity. Where are all the other members who ran cunningly? Why, they find themselves in the same position as Mr. Hobbs. Where is the honorable member for Hokitika, Mr. Barff, who, before he came into the House, pledged himself to give the Government a fair and impartial support? He is left out in the cold. If the honorable members who have now been returned are found running cunningly they will share the same fate as overtook Mr. Barff and Mr. Hobbs. The honorable member for Cheviot adopted the phrase used by Napoleon, that the young recruits were “food for cannon,” and said the young greyhounds were food for gammon. In the position he takes up at the present time there is too much Canterbury about it, and too much cant. The position in which we are placed is this: Are we to allow Canterbury and Otago to rule the country for their benefit? It is the money they are grasping after. That being the case, can we place on those benches the honorable member for Geraldine, who is an aspirant for office; the honorable member for Cheviot; the honorable member for Selwyn; or the honorable member for Ashley? There is another honorable member whose surname is the same as my Christian name. I refer to the honorable member Mr. Dick, who, no doubt, is an aspirant for a seat on the Treasury benches. There is another honorable member I wish to refer to, the honorable member for Riverton (Mr. McCaughan), who is one of those gentlemen who have been “gammoned.” There was one remark made by the honorable member for Cheviot which under the circumstances filled me with a feeling of regret. I have, at all times and under all circumstances, revered old age. When we were told by the honorable member for Cheviot that the Premier, on account of old age, was becoming imbecile, I felt deeply pained that such a remark should be made in this House. It was a remark which should not have been accepted in such a quiet way. I felt inclined to ask Mr. Speaker whether it was language that should be tolerated. The honorable gentleman who is now the leader of the Opposition is said to have been rejected in former days by his party on account of his youth, but before long he convinced those of old age and experience that he knew more of what was good for them than they did themselves. I listened attentively to the temperate remarks made by the honorable member for Selwyn, and was ready to be convinced by force of argument. I trust that every honorable member in this House will at all times be willing to be convinced by argument. I was prepared to listen to his arguments and to weigh them well in my mind; but I stand here as one who will not be bounced into anything. The honorable member for Cheviot tried to bounce the young recruits, or “greyhounds.” If he attempts to bounce me he will soon see that my motto will be “No surrender.” I will now make a few remarks on the questions alluded to in the Governor's Speech. I am entirely in accord with the Government as regards triennial Parliaments. The honorable member for Selwyn did not tell the House, to my satisfaction, that he would take up the measures introduced by the Government, nor did he give us in his speech any sketch whatever of the amendments that he would propose in them. It has always been my opinion that it was a good thing to let the representatives of the people meet their constituents as often as they possibly could. We should find that we should not have the same evils as we have had in the past. Measures would not be likely to pass that would have a detrimental effect for years to come. I also think that the same safeguard should be placed upon this House as is placed upon the local bodies, and that is, that they should not have the power to legislate on subjects affecting the finance of the colony for a longer period than their term of office. I believe that, upon questions of finance particularly, the House should not be able to commit the country for any longer term than their own term of office. Now, as regards the matter of the indebtedness of the colony, I will ask this question: How much has the indebtedness of the colony been increased since the gentlemen now occupying the Ministerial benches have been placed in office? Or was the indebtedness spoken of by the honorable member for Bruce this afternoon, or the principal portion of it, not incurred before those honorable gentlemen came into power? I say it was. We find that the first loan that was asked for by those honorable gentlemen was refused, and refused by the Opposition, to the disadvantage of the country at large. At that time we could have floated a loan on far better terms than we can get one floated to-day. Who is responsible for that? I say the members of the Opposition are responsible; and, knowing that to be the case, and knowing also that if the proposal of the Government had been accepted the colony would have been placed in a far better position financially than it is now in, I say that the members of the Opposition have no right to say that our financial position is due to the gentlemen who sit on the Government benches. I now come to the Native question. On that question I am, to a certain extent, as it were, inexperienced; but I am not inexperienced in one way, because during the time this question has engrossed the attention of the House—for the last four years—I have been a careful reader of Hansard; and I full well know, if the pages of Hansard are to be believed, and if the statements of honorable members in this House are to be believed, that our relations with the Natives have not been of a satisfactory kind. I do not say that they are satisfactory now; and I say this much, that it will take some time—some years—before we have a satisfactory position of affairs with regard to the Natives. That has been the case in older countries than this, where the work of dealing satisfactorily with aboriginal tribes has been one that has taken half a century or a century to accomplish. The same thing, I apprehend, will occur in New Zealand. But I will say this much as regards the charge made about the survey of the Waimate Plains—that that charge is one which is entirely without foundation. I will ask who first ordered that survey to take place. Was it the members of the Opposition who first mooted it, and who first confiscated the land? I say it was; and, such being the case, if the surveyors were upon the land, and if instructions were given to them to survey it, it did not follow, because, as has been said, they were putting the pegs in Titokowaru's hut, that the Government were going to sell the land. When surveyed, then the reserves could be defined, and such reserves given to the Natives as they were entitled to; and in this manner the promises given to them by previous Governments would have been kept. I say that the charge made against the Government with respect to the survey of the Waimate Plains is fallacious. I say it was not proved. We find, also, remarks made as regards the price at which this land was to be sold. We found that the honorable member who made the remarks about the price did not seem to understand much about it. He says the Government fixed the upset price at £5 an acre, and that any person buying it must know that there was a danger hanging over it. The upset price was fixed at £5 an acre as a safeguard against land-sharks, so that they should not take advantage of the people of the colony and get this land at £2 an acre. I fully understand why the upset price was fixed at £5 an acre, and, seeing that it was to be sold by public auction, and that the upset price was £5 an acre, I say nothing could be fairer than that. When I went round that country, having in view the taking-up of a block of land there, matters were in this condition: When I was going there, as I started from Wellington I found that there was great anxiety entertained as to the possibility of an outrage. When I went to Wanganui I found they were easier on that subject than in Wellington, and when I got to the spot itself the people were not speaking of it at all. But when I got to the land I found a gentleman representing a large firm in this town telling every one he came in contact with, "I am sure there will be a row; I am sure there will be bloodshed; no white man will be allowed to go on this land without a fight;" and yet, at the same time, he was there from a Wellington firm picking up the best blocks and marking them on a plan. Such being the case, I must say that when I came back I gave the people of the colony the benefit of the information I received. As to the occurrences which took place afterwards, the same thing has been and will continue to be so long as we are a colony, until we get roads and railways through the colony. It is those who have axes to grind in order to get this land that have been the cause of agitating and increasing the Native distrust, so that this land when sold might be sold to their benefit, and not to the benefit of the colony, or of the finances of the Government. There is another question—a question that was spoken of by the honorable member for Bruce. He spoke upon the question of the land and the land laws, and he accused the Government in the first instance of not asking the Governor, at the time these first land laws were passed, to use his veto; in a breath, shortly after that, he said that the honorable gentleman who holds the position of Premier had done wrong because he asked the Governor—what to do? To disallow a Bill that was passed which gave a longer tenure to the leaseholders of Canterbury. When we find an honorable member one moment arguing one thing, and the next moment contradicting it, that argument must fall to the ground. I will say this much: that the land laws up to the present time have not been made for the benefit of the colonists at large, but for the benefit of a favoured few; and the favoured few—men of means and money—have got hold of large blocks of land; and, if we do not step in to prevent it, the same thing will continue in the future, and in the end we shall be in the same position as those in older countries. I may say that when the honorable member for Grey and Bell was speaking on this question, and on other questions affecting the colony and the interests of the people, I listened to him with attention. I must certainly say that there was some forcible argument adduced by him; but there is this much that left a doubt on my mind: I have ascertained since that the honorable member has only been a short time in the colony. He is, therefore, in this position: that, while he can judge the present Government by its mistakes, he knows nothing whatever of the past records of the colony, or, if he did, he would not be sitting in his present position and holding his present opinions, if the principles he enunciated are well founded. He said he was a Liberal, and he gave a true definition of Liberalism. In the Old Country he would be called a Radical. The honorable member for Bruce attacked the issues that were brought forth by the Chartists of England. What do we find? That three points asked for by the Chartists in the Old Country have been granted. It has taken a number of years to bring it about; but what has brought it about? The moment the franchise was extended these points were gained, and the people now enjoy the privileges so conferred upon them. But we hear very little of the sufferings that occurred between the time when these things were first asked and the time when they were granted. I say, if the honorable gentleman (Colonel Trimble) had been in the colony for the last twenty-five years, and if he were also well acquainted with the past deeds of men, and the records generally, he would be sitting, like me, on this side of the House; he would be speaking for us, assisting us by his experience; he would not be a party to a wrong-doing—for a wrong-doing it is. Now, Sir, I come to the question that brought me to speak this evening. I come to the remarks made by the honorable member for Grey Valley (Mr. Masters). Well, I must certainly say that what I have got to remark on that point pains me deeply. If I were saying it to the honorable member for Riverton (Mr. McCaughan), I should have, perhaps, the same feeling of pain, though we are only slightly acquainted; but, long as is my acquaintance with the honorable member for Grey Valley, I must say that I feel pained on his taking up his present position. I feel also sorry that he should be a party to disfranchising one of the largest electorates in the colony; for we find that he intends to vote for the Opposition, his colleague will vote as he voted before, and, such being the case, the Grey Valley is disfranchised. If at the time when the contest was going on this had been publicly known, I ask, would the same result have happened? I certainly say, No. The people on the West Coast are not ungrateful, and I will prove it by the records of the ballot-box. Twelve hundred votes were polled for the honorable member (Mr. Masters), and the same number for his colleague. The people to a man went to support the present Ministry. I will refer to some remarks that were made by the honorable member, and I will ask the House to judge from that as to whether what I say is not a fact. [The honorable member quoted from addresses made by Mr. Masters to his constituents.] At many of the electorates Mr. Masters did not put in an appearance at all, and the electors at those places voted for him on the strength of the declarations he made in that published address I have quoted from. And, more than that, a gentleman who once held the position of member for the Grey Valley was canvassing for Mr. Masters in that part of the district which he could not visit, and when asked by some members, who knew that he, when in the House, had been in opposition, whether Mr. Masters would go into opposition, he replied he had nothing to do with Mr. Masters in that respect, because Mr. Masters was a supporter of the Grey Government. That is a positive fact; and I know that Mr. Masters, before he left our district, was very indignant because some of the papers had the audacity to put him down as "doubtful." Can Mr. Masters for a moment say that he has any reason for believing the Government will not carry on the works which he made a condition of his support? No. I know that he has had an intimation from the first that the West Coast will receive the same attention that it has received in the past from this Government. When the honorable member had that assurance he had cut from under his feet every argument that would have at all justified him in turning round upon the constituency, and depriving the Grey Valley of its voting power in this House. As I have said privately, I would do anything I could if the honorable gentleman would not turn traitor to his constituency. It is an absolute fact that, when information went down to the Grey Valley that Mr. Masters had changed sides, there was a general burst of indignation, and telegrams were at once sent to him advising him to prove true to the party by which he was elected. I do not wish to have the West Coast in the same position that it has occupied for years past. It seems to me that members sent up from the Coast have been working one against another—one has been for the Opposition, one for the Government, another independent; and the result has been that the Coast has had nothing done for it: and the Opposition would like to see us placed in that position again. It is very painful to me to rise here and say what I have said about my old friend Mr. Masters; and though when I once take up a position I will fight it out to the last, though I will never cry, Peccavi, though I will never ask for quarter for myself, yet for the sake of the Coast, and for the sake of Mr. Masters himself, I ask the Opposition to release that honorable gentleman from the bond they have extracted from him. There is much more weight attached to this matter than the members of the Opposition seem to think; and as they are—perhaps with a view of bringing in waverers—boasting of their large majority—a majority of six—they can well afford to allow my friend Mr. Masters to be an honest man. I have been in the peculiar position that honorable gentleman is in, and therefore can speak feelingly. As a member of the Provincial Council of Westland, I, at one time, not having received for my district those works to which we had a right, determined to go over to the Opposition, and vote against the party I had been allied with for two years. The pledge I gave was given in the heat of passion, at a moment when I was off my guard, and for three days and nights I was as miserable as I could possibly be. I feel satisfied that is the case with my honorable friend. He is not the Edward Masters that left Greymouth; and, such being the case, I ask the Opposition to do as I have requested, especially as it is a matter of such importance to the West Coast. It is said by members of the Opposition, "Oh! if we turn the Government out, Mr. Masters will get everything for his district." But what would be the good of one vote? Perhaps they have offered him a seat on the Government benches, knowing his business would not allow him to take it.

Mr. MASTERS.—No.

Mr. SEDDON.—I take his word for it. Such being the case, the position he will occupy will be this: We, as a party, are pledged to carry out liberal measures: we must keep together, and he, being but one, will not be worth winning; and therefore the West Coast will be neglected in the future as it has been in the past. There will be but one member on one side of the House as against six of us on the other side. I hope, therefore, the Opposition will be generous, and allow the honorable member not to record his vote at all. As there is a doubt upon a point of such importance, it would be far better that the honorable gentleman should do as did Mr. Goldie last session, who, as he was not in accord with the feelings of his constituents, and did not want to destroy his colleague's vote, abstained from voting, and allowed his colleague to record his vote as desired by the constituency. Grey Valley should have one vote on an important occasion like this; and therefore I say, Let the honorable member follow the example I have cited, and abstain from voting. I should be sorry indeed to see a gentleman who has held the good opinion of his fellow-men in his locality, who has raised himself in that same locality to the position he occupies at the present time, and who has won that respect during the course of years—I say I should be sorry to see such a man ruthlessly throw away the confidence he has gained: and yet he must throw it away if he votes with the Opposition. He said this afternoon that he had some reason to doubt the gentlemen who occupied the Government benches, but that among the Opposition there were men who would make a good Ministry, and carry measures beneficial to the country. Well, I say we have had experience of those gentlemen in the past, and it shows us this, that they have no desire to see the Coast progress; whilst our experience during the short time that the present Ministry has been in office has been of an opposite character. Under these circumstances he has no business to record his vote against the Government, but should vote for us; and I trust he will do so. We have historical authority for saying that even at the eleventh hour there is hope, and I trust that after all we shall not find that any of the members from the West Coast belong to the genus Rodent. I do not think the West Coast members deserve that name. We certainly had one on the last occasion; but he has been relegated to obscurity, and we know it must be two or three years before he can have an opportunity of emerging from that obscurity.

An Hon. MEMBER.—In six months.

Mr. SEDDON.—Some gentleman says in six months; but I say that is impossible, and the reason is this: Supposing we pass a Bill amending the electoral law this session, whoever is in power it will take at least twelve months for the people to get on the electoral rolls. Then another session will be here, and an election will not then take place. There will, of course, be a fight, and, if either side is beaten, that side will claim that it would have a majority if the Parliament were elected on the basis of manhood suffrage, and there will then be a dissolution; but it must be practically two years hence before that can take place. Some gentlemen have complained that the Premier in his speech went to the old countries—to France, to England, to Ireland, and Scotland, and even landed in Babylon. Well, suppose he did. What guides the world at the present time but experience? And if from the experience of other countries we may gain useful lessons, why should we not appeal to that experience? If the people have suffered from the legislation in other countries, why should we not take warning? Every conscientious representative in this House will endeavour to prevent such things recurring in this colony. We must be guided by experience. Take the whole of the sciences. Have they not improved of late years? Have not the experiments and experiences of years been handed down to us for years, and have we not benefited by them? Take the improvements in machinery and in the means of saving labour, and see what we have gained by them. It is by the experience of the past that these have been brought about, and so I say that it is from the experience of the past in this colony—the, to me, painful experience—that we should learn not to trust those who have previously guided its affairs. Why are we taxed to the extent of £12 10s. per head a year, when the people of Victoria and New South Wales are only taxed to the extent of about £3 per head? Why are our burdens something like £50 per head of population, when in Victoria they are only about £12? Is it not the effect of bad legislation and bad administration? Are we to throw the blame on the gentlemen who have occupied those benches only about two years? No, Sir; it is their predecessors that we must blame for the position in which we find ourselves. I come now to the question of the land laws; and I may refer to the land laws of Ireland in relation to that point. I hear that the honorable member for Riverton (Mr. McCaughan) hails from that country. If he does so, I am somewhat surprised that he should give his vote against the honorable gentlemen who occupy those benches; because no country in the whole world has suffered so much from bad land laws as Ireland. I hope the picture I am going to paint of scenes which constantly happen there will be before his eyes when he comes to record his vote. I do not care whether he comes from a family in affluent circumstances there; but, whether he does or not, he must know that what I am about to say is true. I have seen his fellow-countrymen, who have left their homes, standing on the wharves at Liverpool. I have seen old men and women bidding good-bye to their sons and daughters, and shedding tears as they parted from them when the young people were starting on their voyage to this country. Then the time comes when the sons and daughters send for their fathers and mothers to come out. Do they, who spent their sixty or seventy years, perhaps, in the land of their birth, tear themselves from it without feelings of regret? The last Sunday comes, and they part in sadness from their friends. They visit the graveyard where those who have been dear to them lie. They tear themselves from all the old associations, and they come away to this new country. Do they come willingly? Is it of their own free will that they break asunder all these old ties? No; they are driven away. They are driven from their homes by the bad laws which oppress them. I hope honorable members will bear that in mind when they vote on this occasion, and I trust that in years to come we shall not through their votes see the same thing happen here. You may say, "Oh! we have plenty of land;" but I tell you that it will be grasped by the aristocracy that is springing up amongst us. I fear me that, if I were to arise from my grave some fifty or a hundred years hence, I should find the people driven from our shores and going to Victoria and New South Wales, where they are legislating year by year against squattocracy. Such being the case, whom are we to trust with the framing of our laws? Are we to trust to those who in the past have made laws that have led to the springing-up of an aristocracy of landholders here? I say we must not. Look at Victoria. Look at the last division which took place there. The whole Conservative newspaper press—and it is very powerful there; I do not know whether it is corrupt—brought all its weight to bear against Mr. Berry and his Ministry; but the people, with their manhood suffrage, have persistently opposed all attempts to oust that Ministry. They have shown to New Zealand an example that we should copy. When the question of taxation came up, and of an increased tariff, the Assembly, by an overwhelming majority, carried the Reform Bill, and adhered to the Liberal party, even though they had to submit to additional taxation. That is the principle I hope will be acted on here. I hope those honorable gentlemen who represent three hundred electors, or who may represent constituencies of a thousand electors, will bear in mind that, if we had manhood suffrage here, every vote given by myself or by a member for Auckland or a member for Christchurch would be equal to at least three of their votes. If we had manhood suffrage here, we who represent large constituencies should not have to fight for dear life and existence. We should not be compelled to carry on a desperate struggle—so desperate that, one honorable member being absent, we have to use the forms of the House to protract the debate until he arrives. Honorable members on the Opposition benches seem overjoyed at that statement, but I may tell them that the Government is not responsible for the position in which we are. Two days ago an offer was made to pair that gentleman, and the Opposition positively refused to do so. They certainly offered as a pair a gentleman whom they thought it would be as well to get rid of—the honorable member for Grey Valley. But that was no proper pair. Why did they not give us a gentleman who was sitting in the House here and who was known to be a pronounced Oppositionist? If they had done so, we should not have been obliged to have recourse to the prescribed rules in order to give time for the absent member to arrive. Therefore the blame for our position lies at the door of the Opposition. I think myself it is only right that we should take a fair and impartial view of this question. I do not think the debate which has taken place is to be regretted, or that it has in any way lowered the position of the House. Neither young nor old members need regret it, nor do I think the electors will regret that it has taken place. It was, in fact, only right that it should take place, because this is really a very serious question we have before us. We find now that the majority of fourteen which there was against the Government last session has been reduced to no majority at all, and I say we had a perfect right to debate the question. I only regret that the Opposition have not replied to the arguments we have adduced. They have simply contented themselves with giving a block vote. I shall be only too glad to see the honorable member for Geraldine, of whose eloquence I have heard a great deal, spring up and tear every word I have spoken to pieces, so that both sides may be placed before the electors. It is only by debates of this kind that we can arrive at a true conclusion. Therefore I say the honorable member for Grey Valley should have waited until the debate took place, and should have listened to the charges made here on the floor of the House, and to the refutation of them, and then should have judged, and not have formed his judgment on an ex parte statement outside the House. I trust that in giving his vote every honorable member will exercise it as I intend to do. Neither the Ministry nor the Opposition influence me, but principle. Until the Bills are on the table which are to give effect to the principles laid down in this Address no honorable member has a right to vote against the Government. If I find that the views I express are not carried out when those measures are brought forward, or if they are likely to be detrimental to the interests of the colony, then I shall vote against any Government which brings them in. I am prepared, under present circumstances, to swallow one or two points in this Address with which I do not altogether agree, in order to support the general principle. For instance, there is the clause relating to the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the best routes for railways. I am not satisfied with that, because, if the present Opposition were to get into power, and appoint a Committee to inquire into the railway to the West Coast, I am afraid they would protract their labours until all the money was spent, and there was none left to go on with this work. Another matter with which I do not agree is the paragraph relating to the sale of Native lands. I do not think we should use the public money of the colony to enhance the value of the Native lands, and thus give the Natives the value of the money we make the white people pay interest for. We should fix a fair value on the land, and then, when it is sold, let the amount be deducted on which the improved value has taken place. The honorable member for Cheviot made a point against the Government that their Bill would entail too much cost on persons in districts like mine to get their names placed on the roll; but the honorable gentleman should remember that that is only a matter of detail. The principle is good, and any defects in detail can be remedied afterwards. Instead of having only one officer in a district, let any number that may be necessary be appointed. Nothing whatever has been said during this debate which would shake my allegiance to the Government. I trust that, whatever may be the result of the vote, it will not lead to the rule of a minority. There has been too much of minority-ruling in New Zealand, and that is why I support the present Government. Taking the whole of the elections, and carefully summing up the candidates elected for and against the Government, and the numbers they respectively represent, I find that the Government has been supported by three to one of the electors. Objection has been especially made to the present Premier as the head of the Government; but I venture to say that, if a vote of the whole colony were taken as to who should be Premier, it would be in favour of that honorable gentleman. That is the test I hurl down to the Opposition. Would the leader of the Opposition carry the vote? Certainly not; and nobody knows it better than those who are sitting round him. I say the Premier of this colony should have the confidence of the whole colony. I believe the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government holds that position; and, such being the case, I intend to vote for him and his Ministry, and maintain them in their present position.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—I rise to make a personal explanation on a point about which I have been misunderstood. I am quite sure the honorable member for Hokitika is incapable of wilfully misrepresenting anything I said, but, in speaking of my remarks with regard to the Premier's imbecility, he has mistaken a quotation for an original assertion of mine. What I said was, that I did not, of course, expect that the honorable member for Timaru was going to vote for the Premier after having stated, as reported in the Christchurch and Timaru newspapers, that he would not support the Premier, both on account of the despotic habits which that honorable gentleman had acquired as Governor of the colony, and also of the imbecility which had reached him with his old age.

Mr. TURNBULL.—I am not aware that any such statement ever passed my lips.

Mr. WHITAKER.—Sir, I had not intended to take part in this debate, having hoped that the time of the country would not have been wasted so long as it has been by such speeches as we have just heard from the honorable member for Hokitika. I had hoped that we should have come to a division some two or three days ago, and that honorable members would not have taken up the time of the House by speaking on what I consider a foregone conclusion, the verdict of the country itself having been just taken on the issue before the House. But, having heard this evening that a division would probably not be taken to-night, that there were two or three whales being kept in reserve for to-morrow, and that to-night there would be a chance for the minnows to disport themselves, I thought I would endeavour to give to the House some few reasons why I intend to vote with the Opposition. I did not intend to follow or comment upon the remarks of the honorable gentleman who has preceded me; but I cannot refrain from making one or two remarks in reference to what that honorable member has been saying. I have not the smallest doubt that the honorable member for Hokitika (Mr. Seddon) would have felt highly flattered and highly gratified had the honorable member for Geraldine got up and criticised his extremely voluminous and discursive speech; but we know a great deal better on this side of the House than to fire off a cannon to kill a mosquito. Not that I would call the honorable member for Hokitika a mosquito. It is only a simile. I have been asked to follow the honorable member, and therefore he will not on this occasion be subjected to the criticism of that practised politician and grand speaker, the honorable member for Geraldine. Before I proceed any further, perhaps he will not think it out of place in me as a fellow-young-member if I give him a piece of advice. I have my eye on that clock, and when the minute-hand reaches a quarter-past ten I shall resume my seat. Now, I have been waiting in the House for three-quarters of an hour to deliver myself of what I have to say; I believe the honorable gentleman had been speaking close upon an hour before I came into the House; and I would give him this piece of advice, as I do not think it is at all likely that this House will be again disposed to extend the same courtesy to the honorable gentleman as it has shown him on this occasion; I hope the honorable gentleman will not be offended if I recommend him as a young member to make his addresses a little shorter in future. When I came in the honorable gentleman was referring to Te Whiti. I do not know how he got to Taranaki from Grey Valley; but he appeared to know a great deal about Te Whiti; and from there he travelled to the honorable member for Grey Valley (Mr. Masters); and the kindly manner in which he endeavoured to take that gentleman's conscience under his protection amused me immensely. One most remarkable feature about his anxiety on behalf of the honorable member's political morals was this: that the honorable member for Grey Valley (Mr. Masters) was spoiling a block vote which the honorable gentleman wished to sell to the Premier and the Government in order to get the Grey Valley Railway. I must confess it struck me that it was not the honorable gentleman's morals which he was looking after, but the Grey Valley Railway. I think the honorable member for Grey Valley (Mr. Masters) has acted wisely in voting as he is going to vote. I noticed particularly, in regard to those extracts that have been read, that he always reserved to himself the right to exercise his discretion upon such matters as came before him with reference to the policy of the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government. I consider that the extracts that were read gave the fullest liberty to the honorable member to act as he thought fit upon this vote of no confidence. The next time the honorable gentleman who has last spoken tries to look after the morals of a gentleman like the honorable member for Grey Valley, he should not let it be so transparent that the reason he wishes to attach the honorable member to him is, as I have said, for the purpose—I will not say of selling himself, because that would not be in order—but of handing over to the Government a block vote in consideration of a million of money to be spent on the Grey Valley Railway. That is about the hardest abuse I can find in my heart to give to the honorable member. I hope he will take it to heart and profit by it; because we have heard a great deal about purity of elections, Bribery Bills, political bribery, and bribery of all descriptions, and particularly from the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government, who, I recollect, administered a very severe rebuke to Sir Julius Vogel with reference to the Wanganui Bridge, at the time when Sir Julius Vogel was standing for Wanganui. I think, therefore, that the honorable gentleman who has just sat down will do well to bear in mind that we do not countenance political bribery in this House, and do not countenance block votes being given in order to obtain grants of money for railways. I shall now proceed to give the reasons why I intend to vote against the Government upon this no-confidence motion. The first thing I shall touch upon will be the Speech of His Excellency the Governor, as framed by Ministers. Now, Sir, I am not at all disposed to admit for one moment that the honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House are the sole patron saints of the sacred cause of liberty. I can only say that, although quite a young man, I have held very advanced Liberal views for the last fifteen years. It is not the first time I have heard arguments adduced in reference to political reforms, in reference to changes in the incidence of taxation, or in reference to land laws. I shall come to these presently, before I conclude my speech; but, in the meantime, I wish to point out, with reference to the Governor's Speech, one particular item in the Liberal platform which has been entirely omitted from the Speech. I will admit the importance of parliamentary reform; I will admit the importance of electoral reform; I admit all these things without hesitation or doubt: but I do say that the first great plank in any Liberal platform in this country is a sound and thorough change in the incidence of taxation. Now, I do not see any mention of that—except in a purely incidental manner—in the whole of the Governor's Speech. I submit that we should have seen some mention of a change in the shape of an income- and property-tax, or, at all events, some allusion to a practical method of achieving that free breakfast-table of which we have heard so much during the last three or four years. I do not profess, of course, to have the eloquence of the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government, but I do claim to possess a certain amount of common sense, and a certain honesty of purpose in trying to reduce my views to practice. Now, I have always said that I should like to see some change in the incidence of taxation. It is too late to-night to go fully into the question; but it is perfectly clear that, after all the money we have spent on public works, and the great benefit which has accrued to property from the expenditure of that money, there should be some change; and I confidently expected to see some mention of the subject in the Governor's Speech: but I was disappointed. Therefore I fail to recognize a real Liberal programme in that Speech. One of the most important matters to the people of this colony is the aspect of financial affairs. As yet we have not been able to get a Financial Statement from the Treasurer; I have not seen one, and am not aware that such a Statement is in existence: but I have reason to believe—it has been told to me, at all events, on good authority—that there will be a deficiency of between £300,000 and £400,000 in the revenue for this year. Now, I do not see the slightest indication in the Governor's Speech of what line of policy, what taxation, or what fiscal change is to be proposed in order to meet this enormous deficiency in the revenue. If I could see an inkling of anything at all to give me an idea of how it is going to be done, I should be much more clear in voting on this motion; but I see none. Another thing, I must confess, that I did not like in the Governor's Speech was the way in which Native matters were shirked. If there is a difficulty in the front of us I do like to see that difficulty tackled. I like to take the bull by the horns. I do not like to see a veil attempted to be drawn over what is certainly one of the darkest pages in New Zealand's history. It would have been far more manly, and far more noble, to have come down to this House and told the truth in the Governor's Speech as to how Native affairs stood, and then have suggested a remedy and invited the co-operation of this House. I should not have been one to blame the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government altogether for the present state of Native affairs. I have some little knowledge of those matters, and am aware that things have been drifting for the last seven or eight years—ever since, in my opinion, the passing of the Native Lands Act of 1873—into their present unsatisfactory position. I should not have been inclined to blame those honorable gentlemen who have only been in office for two years. But I think they might have had the honesty to have told us how matters stood in the Governor's Speech, and to have indicated the remedies they proposed to adopt. I do not think the course they have taken in this respect is worthy of a Government, and on that ground alone I do not think they ought to command the support of any honest and intelligent politician. There is another very important matter, and I am surprised that the patriots on the other side of the House have not touched upon it more frequently. Considering, however, that many of them have come in here, I will not say in the pocket of a great man, but placarded with the name of the Premier, it is perhaps not to be expected that they should touch upon the flaws in the system which he is adopting, or expose the sores which he has caused on the body politic. They cannot be expected to criticise in a fair and square manner the policy of that honorable gentleman. Therefore I say I am not surprised; but all I ask them now, as Liberals, is, whether they do not consider that a proper spirit of self-government is at the bottom of all true Liberalism. Now, Sir, we all admit that the present Counties Act and the Road Boards Act do not work together. We all admit that our local self-government is defective, and requires a remedy. And yet, in this great Liberal programme I have not seen the slightest indication that any attempt whatever will be made to give the people those rights and privileges which can only be secured by a strong system of local self-government. Local self-government, Sir, is the natural buffer between the centralism which is growing up here now and the people; and we want local bodies, not only as agents by whom the money may be expended, but to be small political organizations which in the times of trouble that may hereafter arise may be the rallying-points for the people in defending their liberties. Such institutions I conceive would be based on true Liberalism. Now, I must confess to a certain amount of jealousy for my part of the country, and I did think that in the Governor's Speech, which professes to be an expression of the sentiments of the Ministry, I should see some mention of a line of railway to be carried out in that part of New Zealand. I thought that, as there was a line to be carried out in the neighbourhood of Marsden, it would have received some slight notice; but there is no mention of it whatever. I am well aware that an honorable gentleman has come down here who is fully prepared to support any Government which will advance that railway, and I believe that he will do so; but I am astonished to see him sitting on the other side of the House, because we now see from the Governor's Speech that Grey Valley is to get a railway, and Marsden is to go without. There ought to have been some mention made of public works; and I cannot help noticing one very important fact, and that is, the entire absence of any reference to the railway from Te Awamutu to Inglewood. That was made a great point of in the policy of the Government—it was considered, in fact, to be the turning-point in the regeneration of the northern part of this Island; but we did not see the slightest reference to it in the Speech. At one time, honorable members will recollect, we heard of nothing else but the enormous success of the Government in acquiring from the Natives a large block of land in the King country, which was to be cut up and sold at astonishing prices, and a railway to run through it was to be constructed out of the receipts. The line was to run right through the King country, it was to secure the peace of the colony, our securities were to reach an unprecedented figure in the Home money market, the northern portion of New Zealand was to be regenerated, and the millennium was believed to be at hand. But why has all this not come to pass? Is the whole thing a total failure? Will the Natives not allow the line to go through their land? If there is a reason, why not let us know it? The House ought to be kept informed on these subjects. Some mention ought to be made of such an important work in the Governor's Speech; yet I see no allusion to the subject. These are the general reasons why I cannot support the present Government; but there are other grounds, coming closer to my own part of the country, upon which I should oppose any Government of which the Premier is the head. The honorable gentleman has represented the Thames constituency for some time, and the effect of that representation upon the Thames people has been highly gratifying to them; but it has not been gratifying to my constituents, or to the people of the Waikato as a whole. We did at one time get the Premier up to turn the first sod of our railway. We did not get him a silver trowel and a fancy wheelbarrow, and he drove under the same arch that had been erected for the Governor a few days before. So, perhaps, that was the reason we got nothing, while the people at the other end of the line got the money to go on with their part. I know what was said to the County Chairman, Mr. Brodie, but I also know what the money was voted for, and I unhesitatingly assert that the £168,000 was voted for constructing the railway from Hamilton to Omaha. Promises have been made time after time that the railway would be constructed, but it never has been constructed. I should not grumble, but our money has been spent on the other end of the line amongst the constituents of the Premier. I have lived some time at the Thames; I have many friends there, and I have great sympathy with the people, and do not in any way grudge or oppose their line; but I must say that I think it is a peculiar thing that three contracts should have been entered into at that end of the line, and not a single contract at our end. The sod turned by the Premier still lies there in all its solitary nakedness, and the wheelbarrow is in the back-yard of one of the hotels; but we have no railway. Really I do not consider that this is fair; neither do the people feel that they have received justice at the hands of the Government. Now, Sir, I gave notice to-day for the production of the correspondence relating to an endowment for the Borough of the Thames, and I mean to say a few words about that now. I should say that I have had a correspondence with the Government on this subject. I was promised that, in accordance with the clause in the Municipal Corporations Act of 1876, an endowment should be given to the Borough of Hamilton. I suggested that it should be taken out of the Aroha Block, and I was laughed at. I was told that the land was too valuable, and that it would be cut up for sale. Sir, I am informed—and if I am wrong perhaps the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government will tell off some other member of the Ministry to correct me: I do not suppose that the Premier will himself deign to reply to so insignificant an opponent as myself—that two thousand acres of that block have been converted into an endowment for the Thames. Now, it is not fair that an endowment for my district should be refused, and that the district of the Premier should get it. More than that, we are more closely connected with it than the Thames people, and we certainly had as strong a claim to it as they had. We asked for one thousand acres only, and could not get it; while the Thames people got two thousand acres. That is not dealing fairly with the people, and I can assure the Government that my constituents are very sore about it. Those are what I may call my local reasons for voting against the Government. The honorable member for Auckland City East amused me when he spoke on the subject of the use of the “Hinemoa.” Now, Sir, I think I can recollect something of the opinion expressed by the Premier on this subject, when he occupied a seat on this side of the House. No language could be too strong in denunciation of those who used the “Hinemoa” before the Premier took to using her himself. I did not occupy a seat in this House at the time, but I remember that the language was somewhat remarkable; and, further, it was promised that the steamer was to be sold; and the Ministerial residences were to be sold also. The honorable member for Auckland City East came to the consideration of the subject without any argument whatever, except that he said the Premier would be justified in using the steamer again, and “more power to him.” Now, I do not think that is right. I will never consent to prostitute principles for men, and the fact of there being an eminent man at the head of the Government will not prevent me from saying that their use of the steamer was wrong, and contrary to the first principles of that Liberalism of which the honorable member for Auckland City East is so ardent and eloquent a supporter. If the honorable member for Auckland City East can say that the Premier is right in using the “Hinemoa” almost exclusively for his own purposes, though ostensibly for the purpose of educating the people, and can say “more power to him,” I am perfectly satisfied that he is quite in the wrong. The honorable gentleman can hardly be expected to know very much about Native difficulties, and therefore the “Hinemoa” was a subject more within his comprehension; but when he took up the Ohinemuri difficulty he evidently knew nothing of what he was talking about: in fact, he appealed to honorable members on the other side to tell him something about it. Well, I know something about it, and my version of the story is this. I gathered it from a reliable source, and the difficulty arose in this way, as far as I can learn. Certain Government Natives bought a piece of land from Ngatikoe, Ngatihako being the real owners. I happened to know one gentleman who was asked to go and survey it, and his reply was that, as he had a small wife and a large family, and as his life was not insured, he did not care to go and survey it. The Ngatihako land was bought from the wrong owners; and that is the real origin of the difficulty. The honorable gentleman did not seem to know how it occurred, but he said it was very slight; but it was a distinct difficulty between the Ngatihako Tribe and the Government as to whether the Government had bought from the right people or not. Now, Sir, may I say one word about the Native Minister? I was not in the House last session. Had I been here I certainly should have made some remarks about the Kopua meeting, because I do not agree with the way in which the Native Minister was treated by some members of the House: wherever I may stand, my voice shall be used to protect persons from unjust accusations; and I say that the statements made about the Native Minister last session were not true. I was at the meeting from beginning to end. There was no disorder, no disturbance, no superabundance of grog—nothing of the kind. Everything, so far as I saw, was very creditably conducted. As to the political aspects of the meeting we may differ. In that respect, I think it was not successful—I was very much grieved to see the Premier walking up and down the bank of the river, waiting to see a few savages—but these personal charges had no foundation whatever, and I wish it to be placed on record that I took the first opportunity to refute these slanders against a gentleman of whom I entertain the highest opinion. So much for the honorable member for Auckland City East. I will now touch lightly upon the Minister of Mines. I have had the opportunity of knowing that honorable gentleman for some nine or ten years. I think the honorable member for Tuapeka to-day made use of an expression which he was compelled to retract. It referred to another honorable gentleman being an “all-sorts.” I am not going to make use of that expression, because I should probably be called to order if I did; but, if I were to use any particular expression in reference to the Minister of Mines, that would be the expression I should use. I have always looked upon the honorable gentleman as a useful member of the Civil Service, who could be turned to account whenever a Government was in extremity—who, from the position of a Minister in the Legislative Council, descended to the Commissionership of Annuities, again emerged as a Minister in this House, and after all is comfortably provided for at £600 or £800 a year. I was quite prepared to hear a sound, practical speech from the honorable member; and I did hear such a speech. I thought he spoke remarkably well; but judge of my astonishment when I saw him drop the rôle of a first-rate Civil servant, and come out as a democrat. Of all unlikely men I know, he is the most unlikely—from want of enthusiasm—to become a leader of democracy. He appeared to have learnt his speech by heart; and it struck me that he had prepared it for another occasion, but thought it wise—as this might be the last time he could speak from the Government benches—to give expression to it at once. At all events, it was the most disjointed affair I ever heard. I could not distinguish the first from the last, or the last from the first, and I may say it seemed to be "pumped" out of the honorable member. We always leave the good things to the last, and I just want to say one or two words in reference to the position taken up by the Premier with regard to his so-called Liberal principles: then I have done. I know it will be presumptuous in me to criticise a gentleman who, no doubt, possesses a high Imperial reputation, and for whom I have the highest respect. However, the honorable gentleman, it is well known, is fond of the rising generation and of children, and of seeking wisdom "out of the mouths of babes and sucklings," so I have no doubt he will overlook the fact of my being a young man and a young member. From the earliest period that I looked into these matters, I have been deeply imbued with those Liberal principles which the honorable gentleman now claims for the first time as being his own, and I say that in every speech made by the Premier I can recognize the sentiments—expressed in almost the same language—of Carlyle, Froude, and other authors for whose writings I have a profound respect, and of whom I am a humble follower. He has simply taken the contents of their books, and claims that he, and not the gentlemen I have named, is the originator of the sentiments he expresses. I was led to investigate this matter the other day through coming across a speech delivered by the Premier at a public meeting, which was very much like a page or two of Froude's essay on "England and her Colonies." I would like to give the honorable gentleman credit for being copied by Froude; but, on comparing dates, it is only too evident that he must have copied Froude. On investigating the matter further, I found that it was quite a common practice on the part of the honorable gentleman. Before returning to New Zealand on the last occasion I became thoroughly imbued with those principles; I thought about them and, I may say, wrote about them. I therefore object to the honorable gentleman coming before the people of New Zealand—who have not time and opportunity to read and study these matters, and who are not perhaps aware that such a school of thought has existed for fifty years in Europe—and telling them that he is the originator of those principles, and that he alone is fit to carry them out. I say that there are other gentlemen sitting inside this House and outside of it who are more thoroughly desirous of carrying those measures than, and who are fully as able and determined to do so as, the honorable gentleman. I will not give my support to any party that will go back from those principles; but I say that the eternal principles of liberty are not bound up in the life of any one man. Those principles will live and liberal ideas will progress whether the honorable gentleman is at the head of the Government or is on the Opposition benches; whether the honorable gentleman is alive or is in his grave those principles will live, because those principles are eternal. On this point I believe that many honorable members on this side of the House thoroughly agree with me. It is the habit to call members on this side of the House "Conservatives." I do not know what a Conservative is, in a progressive country like New Zealand. Does the Premier mean to call the honorable member for Cheviot a Conservative? Does he not know that that honorable member was one of the most liberal and advanced thinkers in New Zealand for many years before he himself came forth from his retirement? There are other gentlemen among the Opposition who have constantly supported and urged the adoption of liberal measures. Does not the Premier remember that twenty-three years ago a gentleman who is not now in this House brought in Bills to give effect to the electoral reforms now proposed? When those Bills were rejected the gentleman I refer to said to the House, "A time will come when you must pass these measures. I tell you our Constitution is democratic. You had better pass these measures now, because, if you do not, they will be forced from you." Those words were used twenty-three years ago, and I say the measures now before us are not new. Then, again, the late member for Grey Valley (Mr. Woolcock) was the first to table a motion in favour of a change in the incidence of taxation. That gentleman was on the Opposition benches last year, but surely he was a liberal man. That is all I have to say upon that point. I sincerely trust we are not to be again treated to those statements by the Premier and his followers that he alone is capable of giving effect to these liberal measures, while we see gentlemen on the Opposition benches who are equally capable of giving effect to them, and who are supported by gentlemen who are equally determined with honorable members opposite to have those measures passed. I cannot refrain, in conclusion, from quoting the following words uttered last year by the honorable member for Wanganui (Mr. Bryce):—

"There is one curious thing, in regard to the course which the Hon. the Premier takes, which must strike everybody. He takes up this position: that he is going to do good to New Zealand—that he is going to make New Zealand great and free; and the thing itself—that is, the possibility of New Zealand becoming great and free—is quite a secondary consideration: his first thought is that he himself is to make it so. . . . But when a sacrifice is placed upon the pure altar of liberty the priest must not wear the garments of tyranny."

Major TE WHEORO.—Sir, I shall not have much to say to this House, because, as far as I can see, members are divided and voting against each other. If I should ramble beyond the rules of the House, I hope the House will give me consideration, from the fact that I am a new member. I thought it would have been better for the Native Minister to make his speech first, so that I might follow him. Still, it is a hard thing to decide when this debate will be terminated. In the Governor's Speech there is a portion which relates to Native affairs: it is a very important matter about a Bill concerning Native affairs. The evils that have arisen in this Island have sprung from that source. I think the House should give to the Maoris a certain power that they may themselves conduct their own affairs. It was on these grounds that my constituents sent me to represent them in this House—to consider all the matters that affected them that would be brought up in this House, and to appeal to the members of this House to pass certain measures which would be for their benefit. That is why I consider that all measures that are brought up in any way connected with the Native race should be first circulated among them, or an idea of their nature given to them, so that they may be able to judge and fairly consider them before their final determination here. What I can see in the present debate is this: Europeans versus Europeans; they are simply fighting for their own benefit. I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that I came here simply to represent Native matters. Therefore I will say that, whoever brings forward such measures as will conduce to the welfare of the Natives, I am with him.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to be found among the ranks of the apologists for speech in this House. So far as I understand the functions of this House there is essentially and particularly included among them the function of speech, if we are true to our instincts, and do not lapse into a condition of things in which all questions are to be decided in the lobbies before any debate has taken place upon them. We must seriously consider whether such a mode of governing the country is the one best adapted to promote liberty of speech. I hardly think—in spite of the many appearances which indicate that a sudden change has come over us gradually during the last few years—I hardly yet think that, in reality, if honorable members would be true to their own instincts and speak freely their own opinions, they would say that government could be carried out in the lobbies. At any rate, so long as I hold a seat in this House, whatever may be the customs that creep into our proceedings, I shall unhesitatingly, when I think it my duty—when duty to my cause demands some utterance from me; when the interests of my constituents demand it—I shall, Sir, give in this House that utterance, trusting to your kindly patience and the patience of the House. I feel that we have gradually arrived at a turning-point, so to speak, in our legislation, and that the country essentially demands of every one of us that earnest and searching inquiry into not only the condition of our laws, but the condition and history of those who seek to administer them. I cannot look at the question now before us as being simply whether, for some acts of alleged maladministration, the honorable members sitting on the Ministerial benches are to give place to others. Serious as some of those charges are, yet not one of them has such an important bearing in my mind, or is so likely to influence my decision, as the characteristics and the history of the administrators, during the next few years, of our laws, and the creators of new laws essentially needed for our country at the present time. I do not know that I could characterize the present Ministry particularly as a “provincial” Ministry—that is to say, I can hardly call it an “Auckland” Ministry; but yet it is certainly clear, as has been pointed out already to-night by an honorable member who preceded me, that the Opposition Ministry now to be constituted, provided the Government are beaten, must be essentially a Canterbury Ministry. Now, I would object altogether to a Ministry of that kind. If there was one spot of brightness in the arguments used by those who for years have endeavoured to bring into practical operation the abolition of the provinces, it was the hope that provincial jealousies might cease, and that provincial distinctions might pass away—that the Colonial Parliament and the Colonial Ministry would contain in its ranks the ablest men to be found from one end of the colony to the other, whether they were from Canterbury, Auckland, or Otago. The colonialization of the Land Fund, which we agreed to at a sacrifice, was another cause of hope that provincial jealousies would cease; yet they have not altogether ceased. Still, I would be true to the principle which I hinted at, of supporting the ablest men from any part of the colony, in the hope that these jealousies would wear themselves out. But a Canterbury Ministry, to my mind, has an objectionable feature about it, for this reason: that I do recognize, rightly or wrongly, that the politicians who have sprung from Canterbury during the many years this colony has enjoyed representative institutions have sprung from a class which has brought with it from a country with which we are all proud to be connected those traits of aristocratic government which are inherently vicious in themselves and entirely adverse to all progress and reform. Sir, it is not my intention to follow the honorable member who preceded me before the adjournment of the House. I would, however, venture, with the slight seniority I have in this House over him, to congratulate him and this House upon his accession to our numbers. Not one of us in this House at the present time, in the enjoyable circumstances in which that honorable gentleman has lately found himself, would have expected from him a deeply-thought-out political speech. I say that, not with the idea of undervaluing the ability with which he spoke, but more to congratulate him on the happy position in which he is placed, hoping that, so long as he holds a seat in this House, he will always be as loyal to the country as he has proved himself loyal to the honorable gentleman who for so many years occupied a distinguished position in this House. Nothing pleased me more than the defence—wrongly-founded on every point, completely-unanswerable on every point, though it was—which he endeavoured to put forward for the honorable gentleman who lately sat in this House—the honorable member for Waikato. I speak of his defence simply in reference to the cause from which it sprang. I hope that, as he grows in Liberal ideas, he will be able to discern where true Liberalism may find its truest place. We have had “language” enough in the past. One honorable member has assured the House that for thirty-seven years he has advocated Liberalism.

Major Te Whero

The honorable member for Waikato has advocated Liberalism for more than twenty years. Yet this advocacy has hardly ever proceeded beyond language. It has remained to the present day for the Government, or a member sitting on the Government benches, in his capacity as a Minister, to bring forward measures which he invites Parliament to pass, and which are founded upon the principles he enunciated. It is true that many honorable members who have spoken in this debate—and others who may speak, and who will announce themselves as in the Opposition ranks—it is quite true that they may have been bred in Liberalism, and that they may be as liberal in thought, in wish, and desire as any who sit on this side of the House; yet their views must be influenced by local circumstances, such, for instance, if I may allude to it, as the unfortunate outbreak on the West Coast—such circumstances must influence members in their votes with the party with which they associate themselves. I do not expect to see, in the struggle in which we are now engaged—and which has been going on for many years, at least for the last five years—I do not expect to see any distinct line of division of parties formed in this House, absolutely dividing the Liberals from those who think things best left as they are. But still it is coming about. It has been commenced by the honorable member for Wanganui (Mr. Ballance), the honorable gentleman who lately sat for Dunedin (Mr. Stout), the Hon. the Premier, and others, among whom I venture to class myself as one. This division of parties has been commenced, and it is going on. At the election when I first stood for a seat in this House, the party numbered sixteen; when I entered this House the party numbered thirty-three; and at the present moment the party may safely be numbered at forty-two or forty-three. There is a steady increase of members bound together more or less by liberal ideas; and it is a satisfactory thing for me to hear member after member getting up on the Opposition side, in addition to our numbers, and claiming to advocate liberal ideas. I hope that, in the course of another year or so, our ranks will still swell, so that the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Dick), the honorable member for Grey and Bell (Colonel Trimble), and others may see that on this side of the House is not placed and seated all the iniquity in New Zealand—that they may recognize that we have been for years engaged in a struggle in which our whole hearts and sympathies have been bound up, and which we are never prepared to let go, whether we be on the Ministerial side of the House or not; and, recognizing our consistency, and that we have some measure of common honesty about us, I hope we shall very shortly have their support. I have said it must be that local considerations actuate those honorable members, and I am sorry to say, that the most glaring example I am going to adduce comes from my own old province, in which I have lived for nearly seventeen years. It was patent that one of the greatest questions affecting Dunedin at the elections, as preached by the Press, as preached by the Opposition candidates—I think two of them at least—was hardly the question of liberal reform for which we have been fighting in this House, but whether Addington should have the railway workshops or not, and whether a highly-salaried official should spend his salary in Christchurch or Dunedin. I cannot believe that such questions as those which were represented by the Otago Daily Times and its editor in that interview with the Minister for Public Works which we were informed took place—I cannot believe that they animated the public to the extent it is said they did. But when we see such doctrines preached, and the Government opposed, not because its liberality was not believed in in the direction of reform, but because the Minister for Public Works was betraying their interests by not spending money in Otago—when we have such doctrines preached on the hustings and in the Press, we have reason to regret that the great City of Dunedin, whose foundations were laid in liberty, should have descended at the present day to such depths of degradation. Still, I do not wish to reflect—it would be obviously improper to do so—on the members who have been chosen by that city. I wished to give an illustration of what I meant when I said we could not expect all Liberals suddenly to come across on the one side of the House or the other. I would rather have our side gauged by principles and members it does not contain than solely by what it does. Looking through the ranks of honorable members, you will not find one of those go into the lobby with Ministers whose history is mixed up with our struggles against the Conservative interests. Every honorable member whose interests are identified with Conservatism will vote against the Government on this occasion. It is quite true, as has been stated repeatedly in this debate, that we cannot fit and adapt all the doctrines of Liberalism to our circumstances in the language and formulae with which they are adapted at Home; but for many years to come this test of Liberalism—the view taken by honorable members on the question of land and settlement of the people—must be a cardinal feature in the Liberal programme. When I see in the Opposition around me the honorable member who has been for years past the leading political tactician for the pastoral tenants of Canterbury, allied with the honorable member for Roslyn, who has been the champion of the pastoral tenants of Otago, I view with alarm an Administration placed on those benches created by those honorable members. For years in the South we have carried on incessantly, as the honorable member for Parnell has described to us, a war against the pastoral tenants of the Crown and their supporters in the Legislature of the colony. Otago has been true enough to itself, but it was impossible to get the Legislature to carry out liberal land measures, and the leader in resisting Otago's rights has always been the honorable member for Roslyn. I think we can judge of the Opposition, who propose now to submit themselves to criticism by offering to form a Ministry for this country, by analyzing slightly the opinions of their chosen leader. I do not view with regret the reaccession to this Chamber of the honorable member for Selwyn. Far from it. Nor would I view with anything like feelings of regret the accession of members to this House who honestly believe, as he does, that the franchise is as low as it should be. Any one who holds to a doctrine of paternal government, or who thinks that the people are not fit to judge their own interests, and holds these opinions honestly and adheres to them, is entitled to respect; but I have never been able to give that feeling of respect to the independent candidate of the present day. I do not wish to misrepresent the leader of the Opposition. I have been careful in paying attention to his political career as it has been recorded for us, and I think the honorable member can hardly object to my taking his opinions on the franchise from his speech which he made as a member of the Legislative Council, where he had no constituency to pay attention to, and where it was his duty to the Crown which nominated him to speak the exact opinions which he held. The Hon. John Hall, in 1878—October 8—speaking on the Electoral Bill, said,—

“I am one of those who deny that there is any abstract right on the part of any section of the body politic to any particular share of political power.”

Is there a Liberal sentiment in such an utterance? He goes on,—

“I deny that, because a man has to obey the laws, he has necessarily a right to a voice in the making of them. That is a popular theory; but I have never been able to find that it is founded upon any substantial basis.”

Mr. HALL.—Go on.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—I am going on—in my own time. What I say is, that that is the doctrine of what is called the “Advanced Tory School”—the doctrine of paternal Government. It is the doctrine which says this: “The people are not entitled to any share of the franchise which I, John Hall, do not care to give them. They are not able to judge. They must obey the laws I make, but have no claim to any abstract right by virtue of their manhood.” He went further:—

“I do not believe that government by a few, by a small class, is likely to bring that about. I do not believe that a franchise which shall go so low in the social scale as to practically place the government exclusively in the hands of one class only, the working-class, is likely to bring about the best kind of government.”

The honorable member for Grey and Bell told us last night—and I quite agree with him—that there is no such thing as a working-class, or, rather, that there is no other class. I quite agree with him, but I cannot congratulate him on the opinions of his chosen leader. The honorable member for Selwyn went a little further:—

“If I thought this Bill would cause any great extension of the franchise, I should not be prepared to support it, because I think the franchise is practically low enough.”

Mr. HALL.—Go on.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—Really I cannot undertake to read the whole speech. I am quite willing the honorable member should put in the hands of the member of the Opposition who is to wind up the debate any extracts from his speeches he may think fair and reasonable.

Mr. HALL.—It is not fair not to read further.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—The thing is unlimited. I really cannot undertake to read any more than the barest extracts. The honorable member told us, also, when he made his speech in moving the amendment, that the Government Bill now proposed would not greatly extend the franchise, and therefore he would support it. That was his reason for supporting it. Now, there is a slight inconsistency here which I cannot avoid noticing. The honorable member for Cheviot was put forward to make a great attack on the Premier. The whole weight of his attack was, that the Premier, by his own autocratic act, deprived fifty thousand or sixty thousand people of the franchise; yet the leader of the Opposition says that the Bill would have extended the franchise hardly at all: if it did—he said in the Legislative Council—he would not support it. It was because it would not extend the franchise, in his opinion, that he allowed it to pass. The member of the Opposition in the Upper House with whom the honorable member for Selwyn was acting did not mince his words so carefully as the honorable member for Selwyn. He told us that if there was any appeal from “Philip drunk to Philip sober” he would resist the Bill, and he brought his hand down on the table before him with great force as he uttered this sentiment. That is the whole doctrine of the Opposition: that the people are not to be trusted—that they can be led away by any one who is eloquent. For the same reason they attempted to pass a resolution in this House, and succeeded in limiting the time during which the elections could be held, mainly to prevent the Premier from visiting the different parts of the colony and addressing the people. The people were not to be trusted. “You are eloquent; they will believe you: we have found you out; but the people are too innocent; you will deceive and take them in.”

Hon. MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—I am glad the Opposition cheer that sentiment, because it is the doctrine of Toryism. On this side of the House, we are prepared to trust the people. The honorable member for Waikouaiti may travel the country. I venture to say, on behalf of the Government, that they will place the “Hinemoa” at his disposal. He may travel from Auckland to Invercargill, and let him try his eloquence. We are prepared to trust the people to any extent. The leader of the Opposition has given us another plain statement, a little further back in his political history, by which we are justified in judging the party who have chosen him. In 1869, when the Ballot Bill was before this House—he was then a representative—he said,—

“If the Bill should pass the House of Representatives, he still hoped it would not become law. . . . A Bill more detrimental to the good working of constitutional government he could not possibly conceive. . . . There was hardly a single measure which he should more regret seeing placed upon the Statute Book.”

That was the honorable gentleman's opinion of the Ballot Bill introduced year after year by Mr. Reynolds, and eventually carried into law, to his great credit, by the Parliament of New Zealand, in spite of the opposition of the leader now chosen by the pretended Liberals, the Constitutional party. Before I pass on to other questions, I cannot help referring back to 1868, when the honorable member gave his opinion on the Native franchise. It was in 1867 that the Native dual vote was created, and in 1868 the Hon. John Hall said, discussing the Native franchise, "he believed the balance of advantage rested with the present arrangement." Mr. Fox, it may be interesting to note, recognized fully the constitutional right of the Maori freeholders to their own franchise at that time, and said,—

"He might claim to have been one of the first in this country to advocate the representative rights of the Natives. From the earliest period in which they exercised their rights under the Constitution Act, he had encouraged the Natives to place themselves upon the electoral roll."

I do not care to pursue that question at present; but I may allude to it later, if time has not gone on too far, and if I have not wearied your patience, Sir. I have referred to the leader of the Opposition as the leading tactician of the land ring in Canterbury. That subject was brought rather startlingly to my ear the other night in the speech made by the honorable member for Cheviot. He astonished me by saying that only five thousand acres—he was reported to have said two thousand acres; but I will give him five thousand acres—had been gridironed in Canterbury; and, let me remark, it is rather strange that the two men on that side of the House who may most justly claim to be called Liberals, the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Dick) and the honorable member for Cheviot (Mr. Saunders), both felt called upon, from the strange company in which they have found themselves, to try and whitewash this gridironing system. The honorable member for Cheviot made an apology by saying it had not reached to any great extent, while the honorable member for Dunedin City compared it with the action of the Provincial Government under Sir John Richardson. Of course the honorable member for Dunedin City cannot understand this gridironing system, because its evil effects were not the result of the action of the Government. It was the action of individual runholders, who placed the gridiron on the runs taken up under laws created by themselves—the men who used the gridiron. It was as if the blacksmith who made the gridiron put it on his own back for his own benefit. There are no maps in the Land Office in Wellington giving any detailed information respecting the land districts in Canterbury, and I find, on inquiry, that, owing to the great delays that have taken place in the surveys in that province—due entirely to the gridironing system and the consequent inaccuracies of the surveys—no reliable maps are to be had here. Still, we have the Road Board maps, such as they are, and they are incomplete and imperfect; yet from them I found, in a few minutes, that, in one road district, or portion of a road district—that lying between the Levels and the Otaio River—more than five thousand acres are systematically gridironed in one batch. The next map I turned over was that of the South Rakai, and there there were one thousand two hundred acres gridironed in one batch; and so on, in many other districts, lesser or greater areas that are gridironed are to be found. Now, the gridironing system has been often explained in this House. Of course the mathematical plan was seldom put into operation, except in such districts as the Waimate District. What was done was to apply the gridiron to the mouthpieces of the country—isolated patches—and so, by securing the frontage or water-rights, to lock up the whole country for many years to come. On looking over these Road Board district maps I found that even the gridironing system has not been the greatest engine that has been employed by those who made laws for their own benefit. The pre-emptive-right system, according to the maps, has been used in a far more iniquitous manner. That system operates in this way: A fence, of any material, it matters not what, is run in a certain direction—the direction in which the land to be injured can be best injured. In some cases—in many cases—these lines extend for eight, ten, or twelve miles. A width of fifteen chains—often extending only seven and a half chains, or even less, on each side of this fence—is marked off, so that a strip has been, in one case brought under my notice, made to run four and a half miles across the country, and yet only containing five hundred acres to be paid for. In many cases these strips run eight or ten miles. In the Waimate District, near the Waitaki, there are three parallel lines, at intervals of a few miles, cleaving the country right through. The whole extent of this country is pre-empted by merely a few hundred acres, so that thirty miles of country are destroyed for the purposes of the free selector. In Selwyn this has been carried on to a great extent, and the Chairman of Selwyn County can tell the House more about it if he chooses to do so. It is nonsense for any one to apologize for these laws, and it is ridiculous to tell us that only five thousand or ten thousand acres have been destroyed by the agency of these laws. Many years ago I happened to have an ample opportunity of seeing what was going on in Canterbury. It was a sin to go on a run to take up land. If it were known that a party was about to leave Christchurch to take up land at the Waimate, agents would be sent on in advance to apprise the landholders, and the eyes of the district would be picked out and selected before these persons could arrive. There was no hope for any bond fide selector at first-hand from the Crown. The only persons who could exercise these land laws against the runholders have been speculators who had influence and weight enough to fight the pastoral tenants of the Crown, and were able to give proper advice to those who paid for information as to how they should invest their money. The bond fide selector in Canterbury has never had a show. I have seen men striving to pick out and secure sections, and, on referring to the maps of the country near the Waitaki and the Rangitata, it was found that there was no water-frontage, and that, although there was plenty of land, it was closed to the selector. I have seen men, in their anxiety to secure shingle land, borrow more than it was possible they ever could repay, so that they were led to ruin simply by the practices which have been constantly carried out by those in Canterbury who made the laws for their own benefit. Before leaving this land question let me allude to Otago. Nothing is more important to Otago at the present time than to prevent by all means the accession to the Ministerial benches of a Canterbury Ministry, supported by the honorable member for Roslyn. In 1882 the pastoral tenancies, to a great extent, throughout Otago expire. The question even now has to be dealt with, how these tenants are to be treated—what consideration they are to receive; and it seems to me that this affects the honorable member for Roslyn in the support he is giving to the Opposition more than the shock his delicate nature received because the Premier chose to address a meeting at Wellington. Yet the honorable member for Roslyn tells his constituents and the people of Otago that that was the wrong-doing which shook his political faith in the Government. His political purity was shocked at an attempt to coerce the freedom and independence of Parliament; and that statement has been repeated, though honorable gentlemen must know that the political situation was never once alluded to at that meeting. It was simply a meeting for advocating the formation of a Liberal Association, and there was no intention of alluding to the political situation. In the attacks that have been made repeatedly upon the Government, what has struck me curiously has been this: that every speaker has begun by asserting acts of alleged maladministration as the reason of his condemnation; yet we are told in the amendment that we are asked to vote that it is the constitution of the Government that is objected to. Because there has been an incrustation of salt upon the tubes of the "Hinemoa," therefore the Government as at present constituted has not the confidence of the House. That really is the logical position in which honorable members are put; and here allow me to point out that the amendment is so worded as in no degree to pledge the Opposition to pass the liberal measures which have been brought forward by the Government. The amendment must have been framed by one accustomed to "run cunning." While they are "prepared to give effect to the liberal measures desired by the country," when they have been seated on the Government benches for a little time, and supporters begin to blame them for not going on with a measure, they could very well turn round and say, "We said we were in favour of such measures as are desired by the country; but in our opinion the measures you speak of are not desired by the country." There is no pledge whatever on the part of the Opposition to support the specific measures brought forward for the first time by the present Government—manhood suffrage on a residential basis, triennial Parliaments, and a redistribution of seats on the basis of population; so that we are justified in looking at past political history in judging the likelihood of their turning round on the teachings of their lives, and honestly supporting the measures of the Ministry of the present day. I know as a matter of history that reform measures have been sometimes carried in England by the Conservative party, when driven to it; but there has at all times been something kept back. Measures supposed to be in accordance with Liberal views, when so passed by the Conservatives have always been found to contain something to prevent full operation being given to the principles they were supposed to contain. There is, for instance, the Agricultural Holdings Act, and there are several Acts in relation to Ireland, which abundantly prove what I say. The honorable gentleman who leads the Opposition is a staunch denominationalist in education, so that those who support him know what to expect from him in that respect. The honorable gentleman was one of those who thought it their duty, and boldly acted up to it, to record in the Journals of the Legislative Council their protest against the passage of our national Education Bill. The protest of the leader of the Opposition was sent Home to England, with a view to get the Act disallowed. The reply, of course, came back in the usual way, that the Imperial Government did not feel justified in regarding the protest of the honorable gentleman.

Mr. DE LAUNOY.—Yes, a very funny thing that when the people of the colony now find for the first time that, owing to the action of the honorable member for Kaiapoi, they are enjoying the blessings of national education, a party in this House are to endanger it by their adherence to the leader of the Opposition. Sir, when attacks are made upon the Premier—I think most unfairly—it is forgotten that that honorable gentleman has had to exercise his judgment, and to perform public acts in different capacities. The Premier was Governor of a Crown colony, and had to act under specific instructions. He was Governor of a country with representative institutions, and had to be bound by the advice of his Responsible Advisers. And now we have him amongst us as a free citizen of New Zealand, able and willing to speak in accordance with his own opinions. But the Opposition, without any regard to these distinctions, take up act by act and word by word of the Premier in his past career, and say that, because in 1853 or 1852 he acted and carried on certain things under instructions from the Secretary of State at Home, therefore his instincts cannot be Liberal. This has occurred in more instances than one. The honorable member for Bruce scarcely ever speaks without attacking the Sir George Grey Regulations. The honorable member for Cheviot has always got them in his speeches, and says, "How can you be a Liberal when you were a party to those Regulations?" Again, the charge is made, "You kept back our Constitution. You were an enemy to free institutions. You never even framed the Act that you say you framed." Even that has been said. I say there is something extremely dishonest in this, if those who make such statements are aware of the facts. As far as I can learn from the records, the truth is, that the seed, so to speak, of this violent Canterbury opposition to the Premier just now was sown many years ago. That opposition arose nearly twenty-seven years ago, and arose on one of those questions which history teaches us have always led to undying animosity. It arose about religion, or, rather, what it was intended to build up religion upon. I find that in 1852 the Governor made a very strong speech in the Legislative Council on this subject. It was proposed by the Canterbury Association to send Home to obtain power to have a large area of country placed at their disposal, under their regulations. This land, according to their regulations, they were to sell at £3 an acre, to any one who would buy it. Of this £3, £1 was to be put aside as an endowment for the Church of England. The Governor, in the Legislative Council, denounced this in these words:—

"Now, as he understood from rumour, it was intended to ask that a further block of, perhaps, three or four millions of acres should be placed under the same regulations; so that the case would then be that, before the whole of this block could be used, £7,000,000 must be paid for the purposes of the Church of England, and no part of it could be used until the proportionate amount due on that portion had been paid. This appeared to involve questions worthy the consideration of all classes in New Zealand, as the power of the humbler classes to acquire properties for their families was involved in it, the amount of the produce of the country was involved in it, and the extent and value of its commerce greatly depended upon it. . . . It did not appear to him to be in accordance with the principle that those who preach the Gospel should live by the Gospel, because it wrung contributions to a Church from those who were not friendly to that Church, but whose absolute necessities compelled them to buy land necessary for their operations. . . . He would far rather have seen the virtuous and industrious, who could find no place at Home, encouraged to occupy such a country upon terms which would have enabled them easily to acquire homes for themselves and their families, and readily to develop the resources of the country; and to have seen a busy, active clergy, by acts of kindness and Christian virtue, gaining from the members of their own Church in that fertile district a love and gratitude which would readily have yielded ample endowments for all their wants."

The honorable gentleman in that speech used many words and phrases which have become familiar to us in his latter speeches here. I will not detain the House now by reading further, but any honorable gentleman who wishes to see the speech for himself can do so in the volume of the New Zealand Spectator for 1851. He pointed out that it was not in the interest of the Church that it should be so built up; and, beyond that, he said, in words which I cannot quote, that it was a wrong and illegal thing that one denomination should raise £1 an acre from every settler, no matter whether he differed from the tenets of that denomination or not, before he could settle down in the country and form a home. For this, the honorable gentleman was followed with undying hate by the founders of the Canterbury Association, who found a good exponent of their views in the House of Lords in the person of Lord Lyttelton. He said,—

"The principle was as simple as possible: it was to plant a colony whose general character should be of the Church of England, and that £1 out of the £3 per acre that was to be paid for land should be applied to the purposes of the Church of England in the colony. . . . It was against that principle, and that principle alone, that the Governor contended; because he said it would not be acting fairly towards other denominations to have the land dealt with in that way."

That was an instance of the Governor of a Crown colony taking a noble stand in accordance with Liberalism, when he might at any moment be removed by the Conservative Ministry in power. This led to attack after attack being made upon him by Lord Lyttelton in the House of Lords, and by Mr. Adderley and others in the House of Commons. In 1853 the Sir George Grey Regulations came into existence, and Mr. Adderley and Sir John Pakington, in the House of Commons, attacked the Governor furiously on account of those Regulations being issued just before the Constitution Act came into force, which gave the Assembly itself power to pass Regulations.

Mr. HALL.—And quite right too.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—"Quite right!" I am glad the honorable gentleman takes up the same position as Mr. Adderley and Sir John Pakington, because that position was shown to be quite untenable, and it supports what I said at the outset—that that was the seed from which sprang all this opposition. I have got the books here, and if any honorable gentleman wishes to see the exact quotations he can do so; but I think it will be better that I should give them in my own words, leaving out what is not immediately pertinent to the question, but making no unfair omissions. A deputation of gentlemen sent by the Canterbury Association waited on Sir John Pakington in regard to the action of the Governor in the issue of these Regulations. Sir John Pakington chimed in with these gentlemen, and told them they had his authority to go to the Duke of Newcastle, and give him as an authority for saying that the Governor had acted without authority. The gentlemen went, but the Duke of Newcastle expressed his astonishment in these words:—

"I expressed astonishment at these statements, because there was an express clause in the Constitution Act, empowering the Secretary of State to give certain instructions to the Governor, and because I had seen in my own office a despatch from Sir John Pakington giving to Sir George Grey the instructions which the Constitution Act enabled him to give for the purpose of carrying out this very power in reference to waste lands."

Then, lower down in his speech he says—and this was said in the House of Lords a week or two after Sir John Pakington had expressed his ignorance of these instructions—

“This at all events I can positively say: that it was intended by the Government to give those powers, and that instructions in accordance with those powers were issued by Sir John Pakington.”

Then they went into the legality of the transaction; and the Crown Law Officers held that the Constitution Act gave Sir John Pakington power to issue instructions. The Duke of Newcastle said he preferred the authority of the Crown Law Officers—who were, of course, the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General of the day—to the opinion of Mr. Adderley. But I have to quote a little further with regard to these Regulations. The instructions given by Sir John Pakington were held to be full and complete. I had an extract, which I thought I had brought with me, as to the result of these Regulations, but I find I have not. However, I think I remember the substance of it. The Governor, under the instructions of Sir John Pakington, prepared the Regulations and issued them. The desire of the Imperial Parliament was mainly this: The great grievance which then existed in the colony was that, under the New Zealand Company and the Canterbury Association, land could not be procured at a price which could be reasonably paid for it by those who wished to use it simply for its primary purpose—its agricultural produce. The object, of course, of these high prices was what was called, I believe, the Wakefield theory—the idea that those who came out to found an aristocratic settlement should never want labour. That was the idea of high prices. But the colony, as a rule, contained people who wanted land themselves—who held the foolish idea that some of us on this side of the House entertain, that the land is the right of men—that we all have a right in the land—that it is not to be monopolized by a class merely because it is pastoral. We hold that there ought to be, as I understand, free-trade in land: and all such ideas were utterly repulsive to the aristocratic inclinations of the Canterbury Association. Well, Sir, the Regulations were called into being. Now, what do we find was the result of that? Two gentlemen—Mr. Gibbon Wakefield and Mr. Sewell—objected. Every district in the colony, including Banks Peninsula, sent to the Governor expressions of congratulation upon the fact that land was for once within the reach of the colonists. Every district in the colony from end to end joined in that general approval. There was no counter-petition or memorial except that sent by the two gentlemen I have named. I had an enumerated list of the districts which sent those memorials and messages of congratulation, but I have mislaid it. However, it can be found, together with all the particulars I have referred to, by any honorable member or by the Press, in the tenth volume of the House of Commons Papers on New Zealand. We find that the Governor, in sending the Regulations Home, stated to Sir John Pakington,—

“In accordance with the powers conferred upon me by the Act to grant a representative Constitution to the Colony of New Zealand, and in conformity with the views and wishes expressed in your despatches, especially those noted in the margin, I have issued the enclosed Proclamation, proclaiming regulations for the future disposal of waste lands, and for the settlement of the various embarrassing questions still outstanding in this country.”

They were absolutely based upon the instructions sent from the Colonial Office, which the Governor had to obey. But, if there was any check at all upon the Governor in that action, his instructions were to this effect: that he was, when the colony was on the eve of representative institutions, to consult the wishes of the people; and as soon as representative institutions were established he was not to interfere with the wishes of the people. And from that sprang another accusation, which has been hurled at the Premier from time to time, quite an unfounded one—the accusation that the lands in the Wairarapa were monopolized by the pastoral tenants under instructions or regulations from the Premier as Governor. The facts are all written in this old history, which any one who chooses can read for himself in the Library. The facts were, that the Governor recommended that only eighty acres, pre-emptive, should be given to the pastoral tenants. At the same time his instructions, which are printed and on record, bound him absolutely to obey the wishes of the provincial institutions which had then been created; and the Superintendent of Wellington chose to send up a message, properly authorized, to the Governor, in which he stated that, in the opinion of the provincial authorities of Wellington, the pre-emptive area should be 640 acres. It was not the Governor at all who gave these large areas in the Wairarapa. All his recommendations in his original despatch were disregarded and set aside in the interests of the pastoral tenants, who then had the monopoly of government in Wellington. I have already quoted the words of the Duke of Newcastle as to the instructions. He is just as emphatic in the matter of the charge which is brought forward, that the Premier as Governor had retarded the bringing into operation of the Constitution Act. It is all printed in Hansard. But I wish to give one other quotation from the Under Secretary for the Colonies, in reference to the accusation that the colony is not indebted to the honorable gentleman for its free institutions. Mr. F. Peel said,—

“He must say he had been astonished. Was the honorable gentleman not aware that the Bill which was passed through Parliament to give them free institutions was framed, except in one particular, by Governor Grey himself, and that it was to him that the colonists were indebted for the Constitution which Parliament had granted them?”

The one exception was this: The Premier, who was then Governor, wished that the Legislative Council should contain this elective element, and the Conservative party objected. The honorable member for Cheviot talks of Liberalism, and the views of Liberalism which he has held for thirty-seven years. I have shown acts of the Premier—acted twenty-seven years ago—in which the true instincts of Liberalism, which he then professed and which he now professes, were attempted to be brought into the actual every-day operations of his career as a Governor of the colony. Sir, we have heard over and over again in this debate of the autocracy of the Premier. In fact, the only charge that has been made, that I have heard, in relation to the constitution of the Government, has been levelled at the Premier himself. He is the blot. The others are very slow, but they are respectable. The Premier is the blot—he is autocratic. When you ask for specific charges, you are told, "Oh! his whole education has led him so that he cannot now get out of it." The very words of Mr. Adderley appear to have been treasured up by these gentlemen, and are now, twenty-seven years after their utterance, adopted as their own. What specific act of autocracy has been charged against the Premier? We have heard of the Luckie appointment; yet the country is aware that the Premier stood alone, and that the Cabinet was on the eve of disruption because the Premier would not give way to the autocratic will of one of his colleagues. We know it was not his act; we know the act was unjustifiable per se; we know that no Ministry have a right to take any man, whether he is a member of the Civil Service or not, and put him into a higher-salaried office, when that salary has not been appropriated by Parliament; we know all that: yet was the Premier wrong in resisting that? Will honorable members say that he ought to have carried his idea of the wrong to the extent of breaking up his party, and giving up those hopes which his followers cherished of seeing a Liberal party gradually formed, knowing that his party recognized the honorable member for Rangitikei as one of the brightest ornaments of the Liberal party? I say, No, Sir. What other autocratic act have we had recorded of him? I venture to say—what I have said elsewhere—that it has been in consequence of the Premier's dread of these repeated attacks—of these repeated charges of autocracy—that the Government has not been so united and firm as we might have expected it to have been. If the Premier had taken his position more firmly as Premier, and had put before his colleagues the policy which he had enunciated when in opposition, instead of bringing down what I confess I thought was rather a milk-and-watery policy the first year after he came into office, these causes of disunion would not have arisen. Men would not have grown independent in their own departments, administering departments more at their own will than as the united act of a united Cabinet. There is much to be said to lead us to believe that it has been the Premier's want of autocracy in his own Cabinet more than anything else which has exposed the Government to the charges that are now being brought against it. The actual act of autocracy which has been charged against the Premier I need have no delicacy, I think, in more closely alluding to. I mean the unfortunate resignation of the late Colonial Treasurer. The Opposition have chosen to take up statements which have appeared in the Press—which they have no warrant for; and upon those statements and charges have based their whole description of the "scene," as they choose to call it, which has disgraced the colony, as they say—of a Premier squabbling with his Treasurer. Now, there were only three parties to that episode—the Premier, the Native Minister, and the Treasurer himself.

An Hon. MEMBER.—The messenger.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—I quite recognize that the honorable member for Egmont, who once held the position of Premier in this colony, has not scrupled to tamper even with messengers to get any scandal or slander he could rake up against his political opponents. Sir, I doubt the existence of that messenger, and I believe that that messenger would have been as honorable as the honorable member himself, and would not have run away to any newspaper office to detail a Ministerial scandal. The fact remains that there are no evidences of the cause which led to the resignation of the Treasurer, beyond that there was a disagreement, as there always must be, more or less. Although many of us have been inclined to blame the late Colonial Treasurer for hastily, as we think, endangering the party which had loyally supported him, which looked to him with hope, and which is still prepared to support him, yet I say that acts done honestly—even if they are rash—will not prevent us from supporting that honorable member, from supporting the Premier, from supporting any one, be he young or old, who will honestly advocate liberal views. It is expected, I believe, by many honorable members who have thrown in their weight with the Opposition, that the result of this division, if carried against the Government, will be a coalition, under which the character of the Ministry will be preserved, and the Premier, and perhaps one or two of his colleagues, will be ejected from office. Now, I believe that we are so far true to our endeavour to form a Liberal party in New Zealand, and gradually to attract from the ranks of the Opposition those who hold similar views, that we, as one man, shall be prepared to stand together. I believe there is not a Minister on the benches or a follower in the ranks who will have anything to do with a coalition Ministry at the present time. Any one who did so would in a great measure destroy the efforts of four or five years, which have now culminated in giving us apparently a majority in this House, and which must, if persevered in, give us a succession of leaders holding liberal views, who will for many years to come have the destinies of this country in their hands. As an Opposition even, if we should be unsuccessful in this division, united, compact, honest, full of hope, we cannot be despised; and I think that within a very short time the new Ministry, formed of those capable men whom we see opposite to us, will find themselves back on the benches which they at present occupy. Sir, for my own part I would gladly welcome a short term in opposition, for I think that those who have joined our ranks of late have not weighed within themselves the necessity for that intense earnestness in our work which a period in opposition would give us. I think that a short time in opposition—I would not mind a year or two myself—would bring together, organize, and give cohesion to such a Liberal party in New Zealand as could never be upset again. But still, as it is, I have hope that we shall learn even by the risk we are running—that we shall, though our acts are not perfect, of course, still see honorable members, who are now opposite to us, but who hold the views that we hold, gradually attracted to us, anxious to serve with us, and, not the least, rewarding us by at last recognizing that there can be some honesty even in the Liberal party. The Constitutionalists can have it all their own way. A Constitutional party has existed before in New Zealand. The leader of the Opposition, when sitting on the Ministerial benches, found himself opposed to a party led by Mr. Vogel, who called themselves the Constitutional party. Mr. Hall, then Postmaster-General, stated that Mr. Vogel had called his Opposition the Constitutional party, taking the very name which the honorable gentleman and his followers adopt now. Honorable gentlemen may say “No,” but the leader of the Opposition told us the other night that the struggle was between personal power and those who attached themselves to constitutional government. The honorable member for Geraldine again and again told his constituents on the hustings that the struggle was between the Constitutional party and the so-called Liberals, and the leader of the Opposition used the same term the other night. Well, he found himself in 1868 opposed by the so-called Constitutional party of Mr. Vogel. But, said Mr. Hall,—

“He [Mr. Vogel] called the Opposition the ‘Constitutional party;’ but ‘Constitutional party’ may mean anything or nothing, which is what is required. I would suggest, from modern American history, other names—for example, ‘Copperhead party,’ or ‘Know-nothing party.’”

Sir, the Constitutional party of to-day may mean anything or nothing. Constitutional it is, designed speciously to attract all waverers and discontented persons who have grievances against the Ministry. The honorable gentleman is happy in his elocution. He gives us words which we could not use more appropriately against him if we had selected them ourselves. I have one opinion of the honorable gentleman, given by a paper which has risen to be the leading paper in our colonial history—the Lyttelton Times—an opinion given many years ago, at a time when, in Canterbury, he was, as has been pointed out, disappointing the hopes of the West Coast which had been entertained of him. The Lyttelton Times then said, “When our friend is out of office all is gloom, disaster, and impending ruin, but when he slips back again the sun of Britain’s prosperity gilds every corner of the earth.” I think the cause of the honorable gentleman’s gloom is, that he has been wearying in the Legislative Council; but we are all glad to see him reinstated in health and strength. We are glad to see him again in the ranks of active politicians: but I am afraid that the characteristics of years ago will be repeated again; for, if we should see him on the Government benches again, I fear that we should find the old feelings predominant. We should hear him say, “The ballot is a mistake; property is not respected. Let us alone.” And his Treasurer would chime in, “Give us political rest.” I hope, even if it should be for our own good as a party, that the honorable gentleman will not slip in again. I could not frame words tonight to sufficiently express the opinion I feel in regard to the jealousy which these reforms give rise to. I need only refer to the land question in proof of that. I ought also to have said how unfair is the charge made against us that we are opposed to local self-government. What has been our struggle? If the honorable member for Dunedin City will read the history of the last few years, he will find that the object of our struggles has been to give local government to the various outlying districts. I am one of those who despair of honest government being possible in this Parliament so long as a bridge can be used as a bait, or so long as a member can make his allegiance to any Government conditional upon particular works being carried out. That speaks of a state of things in which honest government is impossible; and we have always preached that—none more eloquently than the Minister for Public Works. What nonsense it is, therefore, to talk about the Governor’s Speech not containing reference to this or that policy! The Governor’s Speech is merely one exposition of the policy of the Government. It is in the Statement of the Minister for Public Works that proposals referring to works in particular districts are, and ought to be, found. It is useless for any honorable member to come to this House with the intention of being true to a party, if the element of roads and bridges is to be allowed to interfere with our conception of what the policy and conduct of statesmen should be. Until now we have never had a chance of obtaining a majority in this House. I hold that it would have been better for the Government to have brought down some complete scheme of local government upon the Canadian or the Californian system, and then a redistribution of seats upon the basis of population; but some have thought that it would be impossible to carry such a measure at all, and that we should have been forced to admit such a representation of property as would be disastrous to the people. Country members particularly have to face this difficulty. They are not opposed to redistribution. The country districts say, “We are as liberal as the towns. Simplify your Parliament so that the Parliament shall have nothing to do but to preserve public rights and public liberties; and then we don’t care about the towns: but if you throw in your weight to build up the power of the towns by making population the basis of representation, so long as the Ministry is in the position of doling out support to lukewarm supporters, how can we feel but that we are being left in the lurch?” I hope the House will deal satisfactorily with this question; but, while it is left to individual members to bring back the spoil of the session, honest government is impossible, so great is the temptation to bribe on all sides of the House. As to the great principles that are at stake, we need not say anything of them to-night. They have been fully expressed on the hustings. The people hope to see free-trade everywhere—they hope to see free-trade in land, they hope to see the incidence of taxation improved, they hope to see abolished that iniquitous system under which the boroughs receive subsidies according to the rateable value of the property within their bounds, and they want to see a state of things in which it will be impossible for a Ministry to speak about an income- and property-tax, or an increase in Customs revenue, while the country is giving 10s. in the pound on the rateable value of property in districts. This farce of subsidies must be put an end to. The people are not much longer to be cajoled with gifts of their own money, with additional charges for collection. We must have a system which will confer a responsibility upon those who raise the money. So long as local districts receive gifts, they not having the responsibility of raising the money, we can only look for these continued scrambles, and we may be sure that we are only laying up for a time of retribution when that responsibility of which I speak must come. I wish to add that I am glad to see such men as the honorable member for Hokitika (Mr. Seddon) come amongst us. If such men as he will only express their thoughts in the same earnest manner as he has done to-night, I can only say from my experience that they will always be listened to, and will reflect credit upon the constituencies which returned them to this House.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

First Reading—Local Industries—Sydney Exhibition Handbook—Public Trust Office—Address in Reply—Native Affairs.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Administration Bill.

LOCAL INDUSTRIES.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN asked the Hon. the Colonial Secretary, If it is the intention of the Government to introduce, this session, any measures for the protection of manufactures and local industries? He would like to state his reasons for asking this question, as he believed a protective policy was an actual necessity for the prosperity of this country—

The Hon. the SPEAKER said the honorable gentleman was not in order in introducing matter of a debatable kind in putting a question.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN said he had been informed that he could state his reasons, but, as he now found it was contrary to the rule of the Council, he would simply ask the question standing in his name.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said the subject had already been indicated in His Excellency's Speech, where it was said that it would be referred to a Select Committee for the purpose of deciding whether or not it would be desirable to offer the inducement referred to.

The Hon. Mr. ROBINSON would be glad if the Hon. the Speaker would explain to what extent a member might go in asking a question.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said it was a universal rule in asking questions that honorable members should avoid introducing matter of a debatable kind. It was competent for an honorable member to give reasons why he asked a question, in order to make it clearer; but it was against all parliamentary usage to introduce debatable matter in the course of his observations. It was very desirable that this rule should be strictly maintained.

SYDNEY EXHIBITION HANDBOOK.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL asked, Whether the Government would direct that copies of "The New Zealand Handbook," prepared for the Sydney Exhibition, should be distributed to members of both Houses of Parliament?

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE agreed to the proposal with great pleasure. It was the intention of the Government to have done so, and he was rather surprised that the actual authority had not reached the proper department, because it had been decided that copies of the work should be distributed amongst members of both branches of the Legislature.

PUBLIC TRUST OFFICE.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES, in moving the motion standing in his name, said his object in moving in this matter was to ascertain how far the Public Trust Act had been taken advantage of by the public. He took a great interest in the passing of this Bill, feeling that it was calculated to meet a want that was peculiarly felt in this colony, owing to numbers of persons residing here requiring the aid of a trustee, and having, perhaps, few friends in whose hands they could place their property. At that time, and now, he considered that this Act, if carried out as it should be, would be a great boon to the public. It was a well-known fact that one of the great difficulties experienced by parties leaving the colony for a time, or about to make a final exit from the world, was the obtaining the services of suitable parties to represent them. Then, on the other hand, he looked upon it as a most onerous duty, that of taking charge of a large estate, perhaps, and frequently without any remuneration whatever for duties the performance of which, under ordinary circumstances, would cost a large sum of money. He looked upon this as a heavy tax upon friendship, not only on account of the difficulty of performing those duties aright, but also in the risks attending the performance of them. They had a recent instance in the case of the City of Glasgow Bank, where trustees were found to be personally liable for the calls made upon shares held by them as trustees for some estate in which they had no interest whatever; and many were ruined in consequence. There was another risk, and that was in consequence of incompetent trustees taking charge of property. Besides, there was a probability of the trustees either leaving the colony or dying. He himself had appointed several trustees in his time, and already two of them, younger than himself, were in their graves. It was highly desirable that the existence of this Public Trust Office should be more widely known, and that the benefits of it to the public should be better understood. It was quite possible that estates might be mismanaged, and it was also possible that the parties mismanaging these estates might not be themselves in a position to be responsible for their own acts. In the case of the Public Trust Office, those leaving property had the Government of the country to fall back upon—the Government was responsible for the Trustee. And another great advantage was that the office was perpetual, and one set of trustees would succeed another, and there could be no estate without a proper representative. He hoped that the return which had been laid on the table would contain full particulars of what had been done under this Act, and that the latter part of his motion would be complied with.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That there be laid on the table the yearly return of the Public Trust Office, as provided by section 42 of the Act, with an analysis of the working of the Act from 1872 to 30th June last."—(Hon. Mr. Holmes.)

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said the honorable gentleman who made this motion was not perhaps aware that the accounts required by law had been laid on the table of the House on Tuesday last. An "analysis of the working of the Act from 1872 to 30th June last" was now asked for. The honorable gentleman would see that it would be exceedingly difficult to compile such an analysis, without further information as to what he wanted. If the honorable gentleman would wait upon himself (Colonel Whitmore) or the Public Trustee, any analysis he desired would be prepared and laid on the table in the ordinary form. With regard to the general remarks made by the mover of this resolution, he (Colonel Whitmore) did not think it was necessary at present to enter into the general subject of the desirability or advantage of the Public Trust Office. He would only say this: that, as far as it had come within his knowledge, the very greatest possible attention was paid by the officers of that department to the proper care and management of estates within their control, and that very considerable advantage had arisen in many instances from the existence of such an office. It had been, and was still, in contemplation to transfer to that department some other offices of trust, which might be more economically and advantageously combined with the office of the Public Trustee. He thought the honorable gentleman would understand, from what he had said, that he (Colonel Whitmore) was very willing to meet him in any direction in which he wished to obtain further information and make the advantages of this office fully known.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE was very glad that his honorable friend Mr. Holmes had brought this subject forward; although, at the same time, as he had scarcely anticipated that there would be any debate upon it that afternoon, he had not taken an opportunity of looking so fully into the question as he should have liked. He still adhered to the opinion he expressed when the Bill was first introduced—namely, that in passing a measure of this kind they were going beyond the legitimate functions of Government; and nothing had since occurred to shake the opinion he then expressed. So far as a public trustee was required for the Government, he thought such an office was desirable; but the Government had no right whatever to appoint an officer to act as trustee for private individuals. When the honorable member referred to the advantage which persons would have when going to England, he knew that the Public Trustee would be the last person he would appoint; and as to his acting for private estates in other capacities, the result of his (Mr. Waterhouse's) observation did not appear to agree with that of his honorable friend. He had seen statements which led him to believe that the advantage was no greater than when estates were left to the management of private individuals; and the expenses were in some cases larger. There was one reason adduced in favour of the appointment of a public trustee some years ago, and that was that, under the then existing law, private persons appointed executors could not receive remuneration, and consequently private friends were not likely to perform responsible duties without adequate remuneration. That law had since been altered, and now it was competent for a Judge of the Supreme Court to grant such remuneration as was fair and reasonable. His honorable friend had referred to the City of Glasgow Bank as affording an illustration of the advantage of having such an officer. No illustration could have been more unfortunate for the argument of the honorable gentleman. If there had been a public trustee in England, the Government of England would have been responsible in that matter. If the Public Trustee appeared on the register of any list of shareholders, insurance company, or bank, not the estate only, but the Government of the colony, would be responsible. That was a position which he did not think the Government ought to take up. He hoped honorable members would devote to this question, when they had seen this return, the consideration it really deserved, and that they would ask themselves whether, in the amended state of the law, the same necessity for the appointment of a public trustee existed now as formerly; and whether, on its own merits, it was desirable that such an office should be maintained.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES, in reply, had no further remarks to make on the subject. All he wanted was to get a return, having an idea that this office was of great advantage to the public. He hoped it might be taken advantage of by a greater number of people than had taken advantage of it in the past.

Motion agreed to.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—I have the honor to inform the Council that His Excellency has been pleased to say that he will receive the Address in Reply at three o'clock to-day.

The Hon. the SPEAKER subsequently informed the Council that, accompanied by several honorable members, he had waited on His Excellency the Governor with the Address, and His Excellency had been pleased to deliver the following reply:—

"I thank you for this Address. It is a satisfaction to me to receive the assurance which it gives that all measures which may be brought before you will meet with your best and most careful consideration."

NATIVE AFFAIRS.

The Hon. Captain FRASER, in moving the motion standing in his name, said that the Native business was becoming heavier and heavier, and, as there was a Native Affairs Committee in the other House, and as Native concerns were very different from ordinary petitions, there ought, in his opinion, to be a special Committee attached to this branch of the Legislature to consider them. He had only put in the names of two of the Maori members, but, as that would appear invidious, he desired to amend his motion by including the names of the three Maori members of the Council, and substituting the name of the Hon. Colonel Whitmore for that of the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell, who was so busy on other Committees.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That a Select Committee, to consist of seven members, be appointed to consider all petitions, reports, returns, and other documents relating to affairs specially affecting the Native race that may be brought before this Council, with power to call for persons and papers. The Committee to consist of the Hon. Colonel Whitmore, the Hon. Mr. Mantell, the Hon. Mr. Tairarua, the Hon. Mr. Ngata, the Hon. Mr. Kohere, the Hon. Mr. Holmes, the Hon. Mr. G. Buckley, and the mover."—(Hon. Captain Fraser.)

The Hon. Mr. G. R. JOHNSON thought nothing had been said to show that the Native petitions, which were at present referred to the Petitions Committee, were so numerous that the Petitions Committee itself had not time to attend to them. Having served upon the Petitions Committee for a course of years, he might say that the Committee itself was not overburdened with work. Again, as to the constitution of that Committee, the Hon. Mr. Mantell had declined to serve upon it, and he did not understand the Hon. Captain Fraser to say that he was willing to serve on this Committee. He did not think there was any case made out for the appointment of so large a Committee as this. The Hon. Captain Fraser stated that none of the Native members of the Council were on the Petitions Committee.

The Hon. Captain FRASER wished to correct the honorable member. What he said was, that in the other branch of the Legislature none of the Maori members were on the Public Petitions Committee.

The Hon. Mr. G. R. JOHNSON had misunderstood the honorable member. He would merely now propose that the Committee be appointed by ballot, in the same manner as the Petitions Committee had been appointed.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE said the only thought that struck him in this matter was, that neither the Hon. Mr. Holmes, the Hon. Mr. G. Buckley, nor the Hon. Captain Fraser knew anything about Native affairs; and that was the only objection he could see to their names being on this Committee. It was necessary that there should be on that Committee honorable members who knew something about Native matters, otherwise its members would be guided by principles of abstract justice. What was required on this Committee was men who understood the complex questions coming before them, and who would be guided by their common sense only.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES said that, before this Committee was proposed, he raised the objection with regard to himself that he knew nothing whatever concerning Maori questions, and that therefore he thought himself incompetent for the position. But he was told that this was the very best reason why he should be on such a Committee, as he would deal with matters entirely on their merits, and free from any bias. Upon that understanding he allowed his name to be included in the Committee.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE thought that, as the Committee was going to be elected by ballot, it was unnecessary to make any particular remarks about the competency of any particular gentlemen; but he wished to add his evidence to this fact: that, in Native affairs, it was highly desirable there should be a very fair leaven of gentlemen who were not at all mixed up with them, and who, he believed, would give a very impartial verdict. While the Committee should contain the names of gentlemen who were acquainted with the European and Maori sides of any question, he thought it should also include some honorable gentlemen who, while they knew little or nothing of Native matters, had sufficient common sense, knowledge of business, and the fair-play of Englishmen, to place them above the suspicion of bias. In exercising his privilege of ballot, he would endeavour so to arrange his list of names that it would present all elements which were calculated to make a good Committee. He thought it desirable there should be a separate Committee on Native petitions. The Natives every day were taking a larger interest in politics, and a greater share in them; and, if they found that their petitions were considered in Parliament, he thought that would have a civilizing influence upon them, and would prevent them taking the law into their own hands as they had done in the past.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT felt inclined to agree to the ballot; but he objected to the three Maori members being on the Committee. The quorum of the Committee would be five, and, if that number only attended, and the three Maori members were present, the Maori side would have the preponderance of representation on the Committee. It would not be right or just to have it so. He dissented from the proposal.

The Hon. Captain FRASER, in reply, had not the slightest objection to the ballot, so long as the Committee was formed. With respect to the observation of the Hon. Colonel Brett as to the three Maori members being on the Committee, it would be invidious to leave out the name of any Maori member. With regard to the observations of the Hon. Dr. Grace as to his (the Hon. Captain Fraser's) knowing nothing about Native affairs, the honorable member would find that the Natives on the east and west coasts of the North Island, and all the Natives of the South, had considerable confidence in his sense of justice. His object was to get this Committee appointed.

A ballot was taken, and it resulted in the appointment of the following gentlemen as members of the Committee: The Hon. Mr. Ngatata, the Hon. Mr. Taiaroa, the Hon. Mr. Mantell, the Hon. Mr. Holmes, the Hon. Mr. G. Buckley, the Hon. Mr. Kohere, the Hon. Colonel Whitmore, and the Hon. Captain Fraser.

The Council adjourned at three minutes past four o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, 3rd October, 1879.

FIRST READINGS.

Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt Bill, Debtors and Creditors Act Amendment Bill.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BROWN asked leave to put a question without notice. He wished to ask the Postmaster-General, if the Government steamer "Luna" had the San Francisco mail on board when she left Wellington on the 31st August, 1872, as stated on the previous day by the honorable member for Selwyn?

Mr. HALL.—I wish to call attention to the fact that the statement in the proposed question is not correct. I did not say she went on the 31st August. I did not state any date.

Mr. BROWN.—The honorable member did not mention dates, but the "Luna" left on that date.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Selwyn denies that he made the statement, and the House will of course accept his denial.

Hon. Colonel Brett

Mr. BROWN.—I am quite satisfied with his withdrawal.

Mr. HALL.—I will not condescend to a personal altercation in this matter; but I appeal to honorable members to say whether I have made any withdrawal of the statement I made yesterday.

Mr. BROWN.—Then I will ask the question in this form: Whether the Government steamer "Luna" had the San Francisco mail on board when she left Wellington on the 31st August, 1872?

Mr. J. T. FISHER said that on the occasion of the "Luna" sailing south on the 31st August, 1872, she did not convey the southern portion of the inward San Francisco mails, which reached Auckland by the "Nevada" on the 28th August. The "Luna" sailed from Wellington for Port Chalmers direct for the purpose of bringing up the outward mails for transmission via San Francisco. She left Port Chalmers on the 2nd September, and delivered the mails at the Manukau by way of intermediate ports on the 7th, connecting with the "Nevada." The "Nevada's" inward mails from San Francisco—the steamer having been quarantined at Auckland—were conveyed from the Manukau to Wellington by the "Wellington," and the southern portion transhipped to the "Rangitoto," which sailed for Lyttelton on the 1st September, the day after the "Luna" had sailed for Port Chalmers.

THAMES NATIVES.

Mr. WHYTE asked the Government, Whether they are aware that the navigation on the Thames River has been stopped by the Natives; and, if so, what steps they intend to take, if any, to keep open that important highway of communication? He put the question because he had heard on good authority that the navigation of steamers in the Thames River had been stopped.

Sir G. GREY replied that the Native Minister would state all the facts of the case when he addressed the House presently.

WASTE LANDS BOARDS.

Mr. HUTCHISON asked the Government, Whether it is their intention, in connection with their proposed land legislation, to introduce a measure of reform in the Waste Lands Boards of the colony; and, if so, will the Minister of Lands indicate the direction in which such reform will shape itself?

Mr. THOMSON replied that suggestions as to reforms in the Land Board system had been made to the Government by several members of the House. The Government had had the matter under consideration, and he hoped to be able, on the occasion of the second reading of the Land Bill which he had introduced, to state the views of the Government on the subject.

GOVERNMENT STEAMERS.

Mr. HUTCHISON asked the Government, If they will be prepared to call for tenders for the repairs of the Government steamers, as for other public works and repairs? He might be allowed to explain that there were several tradesmen in Wellington quite capable of doing any work of the kind referred to in the question, and it would only be fair on the part of the Government to those tradesmen that work of this kind should be let by public tender, the same as any other work.

Sir G. GREY agreed with the remarks of the honorable gentleman; and in all possible cases tenders would be called for. It sometimes happened that a particular work was required to be done in a great hurry; but, in all cases where possible, tenders would be invited.

BALLAST-TRAIN EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. STEVENS asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether there is any foundation for statements made that a number of men have been dismissed from their employment on the ballast-train on the Canterbury section of the New Zealand railways, and that prison labour has since been employed on that duty?

Mr. MACANDREW replied that some days ago he had received a communication from a number of working-men in Christchurch, complaining that the employment of prisoners had been interfering with their labour. On inquiry the Commissioner of Railways had wired to him as follows:—

“Employment in ditching, stonebreaking, and weeding on the railway has been given to the prisoners in Addington Gaol. The gaoler represented that he had no work for his hard-labour men, and would be glad if employment could be provided for them within a mile radius of the gaol. Works have been done by them for which no funds were available, and which would not have been executed had the chance of employing prison labour not presented itself. Thirty is the maximum number of men employed.”

He would like to be allowed to state that this reply was in answer to an inquiry he had made some two or three days ago. He would make still further inquiries with special reference to the honorable gentleman's question, and would communicate the result of those inquiries.

CUSTOMS AND LAND REVENUE.

Mr. McLEAN asked the Colonial Treasurer, If he will lay before this House a statement showing receipts from Customs revenue for quarter ending 30th September, 1879; also receipts from land revenue for same period?

Sir G. GREY replied that he had the return which the honorable gentleman asked for, and it would be laid on the table. He would simply observe that, the returns from several ports having been sent in by telegraph, it was possible that some slight inaccuracies might have taken place, but they must be very slight indeed.

SOUTHLAND CROWN LANDS.

Mr. BAIN asked the Minister of Lands, Whether the report of Mr. Pearson, Chief Commissioner of Crown Lands for Southland, in the appendix to the report of the Secretary of Crown Lands, is a full copy of the original report; and, if not, whether he will have any objection to lay the complete report before this House?

Mr. THOMSON replied that Mr. Pearson's report, in the appendix to the report of the Secretary of Crown Lands, was a full copy of the original report. Mr. Pearson had, however, sent in a report to the department regarding the success of the deferred-payment system in the Southland District. He understood that that was the report referred to in the question, and he hoped to be able to lay a copy of it on the table next sitting-day.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

Mr. SWANSON asked the Government, What steps (if any) they intend taking to enforce compliance with clause 23 of the Conditions in Government contracts? He might explain that this was the clause in the contract-bond which provided that the workmen should be paid once a fortnight; and for every practical purpose it had remained a dead-letter. He desired to know what the Government intended to do in the matter.

Mr. MACANDREW said it was quite true that clause 23 provided for the payment of workmen once a fortnight. It also provided that, if the contractor committed or allowed any breach of this clause, he subjected himself to a penalty of £50, to be recovered without process of law. That penalty might be deducted from any moneys due to the contractor. It was, therefore, only necessary to notify to the contractor that the provisions of this clause would be rigidly enforced for the future, to insure compliance therewith. He intended to give such notification. He might state that no complaint had been made as to the infringement of this clause hitherto. Had such a complaint been made the Government would have seen that the provisions of the clause were strictly carried out.

Mr. SWANSON could assure the honorable gentleman that great complaints had been made about this matter.

Mr. MACANDREW said that if persons made their complaints to the Government they would find that the grievance would be remedied. If the workmen were not paid in accordance with the provisions of this clause, they had only to represent the matter to the proper authorities, when immediate action would be taken by the Government.

CIVIL SERVICE APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. BOWEN asked the Premier, If he will lay before this House a return of all persons appointed since the prorogation of the late Parliament to any paid office or position of emolument under Government; stating in each case the nature of the office, whether temporary or permanent, and the emolument attached to it?

Sir G. GREY said the return asked for by the honorable gentleman would be furnished if he really desired it; but he was afraid it would give a considerable amount of trouble. It would refer to persons employed on the railways, and they were varying from day to day. If a return were asked for without reference to the employés in the Railway Department, it could be furnished almost immediately.

Mr. BOWEN said, if the return gave those persons permanently employed on the railways it would be sufficient.

Sir G. GREY said it would take some time to furnish the return.

SIR JULIUS VOGEL.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Government, If Sir Julius Vogel applied to them for leave to stand for the representation of an English constituency in the House of Commons; if so, was such permission refused, and why; and if the Government will cause any papers and information they have upon the subject to be laid before this House? As so many rumours were current about this matter, he should be glad if the Government would give an authoritative statement regarding it.

Sir G. GREY said the Government had not received any application from Sir Julius Vogel for leave to stand for an English constituency; but the Government, hearing that Sir Julius Vogel was about to stand for an English constituency, had telegraphed to him their opinion, which was that the Agent-General ought not to be allowed to be a member of the British Parliament. They came to this conclusion because they thought that his taking such a position would distract his mind from his other duties, and would be lending the weight of his office, which was considerable in England, to a particular party in Great Britain; that it was not desirable that the colony should be involved by any such officer entering into British politics or the politics of any other country; that upon the whole the Government thought it better that the Agent-General for New Zealand should not be in Parliament; and they could not give their consent to a member of Parliament holding the office of Agent-General. That was the only paper that passed on the subject, and it contained what he had just stated to the House.

Mr. MURRAY asked if the honorable gentleman would lay the document on the table of the House.

Sir G. GREY said the telegram contained in a shorter form exactly what he had stated. The purport of it was, that the Government could not approve of its Agent-General being a member of the House of Commons.

NGARUAWAHIA SUBURBAN LANDS.

Mr. WHITAKER asked the Minister of Lands, What steps (if any) have been taken to open up the suburban allotments in the vicinity of the Township of Ngaruawahia; and what length of time will probably elapse before such steps may be expected to produce the desired result? He had been induced to put this question in consequence of the reply given to a question he had put on a previous day.

Mr. THOMSON replied that the matter had been referred to the Native Department, in order to ascertain what blocks had been promised to the Natives. As soon as that information had been obtained the land in question would be opened to the public.

Sir G. Grey

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.

Mr. ANDREWS asked the Minister for Public Works, If all the employes on the Government railways are treated in a uniform manner as regards hours of work and rates of pay; if a uniform working-day exists, of eight hours; if any exception exists, and to whom does it apply; if a uniform rate of pay exists for similar services given; if there is any fixed rule for the payment for overtime, and, if so, what that rule is, and is it observed in all cases?

Mr. MACANDREW wished to lay on the table a copy of the regulations, which he had only just received. He would examine the document, and then lay it on the table. He thought that would be the best answer to the question. A good deal of misapprehension seemed to exist on this subject, and it was desirable that the actual regulations themselves should be published. That would remove all misapprehension.

JURY LAWS.

Mr. HUTCHISON asked the Government, Whether they intend to introduce a further reform in the jury laws, more especially (1) by the abolition of the Grand Jury system, (2) by an improvement of the Coroner's inquest by jury, and (3) by an increase of the payment to common jurors?

Sir G. GREY replied that the whole of the points referred to by the honorable gentleman were under the consideration of the Government, and a Bill was being prepared to give effect to some of them.

WARDEN FOR WAIRARAPA.

Mr. SEDDON asked the Minister of Justice, If it is the intention of the Government to open a Warden's office and appoint a Warden for the Wairarapa District? He might state that, from reliable information received, there was likely to be a valuable gold field opened up in the Wairarapa District.

Mr. GISBORNE replied that as soon as the land had been proclaimed a gold field under the Mining Act arrangements would be made to appoint proper officers to receive applications for mining claims connected with the gold field. It would be unadvisable to proclaim the land a gold field until they had received some well-ascertained information that the district was probably auriferous. Mr. Cox, the Assistant Geologist, would proceed next day to the district, in order to report upon the matter.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Mr. BOWEN.—Sir, when an honorable gentleman, in addressing the House on an important question like this, begins by endeavouring to create a prejudice against his opponents, on the ground that they reside in a particular district or belong to a particular class of persons, I think it is a distinct sign of weakness. Therefore the attack made upon the leader of the Opposition last night by the honorable member for Mount Ida, on the ground that he is a Canterbury man—a man belonging to a particular province—very considerably weakened the cause which he attempted to advocate. If he believed in popular government, in the representation of distinct principles by gentlemen who are trusted by the people, then he had no right whatever to throw out any such insinuations against my honorable friend as he did. The honorable member for Selwyn has been returned by a large constituency, where there was every attempt made by the Government party to get some one to oppose him from outside, but they were unable to do so. And I can say this: that there is scarcely a constituency in the whole Province of Canterbury, where the honorable gentleman has been so well known for more than a quarter of a century, which would not have returned him with acclamation. When this is the case, I think it is perfectly absurd for men who pretend to advocate popular views, and to advocate that principles should be represented by men who are the representatives of the people, to attempt to prejudice the House against a gentleman who can get such support from the people who have known him thoroughly for a long time. He is not only known to the people of Canterbury, but he is known to all the people of the colony; and I will undertake to say that, from one end of the colony to the other, and in every province throughout the colony, it was learned with satisfaction that my honorable friend again represents a constituency in this Assembly, and has been chosen to lead one of the parties in the House. I shall not dwell upon the attempt to fasten odium upon the Canterbury members. They have been very unwilling to have themselves or their affairs dragged constantly before the House as they have been for some time past—for Goodness knows what reasons. But the honorable gentleman must be aware that there have been the grossest misrepresentations as to the actions of the Canterbury members, especially with regard to the land laws of that province, for the last five years. I am not going to weary the House with the story of the Canterbury land laws; but I will say this, that they were founded upon the soundest and most liberal principles, and that they are the only laws which have really and truly settled the people upon the land: for it will be seen that, according to the census returns, there are more yeomen—more men who are cultivating and owning land themselves—in Canterbury than in any other part of New Zealand; and this is entirely owing to the Canterbury land laws. But it is true that there was a large portion of Canterbury which, in the early days, was excluded from the operation of the Canterbury land laws; and that in that part of the country large properties have been created, which might have been better divided among a larger number of people, and, consequently, held in smaller allotments; but the entire fault of this lies with the honorable gentleman who is now at the head of the Government. The honorable member for Mount Ida very ingeniously and very insidiously tried to mix up the request of certain inhabitants of Canterbury in 1852 with the transaction which took place in 1853, when the Premier issued his celebrated Proclamation.

In 1852 some Canterbury people endeavoured to get the block extended which they held under the rules of the Canterbury Association; but certainly this had nothing to do with the issue of a Proclamation in 1853 by the honorable gentleman now at the head of the Government. It will be remembered that in 1853 the new Constitution was proclaimed; and, if there was one thing in that Constitution at which the people of New Zealand rejoiced, it was at the fact that, for the first time in the history of the colonies of England, the whole control of the waste lands was handed over to the people of the country in which the lands were situated. But what was the conduct of the Governor of that time? He stepped in between the passing of the Act and the time when it was proclaimed, and took the opportunity of legislating himself, without reference to the voice of the people, in such a manner as to give away the waste lands of the Crown, with the result that the land passed into the hands of monopolists. It is perfectly amazing, to any one who remembers the circumstances under which that was done, to see that honorable gentleman stand up in this House night after night, and on public platforms during the recess, day after day, hounding down the Canterbury members because of these large estates. It was he who created these estates, and no one else; and not merely without reference to the Legislature, but absolutely in spite of the protests of the people, and in spite of an injunction of the Supreme Court. There was immense disappointment felt, especially in Otago and Canterbury, when this Proclamation was issued.

Mr. MACANDREW.—Hear, hear.

Mr. BOWEN.—I am glad to hear the honorable member give that cheer, because he knows it well, and suffered in consequence. I know there was immense indignation both in Canterbury and in Otago;—an appeal was made to the Supreme Court, and in the celebrated case of Dorset v. Bell an ex parte application for an injunction to restrain the Governor's action was made to the Bench in Wellington. What did the Governor do? He refused to plead; he would have nothing to do with the Supreme Court: but nevertheless the Judge said he thought the action of the Governor was illegal, and granted an injunction. But the Governor ignored the Supreme Court, and treated it with contempt, as he has done since; and, departing from the colony, he left in operation this law, which gave away the waste lands of the Crown within five months of the meeting of the Legislature. He and he alone gave away the waste lands of the Crown, for there was precious little to give away after he had done this.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. BOWEN.—I say Yes, because, although the Legislature met shortly afterwards, everybody knows how difficult it is to raise the price of land, especially when there is very little money in the country. Now the people have their eyes open, because there is money and there are plenty of speculators; but the eyes of the country were not then open. No doubt the Governor was attracted by the popular cry in some parts of the colony to make land cheap; but he was not an enlightened Liberal fighting for the good of the people then. I may say, further, that there is a gentleman residing in this province—an old settler, a man of credibility, and well known in the country—who has declared that in a conversation with the Governor of that day His Excellency said he thought it would be advisable that a class of landed gentry should be created in this country similar to that which exists in England. Well, this is not exactly the view he has since promulgated, and it is rather amazing. I am not going to charge him with saying anything improper in those days, but I do accuse him of insincerity in attacking the Canterbury members as he does. With regard to the land regulations in Canterbury, I may say, without going into details, that the honorable member for Mount Ida is perfectly mistaken in stating that the pastoral licenses which have been given in the Canterbury Province were a scheme of the Canterbury Association. They were simply created by the necessity which arose owing to the large quantities of land lying absolutely idle and unused, and which the agent of the Association found it necessary to utilize. An arrangement was made, and the terms for occupying the lands were so fixed as to prevent anybody having a monopoly of the land. The terms were considered hard, and, indeed, they were such that very few men could take up land on pastoral license at that time. Many of those who did take up land on this system were simply ruined altogether, and those who succeeded did so in consequence of their hard work, and for a long time led a life of downright hardship, more severe than that of men who have followed any other pursuit in this colony. And now, at this time, when all this outcry is made against the pastoral settlers, I would ask, Who are they? There are very few indeed of them left, and those who are left are struggling with country that very few settlers would like to go upon. The thing is absolutely ridiculous. Talk about putting freehold settlers on a hundred acres of mountain-sides to starve! Everybody who knows the country, everybody who gives the matter the slightest thought, knows that the whole thing is a perfect farce—a mere claptrap outcry to try and get a little cheap popularity. And the proof is, that the cry does not come from Canterbury. Every possible effort has been made to teach this doctrine to the people there, but they cannot believe it. Every candidate from that part of the country for the last three years has had that question out on the hustings, and the people have indorsed the acts of their representatives. To show how little the honorable member knows about the so-called gridironing of the country, it may surprise him to hear that the very case at the Rakaia which he brought forward as an instance was a case in which an outsider gridironed a runholder's land to the extent of 1,200 acres, with a view of compelling him to sell his run. The honorable gentleman said that when the present Premier issued the Land Regulations of 1853 he did so under instructions from the Colonial Office. I give the honorable gentleman credit for believing that statement to be correct when he made it, but he is absolutely misinformed as to the circumstances of the case. The fact is, that there were no instructions to sell the land at a particular price. The case was this: By the 72nd section of the Constitution Act power was given to the Assembly to deal with the waste lands of the Crown. There was a proviso to that section. By the Constitution Act the Assembly had power to make laws for dealing with the waste lands; and the proviso was that, until this Legislature came into being, the Governor should have power to regulate the sale of waste lands under instructions under the sign manual. It was claimed that these instructions were forwarded in a despatch from Sir John Pakington, giving the Governor power to make regulations under the existing law for carrying on the land sales of the country; but there was not the least idea that the Governor was, within a few months of the opening of Parliament, to alter the whole price of the waste lands of the Crown against the interests of those who in the New Zealand Company's settlements had bought land at £1 an acre, who in Canterbury had paid £3 an acre for it, and who in Otago had paid £2 an acre for it. I said before that this action was not a liberal action; and I may say, with regard to the whole cry of liberality, so much affected just now, that what disgusts honorable members on this side of the House is the absolute imposture of the whole position taken up by the so-called Liberal party. A great deal has been said about "party lines" being drawn. I should like to know what they are. I venture to say that if you were to throw such a question as that of free-trade into your "party lines" there would at once be the utmost confusion. The honorable member for Grey and Bell, in a speech which I am sure every one in the House was glad to hear, and which was very instructive, gave us some idea of what a man who has come fresh from the great burning questions of Liberalism and Conservatism in England thinks of the cry out here. I venture to say that if even Mr. Gladstone, the leader of the Liberal party at Home, or such a man as the late Mr. John Stuart Mill, or any other of the great Liberal leaders in England, were to come out here and propound his views on the subjects now before this country, he would be hooted down as a rank Conservative by those who are ready to raise a popular cry. But a popular cry is not necessarily a Liberal cry. We have plenty of illiberal cries made popular to the people when hounded on by demagogic action. Sir, the honorable member for Mount Ida picked out a few extracts from the speech of my honorable friend the member for Selwyn, when he was in the Legislative Council, delivered in reply to one made by that distinguished leader of the Liberals the Colonial Secretary. The honorable gentleman picked out these extracts and used them without any context, and asked the House to condemn my honorable friend in consequence as a rank Tory. It is very easy to pick extracts out of a speech, and, without giving the context, ask the House to form a judgment upon them; but it is not so easy to get the House to form a judgment on such grounds. There are, no doubt, differences of opinion on this side of the House on many matters, just as there are on the other side; but one is really amazed to hear supporters of a Government which is, I suppose, about the most patchwork Government that ever sat upon those benches—and when I say “patchwork” I mean the most extraordinary mixture of ideas and opinions that has ever been got together—it is amazing, I repeat, to hear a supporter of such a Government talking about the incongruous elements of this side of the House. There may be differences of opinion amongst us—there must be differences of opinion amongst us; but I venture to say there are fewer differences of opinion amongst all the supporters of my honorable friend the member for Selwyn than there are amongst the first half-dozen gentlemen whom you may chance to pick out on the other side. We need not go back to what they said six or seven years ago, but to what they have said within the last few months, to prove this. Amongst other things we are told that triennial Parliaments is one of the leading principles of their platform. Look at the Minister of Lands. Does he believe in that principle? Why, he told us only a few months ago that he was most strongly opposed to it. I could go through many other instances of the most amazing differences of opinion amongst those honorable gentlemen, but I do not think it is at all necessary to do so, and I do not wish to take up the time of the House. It is absolutely absurd and ridiculous to talk about party lines here. The fact is, there can be no permanent party lines in a new country. Parties must be formed as circumstances arise. Parties have been formed for a time when such questions as the abolition of provinces have come before us, and this will occur again when such questions as Free-trade and Protection are before the country; but to say that there are a Liberal party and a Conservative party in a country where nothing has yet arisen to conserve is simply absurd. It is absurd for the honorable gentleman to say that hitherto Liberalism has only been in language, and that now, under the present Government, it is action. I should reverse that, and say that Liberalism has hitherto been action and now is only talk. Take, for example, the land laws of the colony. The Constitution Act gave the people power to deal with the land, and they have done so. In 1877 the most liberal land law that was ever produced in this colony, or in any of the Australian Colonies, was brought down by Mr. Donald Reid. He is not now a member of the House: I regret it, and I am sure every member of the House must regret it, for he was one of the most distinguished defenders of free and liberal land laws that ever lived in this country. When he brought down this measure, who was the strongest opponent of it? Sir, it was the Premier. He was not merely the Parliamentary opponent of it, but he was the unconstitutional opponent of it behind the scenes, and he endeavoured to burke that measure secretly because there was something in it of which he did not approve. Unfortunately, that something was a Canterbury question, which appears to be his blâc noir. He thought it his duty, after that measure had passed both branches of the Legislature, to advise the Governor to veto it, in order that he might get his own way in spite of Parliament and colleagues. And what is the most serious part of the business is, that he comes down now and says he would do it again. I wish to draw particular attention to that fact, and to ask whether we can possibly believe that an honorable gentleman understands what true constitutional government is, who, having done such an act as that, comes down here and says he would do it again. And I have no doubt he would. To those honorable gentlemen who say that nothing very serious has been brought against the Government, I would say, Let them consider those words—that in cold blood, after mature consideration, after full discussion, when his own party have condemned him, when every person has agreed that his act was most unconstitutional, the honorable gentleman says, “I would do it again.” The fact of the matter is, it is only of a piece with the utter contempt for the control of Parliament which this Government have shown throughout. If honorable gentlemen ask, “What have the Government done to be turned out of office?” I say, Such an act as that, in defiance of the will of Parliament, would be in any other country sufficient to unseat them. But that is not the only occasion on which the honorable gentleman who has declaimed so loudly about Liberalism has led his Government to defy the action of Parliament. I might go back to the story of the railways—I might cite many other instances; but I say that any one of these acts would be sufficient in any other country to unseat the Government. To speak of another—it is a small amount as compared to the amounts to which we are committed by these railway transactions; but I ask whether any Government would be allowed to sit on the Treasury benches in England for a single day, if they, without any regard to the public service, acted as this Government did with regard to Mr. Larnach's trip Home. It is announced in this House that he is going Home at his own expense; it is announced that his visit to England has nothing to do with the Public Treasury; it is announced that the colony will be put to no expense on his account; and then we hear that, without any authority or vote of this House, the Government have made him a present of £2,000. I say that was a most unconstitutional act, and deserving of the utmost reprobation. Sir, we are all agreed at the present time that there must be an amendment in the electoral laws. But what is the history of the electoral laws of New Zealand? Is it true that all these reforms proposed by the Government are now proposed for the first time? Why, Sir, there has been a continued advance in the electoral laws ever since the time when the Constitution Act was promulgated. We have had constant and frequent changes, and the measure now brought in by the Government is not much more than a consolidation of the laws passed from time to time in days gone by. It has been said by some honorable members that this new law will not add many names to the roll. I am satisfied myself that, though it will improve and simplify the rolls, it will not add to them. It will not add to the rolls, but it will put the right men upon them, and therefore do good. The rolls at present are very badly made out; but it must be remembered that all ratepayers and all lodgers can be put on the rolls. This residential franchise is an improvement and a simplification of the law, and, if it is properly introduced, it will be a great boon to the country; but there is nothing very new or particularly liberal about it. It is an improvement in machinery more than anything else. The franchise at present is so low that almost anybody can get a vote if he chooses to take the trouble. This proposed law will give men less trouble; and I hope the registration system under it will be a great deal better than is the case at present. What we want, above all things, is to enable every man who is a resident in the country, and has a real stake in the country—I do not mean a pecuniary stake, but a residential interest in the country—to have a vote. We want to avoid that great mistake made by the Americans, and to exclude aliens from the franchise; and I believe that the law as proposed will do that. Therefore I think there is a general consent in the House that that law should be passed; but I say that there is nothing particularly new or liberal about it. As to the Triennial Parliaments Bill, that is merely a question of detail on which there are differences of opinion on both sides of the House, and honorable gentlemen who call it a principle have not considered it very seriously. I myself am opposed to the Triennial Parliaments Bill. I have told my constituents so several times, and I may say that they have always agreed with me. I am opposed to it on liberal grounds. I maintain that the Triennial Parliaments Bill, if passed, will make a more serious alteration in our Constitution than honorable members realize. It will practically do away with the possibility of any sudden and unexpected appeal to the people on great subjects which are before the country, because when Parliaments are triennial the practical effect will be that they will be allowed to run out. There is another very serious alteration which will be made in the Constitution, and it is a matter which has been discussed in England. I read the other day a very able paper, written from a Liberal point of view, advocating quinquennial Parliaments in England as the best system. The writer was opposed to septennial Parliaments, but he said there was a general consensus amongst leading Liberals that triennial Parliaments would be too short, and that the quinquennial system was a very fair compromise. This was the reason he gave—and I think it is a very good one too: It has been the unwritten law and the custom in England that no Parliament should be allowed to expire by effluxion of time, because it has always been thought unadvisable that a Parliament should be allowed to expire at a time which might be inconvenient to the country. For instance, a Parliament might expire in the middle of a great war, or at a time when there was serious monetary pressure in the country, when a general election would not be advisable. Therefore it has been always considered that it is the responsibility and the duty of the Government for the time being to choose some convenient time for a dissolution of Parliament, about a year before its dissolution would be due by effluxion of time. Therefore a quinquennial Parliament, according to the unwritten law of England, would be dissolved in about four years. But, as it was pointed out, if you have a triennial Parliament you must let it run out, because it is absurd to suppose that the country would submit to all the turmoil of a general election every two years. As I said before, this is a matter of detail. It is absurd to call it a particularly liberal provision. It is a question upon which men may fairly differ on both sides of the House. For my own part I believe it would be an alteration in the Constitution which would not be for the better, and therefore I should be disposed to vote against it. But I know there is a very general feeling in the House in favour of the Triennial Parliaments Bill, and that it is not a question which divides one side of the House from the other, but rather one which divides both sides. The honorable gentleman also threw a stone at my honorable friend the leader of the Opposition on the question of education. Now it is quite true that the honorable gentleman and myself differ in opinion on that question. But, Sir, is there no difference of opinion on the other side of the House on the question? I should like to know whether all the honorable gentlemen on the Government benches agree with the Minister of Mines, who certainly has gone a great deal further than the honorable member for Selwyn in the denominational views which he advocates with regard to education. Many years ago, in the Province of Canterbury, long before the question of a national system of education was mooted, I, for one, gave up the denominational system because I found that it did not educate the people. Like many others, I was brought face to face with the fact that there were a large number of children in the colony growing up little street Arabs, absolutely uneducated, and without the means of getting any knowledge, human or divine; and I was satisfied, with many better than myself, that we must give up any feelings or ideas we had on particular denominational questions, and determine that the children of the land should be educated. And I rejoice more in having been able to take part in giving education nationally to every child in the country than about any other public matter in which I had a hand; and I shall certainly never be a party to any action which will endanger the national education of the people. There are differences of opinion on both sides of the House, and I respect, while I do not agree with, the scruples which some honorable gentlemen have on this question; but I may say that the question of national education is settled. There is nothing that will ever break it down. Year by year, as it goes on, the people are becoming determined that, whatever details may be altered, there shall be no attempt at a recurrence to a denominational system. At the present time what the country wants above all things, and the most liberal thing that could be done for the country, is to have carted away as quickly as possible these sham Bills that have been dangling before the country, not to be passed, but to be used at elections. Get them done with; get them passed; stop this dangling of them in the House, and dangling of them again on the hustings, and let us get to the business of the country—to the social legislation which is absolutely necessary for the country. Let us get to a simplification of the finance of the country; let us get to the prosecution of public works; and do not let us see the people in a country like this positively asking for bread and getting a stone; do not let us see numbers of the unemployed coming together in different parts of the country and asking for work, only to be told that the Legislature is too busy squabbling about what are called liberal measures to attend to them. I say that these measures can be settled very quickly if both sides of the House are determined to pass them. They were willing to pass them last year, and it was the Government who prevented their passing. Let us cart them out of the way, and then let us get to the work of the country. Then, Sir, there is this question of taxation. That has got to be settled; and I fail to see that there is any particular Liberalism about the proposal of the other side of the House as opposed to the proposal of this side of the House. Everybody is agreed that a great improvement can be made in the system of taxation, but I fail to see that it is a liberal proceeding to pick out a particular interest in the country, and to tax it, while the rest of the property in the country remains untaxed. It is not a liberal measure to pick out the backbone of the country—people who go upon the land—who have come out from England, as every one does, with the hope of getting on the land—and tax these people's property, and leave all the property accumulated by capitalists untaxed, because it does not happen to be land. And then I do not think that the present Land-Tax Act is a particularly liberal measure,—an Act which has overwhelmed the country with a system of valuations which are unintelligible to anybody interested in them—valuations which are unequal and unfair—valuations the principle of which I do not believe the Government themselves understand, and which are based upon fallacious attempts at a grand new system of political economy. There was plenty of talk about the principle on which the valuations were intended to be made under the Land-Tax Act when it was brought forward. I ask whether every prophecy then made on this side of the House has not been fulfilled, and more than fulfilled—whether, as was prophesied, the whole system has not been a complete failure—whether everybody is not disgusted, from one end of the country to the other, at the manner in which the land-tax is attempted to be levied. And I venture to say that the Government will be startled at the lawsuits which will arise before they finger one penny of the tax. I am quite certain the country will not be satisfied until there is a system of taxation which is equal for all. I was rather amazed at hearing the Premier, the other night, throw overboard his own statement, made in this House about two years ago, when he delivered a speech in which he maintained that every man ought to pay in proportion to his holding and his property. He described the glow of virtuous pleasure with which the poor man would throw his mite into the Treasury, and say, "As I have paid, now I can call upon the rich man to pay in proportion to his wealth," and he told us how the man who had little means would scorn to have a different tax put upon the rich man's land from the tax which was put upon his own. Now, Sir, that is all thrown overboard, and there is a new expression brought forward,—I have seen it, just as one has seen the expression "unearned increment," in many books and papers of late—that taxation should be according to the sacrifice made. When the honorable gentleman has thoroughly explained what that means—and a little more satisfactorily than "unearned increment" was explained from the Government benches last year—the House may be inclined to debate that question. But I will undertake to say that the feeling among all Englishmen is that taxation, to be fair, must be equal, and in proportion to the property of every one, and that no other taxation will be satisfactory to the country or to any man in it, whether he be rich or poor. We all hope that we shall very soon come to a division on this question, and I certainly do not wish to stand in the way. There are many other matters referred to by the honorable member for Mount Ida which might be discussed at some length, but I shall not detain the House now by alluding to them. I hope that Liberalism, in its true sense, will be the watchword of this House and of this country; but I hope that it will not be a clap-trap pretence, and that, above all, it will be a Liberalism which shall seek to level up, and not, as the Premier has attempted to do, to level down.

Mr. TAINUI.—I stand up to address this House. I am well acquainted with Mr. John Hall. I knew him when he lived at Otatau. What I am looking at is his descent from the other House to this. To my mind it seems that he looked down and wished to bring about a resurrection; but he comes to this House, I believe, to be buried. Probably, after he has been in this House some time, and sees some of his friends go to the wall in the other House, he will want to rush back there. I know him. He has been a long time in this House attempting to make laws for Europeans and Maoris, but I do not consider that during the time he has been in the several Governments he has framed any law for the benefit of the Maori. I think Sir William Fox is the proper person to lead the Opposition, although we only have his spirit here during the present session. I would like to ask the present Opposition if they are able to clear away all the grievances that have befallen the Natives. I am certain that if they gain the seats of the Ministry they will never be able to do so. I can see that the laws concerning the Maori people have been very injurious. I have not seen any measure yet that has been for their good, and I would ask that any future measures affecting the Maoris should be so framed as to place them on an equal footing with the Europeans. Do not insert in these special Bills that are brought in anything damaging to the Maoris, but let them work under the same laws. The Opposition can see that Sir George Grey is at the head of the Government; and let him adopt his own course, because I am of opinion that he will be able to remedy some of the wrongs. He may not be able to remedy them entirely, but he will do so to a certain degree, notwithstanding that the honorable member for Kaiapoi said that when Sir George Grey was Governor he made those laws for the Maoris. It seems to me that the present contest is simply one between one side and the other, and it is very hard to say which side will win. The Natives of the Middle Island think that there has been nothing done for their good so far by the present Government; but what they look to is this: that good laws connected with the lands of the Maori people are steadily progressing, and the land is their great and only treasure. That is the only thing that is left to them, and they look to it as being very important that good measures relating to their land should be brought down by the Government, so that both races might live together peaceably, and on friendly terms. When such measures are brought down, I shall express myself further upon them.

Mr. TAWHAI.—I now stand up to give expression to the thoughts which brought me here. I will speak of the ideas which have emanated from several members who have spoken during the last few nights. In the first place, I heard the amendment proposed by Mr. Hall to the effect that the House had no confidence in the present Ministry. It appears to be the usual thing, and a thing that is looked forward to by many members in this House, that one side should fight against the other. I do not see any good in that whatever. A great deal of harm is done in this kind of warfare, and this harm extends to people outside of this House. Instead of members devoting their time to the passing of measures which will benefit the country, they waste the time of the House in useless contention. It may be profitable to those who indulge in this sort of thing, but I can assure the House that it is not so to the people outside. With regard to the northern part of this Island, the people there have not yet been benefited by the Parliamentary laws. The people are still greatly injured. Now, is it a proper thing to heap harm on the people of the colony through this fighting against each other? I heard an expression from Mr. Saunders implying something against the Maori dual vote. I would ask what harm there is in giving the Maoris the dual vote or in placing their names on the electoral roll. The Maoris of New Zealand are not adventurers. They do not come from other lands. The country belonged to themselves. They inherited it from their ancestors. It was theirs, and now these lands are being brought under the operation of the Act, and the mana of the Queen is over them. I heard from Mr. De Lautour something to the effect that it was Sir William Fox who first advocated the idea that the Natives should be placed on the electoral roll. Perhaps my old friend Sir William Fox thought it would be encouraging me too much to have my name on the roll, and he afterwards repented of his first act. The Opposition are apparently of the same opinion—that I, the Maori, should not have my name on the roll. I have heard the honorable member Mr. Saunders say that certain words were used by Napoleon Bonaparte—that Bonaparte said his young recruits were food for cannon; and that the young Greyites were food for gammon. I should think it would have been better applied to the honorable gentleman himself, had any one gone over and followed him. Looking at the matter as it is, he is not in favour of the Maoris being placed on the electoral roll. That is one instance. The Opposition say that Sir George Grey is a very bad man. If so, I now say that all the Europeans are bad. The whole race are bad. The honorable member Mr. Hall, and the honorable member Mr. Bowen, were in the Government that created warfare in this Island, and it is not fair for them to blame the present Government when they themselves were responsible on former occasions. I am grateful that while I have been listening here I have not heard one bad word from any honorable member said against the Maoris. All the evils that have arisen in New Zealand have sprung up through the laws of the Europeans. Honorable members have referred to the serious troubles that have taken place in different parts of this Island, and they have named the present Government as being the origin of those troubles. But I say No. What I say is, that the real cause of these troubles is the law which provides for the Native Land Court, through which surveyors go on the land to survey, and in doing so get shot at. How is it that it never struck your people who have been in previous Governments that this Native Land Court should be eradicated? Several Europeans in the Waikato District have been shot, and have lost their lives; and also in the Ngapuhi country people have met with the same fate through the surveying system. Do not blame the Government of Sir George Grey for this thing, but blame the previous Governments. When the Electoral Bill was being discussed in this House Sir George Grey befriended the Maoris and supported the idea of the dual vote—a thing which had been encouraged by Sir William Fox in days gone by. I would not call those people my friends who are attempting to debar me from having my name on the electoral roll. It was on those grounds, principally, that my people sent me here to represent them, and to see if I could not get their names placed on that roll. They elected me so that I should stand here as the friend of Sir George Grey, as the friend of Mr. Sheehan, and of their Government. If any one should blame me for so doing, I would remind him that at least I will act as a chief should act, and will carry out what I came here to do.

Mr. TOMOANA.—Sir, I congratulate all the members of this House, in speaking to them for the first time. I offer them my best wishes and respects. This time has been allotted to us, the Maori members, to express our feelings and ideas. The reason why I stand up at the present time is because I want to inform the House what my feelings are, and also to let them learn how I am going to vote. The first thing I am going to say to you is, that I came here about the Native grievances. I did not come here to support those who were against the Maoris, but I came here to support those who were doing well for them and were working for their good. I have only a few words to say to you, especially about the words that fell from the lips of my colleague with regard to Sir George Grey not having done any harm in this Island. I feel glad at his having said so. I have seen in the Scriptures that the first sin was committed by Adam and Eve. Following up that, I will say that Sir George Grey was the first man in this Island who made laws both for Europeans and Maoris, not only about Napier, but also at the very place my honorable colleague comes from. Ngapuhi were the greatest tribe, the largest and most important tribe, in this Island of New Zealand; and who caused their downfall? Who fought against Hone Heke? Who was Waikato's antagonist? Who took Waikato and placed it in the hands of the Europeans? Now I come to the time when a new Government was searched for to conduct the affairs of the Island. At that time appeared Sir George Grey. Although the Maoris are loyal subjects, they have been for a long time crying out against the evils oppressing them through the Europeans. When the Grey Government came into power, support to them from the Maoris was general; they praised the Government of Sir George Grey. Now, up to the present time, not one promise has been made affecting the people of this Island, in all the places throughout it, that has been fulfilled. I have not many words to say, and I will not use any strong terms. I do not altogether trust in the administration of the Native Minister. I do not think he has administered Native affairs properly. I am not against the Native Minister personally, nor against the Premier. What I blame is the mismanagement they have caused with regard to Native matters. The first thing I will speak about is this: The Native Minister said to us, "If I [the Native Minister] were in the Government, I should stop all land sales. Secondly, he said, "If I get into the Government I will stop all Native Land Courts, and allow the Natives themselves to investigate questions relating to the Native lands—their own lands." On the East Coast, about Napier, and further up the East Coast, all the Maoris agreed to have a Native Parliament." They raised the question largely among the tribes, and in furtherance of their object they sent here several petitions, which I have since seen lying about uncared for. I have been very much pained at seeing these petitions lying about here in such a manner. In the present debate I feel personally sorry for the Ministry—my love is with them personally; but I cannot support them in the present question, because I have seen the laws affecting the Natives. Those laws passed referring to the Maoris have been drawn up by lawyers, and no Maori can understand them. Formerly in the Native Land Courts there were no lawyers allowed to appear; now lawyers are allowed. People who are not well off and have not plenty of money cannot cope with any lawyer in the Native Land Court—they are at a disadvantage. The consequence is that any one who has very little money, although he has a rightful claim to the land, loses it, and the land goes to the person who is able to pay the lawyers. Now, I look at the present position of affairs in this way. The leader of the Opposition is a new man to me in this House. I have never heard anything about him. I have never heard anything said against his name ever since he has been in this House, and the several Governments he has taken part in, or that he has done anything for the Maori people. There are several on the Opposition side who are large landholders, and are opposed to me; but, as I have already said, the leader of the Opposition is a new man to me. That is why I give him my support. I did not first tell him what I thought and ask him to agree to it: I went to him. The first word came from him. Although I had wished to meet him before that, I did not say anything. The very first word he said to me agreed exactly with my thoughts. I explained to him the ideas I had in my mind concerning the Maori people. Those ideas of mine were connected with the people of the whole of this Island, and not of my particular district alone. They extended to those Natives who are loyal subjects and those who are not loyal. I said to Mr. Hall, "If your side gets into power, will you have a Native Minister?" He said "Yes." "Will you give to the Native Minister—to the Maori Minister—the sole power of managing Native affairs?" He said "Yes." I explained to him that I was not speaking about those lands which have been operated on by the law—Crown-granted lands—but purely Native lands. I said the lands that were already Crown-granted the European and Maori should manage together. When he agreed to all my ideas concerning the Native race, I agreed to support his side. I shall exercise my vote as a chief. If I see anything wrong on the other side I shall attempt to overthrow them. Whatever side I see is right, I shall go on that side. As the leader of the Opposition agreed to what I explained to him as my views, I will go to his side. If the Government remain in office, well and good. All I wish is that good laws may be framed for the Maori people—better than have been hitherto. If they will make good laws I shall have an opportunity of supporting them; but now I will vote with the Opposition. That is the conclusion of what I have to say.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Sir, I do not think that I have ever risen to address the House under more humiliating circumstances than the present; for, though I always feel proud of being a member of this House, and being able to take part in the business of the country, I cannot but feel, on this occasion, that which is sometimes termed ennui. There has been nothing said during the last few days, especially by the old members of the House, that has not been said a dozen times previously during the last few years; and I am afraid that what I am obliged to say this afternoon will prove to have been said by me a great many times during the last few years. Indeed, I should not have spoken at all in this debate had it not been for the circumstance that there are many new members in the House who otherwise would not have had a chance of making themselves acquainted with the real facts of the case, and who otherwise might imagine that the long string of accusations levelled against the Government are based upon facts. I must, however, before proceeding to other matters, state this to honorable gentlemen on the opposite side: that my absence from the House during the time they were speaking has not been intended as any act of discourtesy; but they will understand this: that my functions are of a multifarious character, and, owing to the press of other matters, I have not been able to remain in the House to listen to them. But, at the same time, I may say I have read the speeches of all members, so far as those speeches have been given publicity to, and I dare say I have a very fair idea of what has been said. I have been fortunate enough to hear the speeches of the three Maori members who have just sat down, and I must say I have reason to be pleased with the speeches delivered by those honorable gentlemen. A word or two in regard to them: I should like to say a few words. The first gentleman spoke very plainly indeed. He said, "Bad is the best of you;" and with that statement I am afraid I must concur. I think that all of us are to blame for the very little we have done for the Maori people. The second honorable gentleman took what, to my mind, appeared to be a straightforward party stand; he said, "I have been returned to support the present Government. I shall vote as a chief ought to do—keep my promise, and vote for the Government." Now let us see what the third honorable member says. I have been reading for a few days past a very interesting work, entitled "Records of the Past," and we have now had before us the records of the past concerning the last ten or fourteen days. It has been rather a puzzle to me why honorable gentlemen have come to me and said, "The Maoris are gone;" "We have three out of the four Maoris;" "We have two out of the four Maoris;" "You will only get one of the Maoris;" and so on. Now we have some light thrown on the subject. It appears the leader of the Opposition has been interviewing the Maori members—that the leader of the Opposition and the Maori members have had consoling conversations between themselves; and the result is apparent. The honorable member for the East Coast says Mr. Hall is quite a young man. Well, to me and all those who know Mr. Hall, he is a very old man indeed. Mr. Hall cut his wisdom-teeth many years ago, and, if any one knows what he is about, Mr. Hall does, at any rate. If the honorable gentleman will read the records of the past history of the colony he will find that Mr. Hall is not so very young a man; and he will find out, moreover, all that that gentleman has done for the Maori people.

Mr. Sheehan

For instance, he will find that Mr. Hall was the gentleman who was instrumental, in the year 1869, in shutting out the whole of the claims of the Maoris in the South Island, and that he did this by an Order in Council which was declared to be illegal at the time, and required validation by an Act of this House. After the honorable gentleman has known Mr. Hall for another twelve months, and has taken into consideration what he has done in connection with the Maori people, he will then have a very different estimate of Mr. Hall's character—an estimate which, I have no doubt, will have an appreciable effect on his vote in a future session. I am not speaking offensively of the honorable member for Selwyn, but rather in a Pickwickian sense: still I am quite sure that the assurances which have been given by that honorable member to the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District and other Native members are assurances which he does not intend to carry out, and could not carry out if ever so willing to do so. Let me tell the Maori members that there occur in the history of every party, both Government and Opposition, important times—critical times—when a man would pawn his shirt for a vote. That is the case with us at the present time. If the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District were to go to the honorable member for Selwyn and ask him to make a railway to the moon, that honorable gentleman would doubtless reply, "Well, personally I approve of the idea; but I will lay it before the party." If my honorable friend asked the honorable gentleman for an unlimited order upon the Public Treasury, he would reply, "The idea is really a very good one: I will submit it for consideration." But such promises are worth nothing, and would not be given except at these critical times. But such promises have not been all. There has also been a good deal of misrepresentation going on. The honorable gentleman (Mr. Tomoana) asked what member first made war on the Maoris in this colony, and he went on to say, in so many words, probably on the authority of the leader of the Opposition, that the first war was made by Sir George Grey. If the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District had read anything of the history of the colony he would have known that the first war was in full swing when Sir George Grey came here; and, moreover, that he was the first person to establish peace and grant an amnesty to the Maoris who had taken part in the war; and, what is more, he did not take one single acre of land from the Maoris. Now we come to the Waikato war. We are told by the same honorable gentleman that Sir George Grey was the author of the Waikato war, and that he was the author of the confiscation policy. What are the facts of the case? Of course every man must have an instructor—a schoolmaster—and the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District must have received instruction of some one; but I trust my friend the honorable member for Selwyn has not been instructing the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District, because I am sure he must recognize, from his own sense of fair-play, that it is not right to put false history into the mind of a man. True, we know, as a matter of fact, that the Waikato war was begotten of the Taranaki war, and that Governor Gore Browne was the man who made the Taranaki war, and not Sir George Grey. We know, also, that Sir George Grey was opposed to the policy of confiscation, and that it was this opposition that got him into trouble; in fact, that his refusal to agree to the policy of confiscation led to his recall from this country. If the honorable member will look into history and see what really are the facts he will find he is quite right in saying he does not know Mr. John Hall. We have been told that he has asked the honorable member for Selwyn if he would establish a Maori Minister, having all the rights and powers of a European Minister as to Native lands—having the power of deciding, with regard to Native lands not Crown-granted, that the Native Land Court should be abolished; and Mr. Hall said, "Yes, certainly; of course." Can there be purer bunkum? What can be more absurd? Could any man in search of a vote go further? I may tell the honorable gentleman that I was quite aware of these negotiations. I knew of every one of them, as they were going on day by day: nay, more, these very same questions were put to me, and I replied "No." What does it mean? It means a Maori Minister, with a separate department—a separate staff of clerks. And yet, when the leader of the Opposition is asked if he would agree to this, he replies, "Yes, certainly; if you will vote for us." My answer was "No. The time has not come for that. When your people can speak English, when you take part in the Cabinet Council and talk without an interpreter, and cease to have those great differences in your tribes, then will be time enough for a Maori Minister to be put in the same position as a European Minister." That was my answer. Now, will the honorable gentleman dare to fulfil his promise? He dare not. I defy him. We are told, also, that the honorable gentleman was asked, at the same time, "Will you agree to stop all sales and leases of lands?" Forth came again the same answer, the condition being the same, and the necessity of giving the promise greater than before, perhaps—"Yes, I will stop all sales and leases." Upon my word, I have done some little lobbying in my time, and I confess that I have occasionally stretched a point, but there are limits beyond which I have not gone. Well, if the honorable gentleman will tell his party in this House that he is prepared to make a Maori Minister, and that he is prepared to stop all sales and leases of land—

Mr. HALL.—No.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Well, I take the statement of the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District. I say that, if he were to tell his party, there are not five members of his party who would allow him to fulfil his promise. Why, as to promises, it seems to me clear that the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District could get a promise of anything he was inclined to ask for; and when he goes outside to-night, after the division, he will say, "I am surprised at my own moderation." Now, there is a habit we have, and we have taught it to the Maoris, of reducing transactions of this kind to writing, so that there may be perpetual testimony of what has taken place; but on this occasion, it is said, there was a desire on both sides to be bound by words of honor. The honorable member for the Eastern Maori District had made his demand, and the honorable member for Selwyn had made his promise, therefore it was unnecessary to reduce the thing to writing. That was a very good plan, because I will be bound that, if the honorable member for Selwyn had attempted to put his hand to paper making such a promise as that, his party henceforth would have consisted of himself. He dare not attempt to fulfil such a promise. Let us see now whether we are acting fairly in this matter. We are a superior race. We have introduced Christianity and parliamentary government into the country, and ought to set a good example in every respect; yet that side of the House on which there is a flame of purity burning which is not to be found here, for party purposes, to secure a vote to oust a Government, to gain these benches—to do this, I say, those honorable gentlemen are prepared to eat more dirt than I could swallow in a lifetime. There is just one point to which I might refer before I pass on. My friend may say, "Well, yes, we admit that it was an indiscreet thing to do; but party pressure was strong, and, having been asked to do this, we could not refuse." Now, we have testimony that my honorable friend was the first to make these proposals—that he went to the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District, and said, "If you will vote for me, I will do so-and-so." The Native member says, "I did not wish to ask first, but Mr. Hall saved me the trouble by proposing it." I understand my honorable friend does not know of the action of the honorable member for Selwyn with regard to the Natives in the South Island; so I will repeat that by his action the Native people in that Island were altogether shut out from their land.

Mr. HALL.—No.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—They were given a paltry piece of land, in some instances not more than about two acres in extent per head, and an order was signed by the leader of the Opposition, which order had been covered by a vote of this House, and the result was that, up to the present time, but for the action of this Government, there would not have been a single acre of land for those Natives. It appears to me that there must be some break in the narrative of the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District, or he would not have left out the main question—that question which most nearly affects the race he represents—the Maori dual vote. I should have thought that he, being a Maori, and therefore ready to do everything that he could on behalf of his people, would be anxious to inquire from the honorable gentleman who is to be our new Premier what he was going to do for the Maori people in that respect. However, his history of his relations with that honorable gentleman is silent upon that question. Let me tell him what the honorable member for Selwyn has done in regard to that matter. The honorable member for the Eastern Maori District thinks that my honorable friend opposite was in the Government, or became a member of the Government, which brought in the Maori dual vote. It is not so: he was a member of the Ministry which kept it back for years. Does the honorable member know that the honorable member for Selwyn was a party to the movement last session—in a place to which I cannot further refer—for striking out the Maori dual vote altogether? It is a positive fact that, after the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District and his people had taken the trouble to put their names from time to time on the roll so as to insure their votes, this person whom he calls the "new person" was one of the most active in taking away their franchise. If that is incorrect, let it be contradicted at once, before I go to another point. I hear no contradiction, so I will proceed. I have no intention of referring to the speeches delivered by previous speakers. I feel that the rest of the House, as I myself, desire to bring this debate to a close as speedily as possible. We have counted noses, and we all pretty well know what the result will be; so that the sooner we come to a division the better, in order that we may know what future operations may be necessary. I shall therefore be brief. I shall follow the course which I took last session, and take as my text the speech of the leader of the Opposition, and simply refer incidentally to those points in other members' speeches which may relate more especially to remarks made by my honorable friend opposite. First of all, as a matter of fair-play, I may express my own opinion—and, I am sure, the opinion of every member on this side of the House—that we rejoice in the change that has been made in the leader of the Opposition. Whatever little weaknesses he may give way to outside the House and in the lobbies, there can be no doubt that inside the House his demeanour has been characterized by a gentlemanly, calm, and conciliatory spirit which has saved this debate very much from falling into the depths into which the debate on a similar motion fell last session. Of course it must be a matter of wonder to all of us that the Opposition, who claimed to possess then within their ranks all the talents, have not been able to find amongst themselves any one person able to take their lead, and have been obliged to import a leader from abroad. History repeats itself. I have heard that Cypheus went to the infernal regions for a certain purpose, and there is another instance of something of the same kind being done, to which I shall not refer. But I must say I cannot understand that the party who last session were ready to govern the country should now have been obliged to import an honorable gentleman from another place for party purposes. At all events, the honorable gentleman, like the bad shilling, is back here again, and we must take him for better or worse; and I am thankful that, being in the House, he has taken up a rôle that no man could better take up than himself. I cannot say that I am sorry that the gentleman whose position he has taken has not returned, although towards myself, I confess, he was generally most courteous, and when he made attacks upon me I was always able to reply to him by facts. On the whole, I am glad the electors of Wanganui have given him time for reflection. I observe that, following the old custom of our Maori brethren, having killed him politically, they have put him up a tree. If I were to ask honorable gentlemen where we are now, I presume there are very few who could answer; but, as far as I can make out, this is our position: In 1877, the present Government turned out the then Government; in 1878, the present Government had a majority of thirteen or fourteen—but I may explain how it came to pass that many of those gentlemen did not respond to the rein. The fact was, that they had been only recently taken from the run, were not well broken in, and, in the hands of the old and experienced jockeys of the Opposition, were sometimes led into the wrong stable. So that in 1878 they prevented the Government carrying on the business of the country.

Mr. HURSTHOUSE.—We voted for you half the time.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—If so, all I can say is, I should not care to have such votes on this no-confidence motion. In 1879 this new Parliament was returned. Those who were in the Parliament on the occasion of its last meeting will remember the extraordinary change which came over the faces of my honorable friends opposite when they heard that the Governor was going to grant a dissolution. That was not their programme. They were so anxious to carry out the liberal measures which belonged to us that they wanted to go on with them at once, and wanted no dissolution. But a dissolution was granted; and we find that, while the Government went to the country with a minority of fourteen, they ought now to have a majority, if every vote was given fairly and straightforwardly and above-board. Let us look at what has happened. Out of seventeen members of the Opposition who went to election, only three have come back to tell the tale. Of the other party, only five lost their seats; whereas the late leader of the Opposition, and another leading man of that party whom I am really sorry not to see here again, have been left out in the cold. Mr. Whitaker was beaten in his own stronghold—beaten at a place which he himself picked out for a battle-ground—beaten by one who, although he could not be termed a beardless boy, is not far from it. I say honestly for myself, and I am sure many around me will agree with me, that I miss that gentleman from the House. I could point to several honorable gentlemen on that side whom I would much sooner see out of it. But there is the fact, that one of the leaders of the country, one of its highest public servants—a man who ruled as Superintendent of Auckland for years; a man who has led the Government of the whole country for years—could not get a seat. There is no doubt whatever that neither the Opposition of last session nor the Opposition of this session can command the confidence of the country. I would also point out what, to my mind, is a most serious charge against the Opposition. It was a most unfair thing last session, and it is a still more unfair thing on their part this session, to take such a course as to move a vote of want of confidence as an amendment to the Address in reply to the Governor's Speech. If a reasonable time were given for the production of the measures promised in the Speech, and of the papers and documents relating to the subjects referred to, then it would be quite fair to bring forward such a motion. But what has happened? Persons like myself, and other old members of the House, know where to go and pick up the information that we want, and, when statements are made, know where to lay our hands on documents to verify them or refute them; but new members must take for gospel everything that is said—they cannot fortify themselves by reference to public documents. The course is certainly not unconstitutional, but it is unparliamentary and unfair, and I am perfectly sure the consequences will recoil on the heads of those who have taken it. Last session the issue put before the House was this: that, while the Opposition approved of the policy of the Government, they disapproved of the administration of affairs. In fact, they said there had been maladministration. That, I think, is correct. I may, first of all, refer to what may be called the major proposition, from our point of view, but the minor proposition from their point of view—that is, the approval of our measures. I can hardly imagine a greater piece of claptrap than for those honorable gentlemen to assume, for party purposes, that they are liberal, and ready to carry out liberal measures. I speak of the leaders of that party, and I say that there is not one of them who is a Liberal at heart, or who would, if he could help it, pass a single one of these measures. The fact is that, in order to get on these benches, they have abandoned their own principles, they have come on to the Liberal platform, and are making the sacrifice, not for the good of the country, but for their own benefit. This year the tactics are changed: now, they call for a reconstruction of the Ministry. Last year, the whole lot were bad; this year, there is a brand that can be saved from the burning. And why? For the very same reason that led to the meeting between the leader of the Opposition and my honorable friend the member for the Eastern Maori District. The Government, upon a plain want-of-confidence motion, could not be turned out of office. Let the honorable gentlemen opposite table a resolution to that effect, and try it, if they like and dare do it. They dare not. But the process which had been going on for some days, and which wound up with the production of this motion, discovered the fact that there are on this side of the House and on that side of the House a number of honorable members who are in favour of what is called "reconstruction," although they may differ as to what form that reconstruction should take. There are no doubt persons voting for the Government who are in favour of a reconstruction, and there are those on the other side who would not vote with that party unless they were assured that some of our party were to be in the next Government. I will now just refer to the honorable member for Bruce, who was good enough to make a speech to the House yesterday in which, I understand, he said he had informed his constituents that this would probably be his last session in this House.

Mr. MURRAY.—That is a matter between me and my constituents.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—The honorable gentleman and his constituents are, like myself, before this House at the present time, and I am entitled to remark upon the matter. I understand that, as soon as the honorable gentleman has passed his Drainage Bill, he intends to retire from this sphere. Although he is not of my party now, I should regret it, because I cannot forget old party ties, and must pay a tribute of respect to his action in the past. At one time that honorable gentleman had a special function of his own. No matter what Government was in power, he always would insist upon delivering his own Financial Statement. From that, I gather that, with an ambition which was perfectly laudable in itself, he at one time hoped to become the controller of the public finance. I trust he will not take that to be an accusation. To my mind, it is a perfectly honorable desire on the part of a public man, and a member of this House, to endeavour, if possible, so to bring himself forward as to become entitled to the confidence of his party, and to deserve office at their hands. Now he seems to have broken out in a fresh place. This time he has delivered both a Financial Statement and a Statement on Native Affairs; and I presume he has determined that it is better to have two strings to his bow, so that, if he cannot have one, he may have the other; and I gathered, from the tenor of his speech, and his attack on myself, that on the whole he thinks his chances against me are the best. All I can say is that, if his party come into office, and he obtains the position he seems to covet, he shall not have a very rancorous opposition, although I would advise his party, before making the selection, to weigh the matter very carefully indeed. Now, Sir, I will refer to an honorable gentleman whom I am sorry to see in such bad company—the honorable member for Grey and Bell. I listened to his speech, or the greater portion of it, and I feel bound to say that it was a fair and dispassionate examination of what appeared to be the grounds of accusation against the Government; and, although I differed from his conclusions, I cannot but admit that he was far more effective than the other honorable gentlemen who spoke on the subject, because he confined himself to public reasons. I attach great importance to an expression of opinion coming from him. I am not now asking him to interview me outside in any of the numerous passages leading to this chamber; but I am talking to him publicly in the House. I know he is going to vote against us, and I believe if he did not do so he would forfeit his own self-respect, and therefore I tell him that I attach the greatest importance to his expressions of opinion. The honorable gentleman has evidently given the most careful consideration to this question; but I will show him, in the course of my reply to the leader of the Opposition, that he has been arguing on false premises—that he has been badly informed—and that, on the whole, the action taken by the Government was the best that could have been taken to avoid a war and to preserve the public peace. The honorable member for Bruce is not, so far as I know, in the confidence of Rewi; but he appeared to know a good deal about Rewi, and about his actions and intentions. All I can say is, that I may be compelled to refer to him again as I travel on; and I will show that the intentions of Rewi are straightforward and honorable—that his action has been in the public interest, and for the preservation of public peace; and at the present time it is his action, and his action alone, amongst the King party, which has saved us from what might have been a Maori war. There is one thing to which I must refer very briefly, before taking up some more important matters; and that is this: that there are a number of gentlemen in the House who tell you and, I believe, tell you fairly, and have no intention to dissemble, that they would like to be supporting the present Government; but who draw you on one side and say, "The fact is this: We can't stand Grey." That is the expression they use. When you reply to that by a question and say, "Be kind enough to inform me why it is you can't stand Grey," every man gives a different reason, and, so far as I have heard, not a single reason is given that ought to influence a man in the discharge of his public duty in this House. I ask them to point out to me what the honorable gentleman has done to entitle him to be stigmatized in that way—I ask them to point out to me a single speck of dirt in his character, from the time he first came here in 1845 up to the present time. That he has many bitter opponents, I admit; but I protest against this attempt to ostracize a public man on grounds so frivolous as are advanced by his enemies. It is the old story in Grecian history of Aristides the Just repeated, when it was said, "I will ostracize him, because I am tired of hearing him called Aristides the Just." That is about the long and short of it. There is no occasion to refer to the policy of the Government as shown in the Governor's Speech, because the Opposition appear to have, on that particular point, a most capacious maw. They are prepared to swallow everything, including these benches. They want them as a dessert to wind up with. Let them get these and they will take any policy you like—big or little, Conservative or Liberal, broad- or narrow-gauge, as long as they can travel on the rails and stop at this station. If they do, and I happen to be on the other side, I will try to furnish them with a return ticket. I shall not now—in fact, the tenor of the debate does not call upon me to do so—refer to what formed, to my mind, the most unpleasant feature in the discussions of the House last session, namely, the insinuations made against myself. I said then, and I say now, that, so long as I do my public business, and do it properly and well, my private character should stand unchallenged at the hands of anybody in this House; and I say, further, that there is evidence of this fact: that the very man from whom the attack emanated told the country through the Press, by his advertisements and at his meetings, that I was not the person referred to all—in fact, that I was a very right and proper party indeed, and that, so far from abusing me, good gracious, I am, thick and thin—a right and proper man. That, gentleman said, "I understand that some think that I am the person who referred to Mr. Sheehan in the House, and talked about his being poor and having bills returned and cheques dishonored. I tell you that I am not the person. I never said so. I never meant to refer to him." Sir, I put it to honorable men on all sides of the House—I can ask scores on the other side of the House—is it not the fact that I was the person referred to? What can you think of a man who, having done that, would eat his own words for the sake of coming to this House again? The people of Franklin estimated that gentleman at his proper worth, and left him out in the cold; and I trust that any man who comes into this House to make favour and secure power by abuse of that kind will meet with the same reward. The honorable member for Selwyn referred to the Maori expenditure, and said that a certain amount had been spent above the actual estimates. Now, I cannot say what the actual amount is, but I am willing to admit—in fact, there is no use denying—that there has been a large excess of expenditure, for reasons which, when the occasion arises—and it will arise when the motion of the honorable member for Clive comes on—I shall give in detail. I shall not take up the time of the House now by reading figures and wearying it with statistics, but I may say that, while there has been an excess of expenditure, it has been entirely in the public interest, and it has been for objects which, when my honorable friend the member for the Eastern Maori Electoral District and his party come into power, they will find were very necessary. They will find themselves in this position: that, if they attempt to apply the European standard and to curtail expenditure, the necessity for the scale of expenditure which we were obliged to incur will be only too unpleasantly apparent in the hindrance given to them in coming to this House with public business, and bringing other matters before the Parliament and the country. The honorable gentleman told us that the Government had strained every nerve and done everything it possibly could to be in a position to assure the country that at last peace was established. What I said on a previous occasion, and what has been said by every Government, was this: that we honestly believed that no actual disturbance of the public peace between the European and Maori races can ever take place. I believe that now, and I say this much: that, if it does take place, it will arise from the unworthy motives of people who would like to see the country plunged into a war. What happened a few years ago—in 1872 or 1873? We were told by a gentleman—to whom I wish to refer with the utmost possible respect, and of whom I only speak now as a public man—we had telegrams sent by him from the Waikato to the effect that he had established peace with the Maori King. That announcement went flying through the wires to England; and when this House met what had become of the honorable gentleman? From a plain Minister he had been elevated to a K.O.M.G., or something of that sort—I forget the exact number of the initials. That was the result of a purely unimportant meeting, from which nothing whatever came, and the proof of that is that, up to 1876, nothing whatever was done. I think that, when a previous Ministry gave such an assurance, and even dared to approach the presence of Royalty with the statement that it was true, in order to obtain from Royalty that distinction which is only given in cases where it is merited, all that can be said is that they are not the persons who should sling stones at us. Reference has been made to Hiroki, to Te Whiti, and to the disturbances at the Bay of Islands and at Ohinemuri. Now what is the fact? That for years before troubles of the same kind had occurred. And when we came into office in 1877 the Maori King and his people were, so far as the Government were concerned, as far distant from us as they were when the war closed in 1864. No single step had been made towards a permanent peace, or towards the opening up of the country. On the contrary, all that happened was this: that for several years previous young men went out—as an honorable gentleman once a member of this House said—for the “shooting season.” The honorable gentleman tells us that the position of the Maori King even at the present time is antagonistic. I should like to have heard the honorable member for the Western Maori District speaking on that point, because I think he would tell the House that, although the Government and the Maori King did not conclude anything at the Te Kopua meeting, yet the King himself is still well disposed and anxious to preserve the peace of the country, and will in no way aid and abet those who are inclined to do otherwise. Now, I would point out this: If that be true—and I appeal to the honorable gentleman whether it is not true—it is a most mischievous thing to say in this House that the Maori King, at the present time, holds a position of antagonism towards us. What does it mean? It gets into the newspapers, is wired all over the country, reaches the King camp, and in a few days he is told that the Parliament of the country—not the honorable member for Selwyn, but the Parliament—has said that the Maori King is antagonistic to the interests of the Europeans. I said, Sir, when I commenced my address, that a good deal of this matter is wearisome if one has to go over it again and again; but, if the Opposition will furnish up their old furniture and bring it before the House, I must produce some consignments of my own. I have to pass over very briefly matters to which reference has been made in speeches delivered during the debate, and on which I could dwell at greater length, and afford the House some little instruction; but, having a regard to a saving of time, and to a desire which has been expressed that the debate may be closed as soon as possible, I hope that even my honorable friends opposite will excuse me if I pass them over somewhat lightly, and that they will not think that I am afraid of meeting them. When we came into office we found the Maori King exceedingly anxious to meet the Government. We received letters and telegrams inviting us to a meeting, and we went to that meeting. Nothing more took place there than what you might term a “tangi.” The Maori people then met Sir George Grey for the first time for about twenty years, and they would do nothing more than cry and eat, and arrange to postpone the meeting. At the second meeting proposals were made to them, which have been printed and laid on the table of the House—proposals which, the Premier will bear me out in saying, were accepted absolutely by the Maori King—accepted fully and completely; and, but for the fact that he felt himself called upon to consult his constitutional advisers, he would there and then have settled the whole matter. In regard to the difficulty which arose, I will ask members on both sides of the House to bear this in mind: that up to the present time only two causes are known to account for the difficulty which then took place. One was, that we opened up a road through Crown country; the second was, that certain lands which they had refused to take were given by us as an endowment for a Native school in the Waikato District. When the Natives chose to make these two things the grounds of objection, does this House mean to say for a moment that the Government were not wise, were not dignified, were not acting in the interests of the country, in saying, “Very well, if these are your grounds of objection, we will withdraw those proposals, and you can talk to us by-and-by”? Our reasons for withdrawing them are pretty well known to Major Te Wheoro, at all events. We should not have proposed them at all if it had not been for the action of the previous Government; but, having given the King Natives a fair chance to consider them, having given the King party plenty of time to think about them, we determined to withdraw them. And why? Because in these proposals was a stipulation to the effect that Tawhiao should have power to control the construction of roads, bridges, and other works to be carried on in the country over which he presides. We object to that, and I hope that no Government will concede a point of that kind to any person within the colony. We are frequently told of the necessity of compelling these people to obey the laws; but how is this possible, after what has been said by the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District, more especially when he is told by the leader of the Opposition that this preposterous demand is necessary for the quiescence of the party to which he belongs, and will form a portion of the policy of the future? I do not wish to take up the time of the House by detailing the communications referred to. I will only mention one fact, which in itself will prove the value of what has been done. When the outrage took place at the Thames the other day, what did Rewi do? He sent messengers to every one of his settlements to cut off all means of escape for the refugees into the Waikato, and did everything in his power to assist me in handing over these people to justice. I ask the House to reflect upon the value of this one act. What would have happened a few years ago? If a Native committed an offence of this kind, the Maori people would have upheld him and, by force of arms, prevented any attempt to rescue the offender. Now, Sir, I come to what is, to my mind, a worn-out story—the story of the Waimate Plains. I can only say, in reference to this matter, that there is a great deal of misapprehension, especially in the case of the honorable member for Grey and Bell (Colonel Trimble). I do not blame the previous Government for anything connected with the survey of the Waimate Plains; but this, I believe, is the fact: that the Civil Commissioner of the district, Major Brown, had a kind of carte blanche authority to proceed with the survey of the land, and about the time, or shortly before the time, we came into office he was about to carry out his instructions to survey the land. Coming into office as we did, having had no chance to pick up the threads of the affair, we decided to defer the survey, at the instance of persons who appeared to be well advised on the matter. It was on that advice alone that we acted. Major Brown was advised by me to postpone the survey. I went to Titokowaru and Te Whiti and talked the matter over with them, and, if it had not been for the action of certain persons who went about instigating and prompting the Natives to acts of discontent, we should have had no trouble on the Waimate Plains. But, further trouble having taken place, what was to be done? We are told by the honorable member for Grey and Bell that the Government left the settlers to themselves. Now, first of all, there was a force at hand—not a very large force, I admit—but we had good reason to believe, a belief justified by results, that the Natives had no desire to disturb the peace, or to do anything beyond asserting their right to the land. Well, we took a number of prisoners. Some of them are here now. We sent up a large force, but we declined—and we decline now—to consent to any demand which might bring about a most disastrous war. If there is a place in this colony which has suffered severely from the effects of a Maori war, that place is Taranaki, and I hope that no man on either side of the House, either to gain office or avoid losing it, will do anything to jeopardize the peace of the country. I say that we can afford to be patient with these people. If they spake our language, if they understood our laws, if they could reason with us as we can with ourselves, I would myself make one to go to-morrow and enforce our position. But we were told that the unfulfilled promises were few and far between. Sir, the country from the White Cliffs to the Waitotara is strewn with unfulfilled promises—some of them fourteen or fifteen years old. There is a report on the table to that effect, made by Mr. Parris to Charles Brown and James Mackay, and signed in my presence; but from the White Cliffs passing through every block down to the boundary of the confiscation at Waitotara, unfulfilled promises are to be found everywhere. We are told that the Natives are in possession of the “promised” land. That is true of two blocks certainly; but what could they do with it? They could not sell it; they had not even a scrap of writing to show that they were in possession of it; and to allow the Natives to say that the land was theirs, was simply a means of spinning out the matter until the Europeans should take it away again. But that is not all. Even amongst the loyal people reserves were promised but were never given to them, and, what is more, reserves made for them fourteen years ago had been purchased by Government officers—a long stretch of country set apart for these people and their children had simply been mopped up by Government officials. Sir, I was for many years a member of the Native Affairs Committee, and while a member I attended that Committee regularly. I brought before it many petitions myself, and heard them examined into and reported upon, and in many cases where Maoris have attempted to enter into explanations of reserves which had been promised to them and never given, they have been ruled out of order. It was said that these Maoris were merely “trying it on.” I came to believe myself that these statements relative to reserves had no foundation in fact, and it was not till I came into office that I became aware of the fact that reserves to the extent of thousands of acres had been promised, and that these promises remained unfulfilled, and are at this moment a disgrace to the English name. I was not put into office for the purpose of fulfilling them, but I am in office now, and I am fulfilling them; but the honorable gentlemen opposite were in office for years, and never stirred a finger in that direction. They were the persons to do it. They took the land and made these promises. They allowed these promises to go by, and they allowed their own officers to buy up the land for themselves. They even did something beyond that. They sent up a man to select reserves for those Natives who had awards from the Compensation Court. This man had a European partner, and when the Natives went to him to have their land pointed out he said, “If I give you this piece of land, will you sell it to my partner at 10s. an acre?” And, if they said “No,” the land was not given to them.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—Who was that?

Mr. SHEEHAN.—He was a person in the employ of the Native Land Office. Sir, I repeat, that, from the White Cliffs to the Waitotara River reserves from 15,000 to 50 acres have been promised, and have not been granted. What is the result? The House will remember the gallant and generous conduct of the chief Wiremu Kingi when the “Lord Worsley” was wrecked at Taranaki. His treatment of the crew and passengers is remembered with gratitude; and where is he now? He is in the prison at Mount Cook; and, if you ask him why he is there, he tells you that it is because he has not been able to get the land that was promised to him fifteen years ago. In the next case, where an unmistakable promise had been made, it took something like six weeks to hunt up the faintest trace of the record of the promise; and it was at last found in a musty book in the possession of a gentleman who is now on the Supreme Court bench, Mr. Justice Richmond. The owner was told that he could not sell his land or lease it, and was driven, like the rest of the people under Te Whiti's influence, to plough it. That is why I believe the Maori people who have taken possession of this land will do no harm, unless they are badly advised; and I have reason to believe that they are being badly advised, not by those gentlemen who compose the Opposition in this House, but by a class of persons who, I believe, would be glad to see blood shed. Now, Sir, let me say this: that, beyond the importance of preserving the public peace and saving the credit of the colony, this House owes a duty to the South Island not to plunge it into war. The South Island is part of the colony, and, if you precipitate a war, the chances are that the southern settlers will make a demand for Separation. I hope we shall do nothing that will lead to such a result. I am a Provincialist, and have provincial sympathies; but I am one of those who would sooner cut off my right hand than saddle the people of the South Island with an expense such as they have had before. The honorable gentleman did not speak by the record when he spoke of the broken promises of the present Government. He must have been speaking of the previous Government, because I never had any occasion to make promises to the Natives. I had rather to remind them of the fact that certain conditions of the law with regard to land in this country were about to be fulfilled, and then I became aware that there were unfulfilled promises in existence which led them to take up that position. There are no unfulfilled promises of this Government; and, if any of our officers had made promises without authority, we should have said "Good-bye" to them. I shall feel no regret if the Opposition succeed in carrying their amendment. They will then have an opportunity of settling this difficulty. They will have time to retire the dishonored Bills they have spoken of, and bring about that peace and prosperity which they say cannot be brought about as long as the present Government remain in office. They will be able to abolish the Native Land Court—refuse the Natives the right to sell or lease their land; and, when they carry out all the proposals of the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District, I have no doubt they will be received at the Parihaka with triumphal arches. The leader of the Opposition, in his speech a few days ago, said, very properly, that he expected to hear that the Government blamed their predecessors for these troubles among the Maori people. Nothing can be truer or more candid, because beyond all doubt those whose places we took are certainly the persons responsible for the position of affairs. I do not blame the honorable member for Selwyn individually, but I speak of what was called the "continuous Ministry," of which no man knows the beginning or the end, which took a different shape every three or four months, and which, I believe, every member of the House entered for a short time. The honorable gentleman says that Native discontent exists throughout the country. I conclude he means throughout the North Island. Now, he gave no practical proof that that is a fact, although I know there are places of which it may be asserted. I have referred to the Waimate Plains, and I think that the House, having heard me, will agree that, with respect to the Waimate Plains and the troubles there, my honorable friends on that side are the parties on whom the blame should rest. I shall now go to the other cases. First of all, take the Thames case. What is that case? It is really about the survey of a piece of land. That land was Government land, bought by our predecessors in office. Acting upon their bargain in good faith that the transaction was fair and right, we went to survey it, and on that survey being made the offence was committed. Now, it appears, singularly enough, that this offence was supposed to be committed upon a Maori. Honorable members who have read the story will remember that the attacking party warned the Europeans to clear out or they would be shot. I saw the man who was wounded by the Natives myself in the hospital. He happens to be a European, but, by reason of his descent from the Spanish race, he is darker than most half-castes, and the Maoris fired at him, thinking he was a member of the opposing tribe. Now, what action did we take in regard to that? Some people would ask us to march up a large force, to run the risk of blood being shed, and of a war being started. We did not do so. We simply took steps among their own people. We obtained the services of men who for the last fourteen years were opposed to us—the Hauhaus, of Piako, and Tukukino at the Thames, who, from the first, has been a staunch supporter of Tawhiao, the Maori King. These men met with me, advised me, and assisted me, and spent several days in endeavouring to get those people delivered up to justice. Even though they temporarily failed to do so, it was better for the whole Maori people to see that some of the principal chiefs, who had been opposed to us for years, were to be found working with a will to uphold the law. The fact that they would not help us to take the offenders by force of arms is nothing against that argument. Now I will take the case of the Bay of Islands outrage, in which four people were killed and two wounded. Firstly, the transaction was a private transaction between private persons and Maori people. Secondly, it was a transaction so unknown to the Maoris themselves that even the tribe to which those people belonged did not know of it until after the thing took place. Thirdly, they are people so loyal that I am certain, in a very short time, you will find them bringing down those men to be tried by the ordinary Courts of law. We are told that we never employ the Maori chiefs in these things—that one thing the Maoris are not satisfied with is, that we keep them aloof. As a matter of fact, this is the first time that the leaders of the Maori people have been asked to assist and have assisted the Government, and it will be seen that the larger portion of the charges against me are made because I asked the Maori chiefs to assist me in governing their own people. I meant to refer more fully to other points in the honorable gentleman's speech, but I think I can afford to pass by the case of Mr. Luckie. Mr. Luckie, I may say, is "lucky." We cannot improve the position of affairs by talking over it. The matter was discussed last session, and beyond all doubt the point was settled. The chief accusation was that we had taken into the Civil Service a person who was not a member of it. I pointed out then, and I do now, that our predecessors in office had simply year after year brought in officers from outside the Civil Service, and had even gone Home to get people for offices in the Civil Service. We had a perfect right to take a man who had been living in the colony for many years—a practical colonist—and ask him to fill a public office if we wanted to fill it. With regard to the charges against myself, it is quite true that a delay took place in the appointment of a Resident Magistrate at Lyttelton; but an appointment could not be made without causing similar applications from towns of the same character. For instance, at Port Chalmers the work was being fairly performed by a Magistrate who was also engaged in other places; but the House knows that there was a great deal of pressure to appoint a Magistrate to take care of that work. With regard to Addington Gaol, the charge is that delay took place in the completion of the work. When we came into office the work was in hand. I made inquiry, and I was told that this work, which was to cost about £3,000, was being carried on without plans or specifications. The officers in charge never saw the plans. I was told that an architect somewhere had made drawings, but he would not give them up until he was paid for his work. That was the administration of my friends on the opposite side. What is more, the work was not necessary. When I went there, in 1877, I found the whole body of the prisoners actually sitting down smoking pipes in the exercise-yards. I could get them work seven miles away, if I found them free passes and brought them home with free passengers. I feel convinced the works now being done at that gaol are quite sufficient for the purpose. Now, with regard to the charge made about the Lunatic Asylums, and the want of proper provision for those poor people, I do not under-estimate the importance of that subject. If there be any persons who require care it is those who cannot help themselves; but I say that the accommodation existing now is as good as when we came into office, and in many cases it is much better. We have been told by the Inspector of Lunatic Asylums that to meet his requirements in one year he wanted—how much do you think? A quarter of a million of money. It was impossible for the Government to find it. We could not even borrow the money for that purpose. All that we could do was to make the best possible provision from time to time with the funds at our disposal. Now I come to the question of the “Hinemoa.” Very few people have used that steamer less than myself. When I look at the use of the “Luna” in previous years, I can say that as Native Minister I have been exceedingly moderate. I went to Gisborne, Tauranga, and Auckland in the “Hinemoa” some time ago, but I only did public business while I was there; I refused to address a public meeting, and I left at once when my work was done. I contend that that is the proper use of the steamer. If we were to move for a return of the use of the Government steamers, I think that, on the whole, we should come out better than our predecessors. I see my friend the honorable member for Clive present. Let me tell a story about the “Luna.” In 1876 an important division was taking place in this House on the Piako-Swamp question. That division was carried on the casting vote of the Speaker. I was then in Napier, and so was the honorable member for Clive, and also one member of the Opposition, to which I belonged. We left Napier in the “Luna” on one of the finest days I ever saw in my life: the sea was as smooth as the carpet on this floor. When we got off the Kidnappers we turned back—I think it was on account of the glass going down. We had a beautiful passage on the way back; and we got here just too late to vote. In the meantime the division had taken place, and the Government were saved by the casting vote of the Speaker. We have not yet arrived at that stage, but if we are allowed to remain in office we will strive to improve, if possible. Now, Sir, we come to the other charge which has been made against the Government—that of using the telegraph line for electioneering purposes. In answer to that, I can say for myself and all my colleagues, that in every instance every message sent with regard to the elections was paid for out of our own pockets.

Mr. ORMOND.—When?

Mr. SHEEHAN.—That will be explained.

Mr. ORMOND.—When?

Mr. SHEEHAN.—They were paid for from day to day when they became due. I can show my cheque-book to support what I say. This was not the case in the old days. In those good old days the members of the Government used the wires for their ordinary needs.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No, no.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—The honorable member says “No, no;” I say, Yes. On inquiry being made, it was found that the whole of the members of the Government used the wires for electioneering purposes. Fortunately for them the time has gone by when these messages were burnt; but the fact remains, that the wires were used for the purposes I have indicated. A charge was made against myself and my colleagues to the effect that we had used a certain public work in Napier for political purposes—the Napier bridge. As to that, I may say that when we came into office we found a promise five years old which had been made for that bridge by the previous Government. We found an amount for that bridge on certain estimates left behind by that Government. We resolved to carry out the work, but for a time we were stopped from carrying it out on account of the non-arrival of Sir John Cooke’s Harbour Report. When I went there, on the occasion referred to by the leader of the Opposition, I went to redeem the promise which had been made to the people of Napier. The Opposition also charges us with having used Government officers for electioneering purposes. This is a most extraordinary charge to emanate from such a quarter. What took place in 1876 with regard to the election for the seat which

Mr. Tomoana now occupies in this House? The Government officers were used freely all round to canvass, and one young gentleman candidly admitted that he had done certain things because he understood he was Returning Officer for the Government candidate. And that was no uncommon case. I know, and others know, that, when it came to a party fight, almost every officer, in one department at least, became an apostle for those in power. I have referred before to the professions that have been made by the leading members of the Opposition; but, notwithstanding all their professions, I now tell this House that they do not want liberal measures; they do not want to see manhood suffrage on fair terms; they do not want liberal land laws. Their sole aim is to get on the Government benches, and the House will then have its eyes opened as to what their intentions really are, and will be able to see what amount of sincerity there is in their professions. I shall touch upon two points before I sit down, and I will address myself to the Maori members more particularly. I will tell the Maori members this: that when they are promised by the Opposition that they shall have Ministers of their own, that there shall be a cessation of all Native Land Courts—when they are promised by the Opposition that there shall be no more leases or sales of land—

Mr. HALL.—Mr. Tomoana never said that we had made such promises.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—The House heard the statement made perfectly well. I refer to the statement made by Mr. Tomoana. When they are told that Waikato will be given back—when they are told that the Maori prisoners will be released—these promises were not made, I presume—

Mr. HALL.—Is the honorable member suggesting that I made these promises—that any such promises were ever made by me? If so, I will give an answer.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I should like to have the answer.

Mr. HALL.—I am asking whether the honorable member is suggesting that such promises were ever made by me.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I have heard so outside in the lobbies. I have not heard him make these promises.—(Laughter.)—Honorable members may laugh, but I say we are told that such promises were made.

Mr. HALL.—There is no foundation whatever for the statement.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—When the Maori members of this House are told all these things, promises are given to them that will not be fulfilled; they are simply hoodwinked to give support to a party that has done nothing for the Maori people. A year ago they insisted on the abolition of the Maori dual vote. What do they offer now? They make certain offers—certain promises that cannot be fulfilled. The attempt made by them last session to shift the Government from office failed. The attempt this session to get into power and retain it by means of a reconstruction will fail also, I believe. It is impossible to say what may happen, but, for myself and my colleagues, I will say we will be no party to any such proposals. If we are beaten, honorable members of the Opposition will be left to select members from their own side. Coalition, I say, is not only impossible, but unfair and dishonest, and not a single man on these benches will listen to any proposal made to join in the formation of a coalition Ministry. Of course I may be told they do not want me. It may be so. I will bide my time. I am perfectly certain they will not have Sir George Grey. He will bide his time also, and, to my mind, a very short time indeed. There are on this side of the House men whom the Opposition would like to have; and not one of them will join the new Government. We are determined that, if we are beaten on this occasion, we will stand with our own party. If we are beaten, we will take defeat in a proper parliamentary sense. It may be so—I do not know—but if the honorable gentlemen opposite succeed on this occasion by a vote or two, then their troubles really begin. Having got possession of the coveted stake, their trouble really commences. When those who are to be rewarded get their reward, the number who do not get a reward will be large indeed, and it will take the honorable gentlemen opposite all their time to keep them. I say to them, "You will have to do your own business amongst yourselves." I beg to apologize for detaining the House so long, and to say that if my advice were adopted we should go to a division at once. I think it is the best thing possible to bring the question to an issue.

Mr. HALL.—Statements have been made in the course of this debate which I consider affect my personal character. I do not propose to trouble the House to go into that subject now, but I shall take the earliest opportunity to call attention to the matter and make a statement. Until then I ask the House to suspend its judgment in the matter.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Was it something said by me?

Mr. HALL.—You will hear.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Divide, divide.

Dr. WALLIS.—The cry has been raised just now that we should divide, and that cry confirms me in the determination to address the House this night.

Mr. MOORHOUSE.—Divide, divide, divide, divide.

Dr. WALLIS.—I claim your protection, Sir, against what seems to me the rude behaviour of the honorable member for Ashley.

Mr. MOORHOUSE.—Divide, divide, divide, divide.

Dr. WALLIS.—As I was unable—through sickness, I may say—to address the House last evening, I think that I am not transgressing what is right when I persist to-night in making a few remarks in connection with the important subject before the House. I stand, Sir, in a very peculiar position—in a different position perhaps from any other member of this House. I learn from the newspapers this morning that I am virtually standing, as it were, with a rope round my neck, and that if this House chose to pull it tight I should be lifted up from the floor of the House into thin air. Statements have been made here to which I would briefly refer. It has been said, for instance, that this debate has been characterized by a tone of speaking very superior to what we had in an analogous debate during the last session of Parliament. Speaking of that, I can assure the young members of this House that we who were members of this House before know perfectly well—at least, I do—that there is not the slightest ground for affirming that the tone of debate has been better than it was in July and August last. In what respect is it better? I certainly admit that the leader of the Opposition on that occasion and the Hon. the Premier did give some hard blows to each other; but the present debate has been characterized by something which did not exist in that former debate. There has been, what people in the Scotch language say, “Claw you my back and I’ll claw yours.” The past is the parent of the present, and I would refer a little to the Opposition of the past, in order to throw some light on the conduct of the Opposition which is now in the House. I believe that every person here is now convinced that the Opposition of last Parliament blundered egregiously. When the usual Address in reply to His Excellency’s Speech was moved the leader of the Opposition then tabled an amendment to the effect that His Excellency’s present Advisers had so mismanaged the business of the country that they did not possess the confidence of the House. This charge of maladministration was deemed to be proved by the late Parliament. The Opposition of that time, it ought to be observed, neither praised nor blamed the policy of the Government. When they were asked whether they would carry out the liberal measures enunciated in the Governor’s Speech they declined to answer; they rather disingenuously avoided giving a distinct Yes or No to that question. Many of them were Liberals. They were under the necessity of securing the antiquated and Conservative supporters, and therefore they declined to pledge themselves. They declined to pledge themselves to carry out the Liberal policy of last session, and, in declining to do that, they secured certain votes. By ingeniously combining together the antiquated Conservatives on their own side of the House and weak-kneed Liberal members on this side of the House, they obtained the majority which carried the no-confidence amendment and led to a dissolution. The Government were condemned for maladministration, and an appeal was made to the constituencies; and the electors of the colony, being appealed to, took little or no notice of the maladministration that was alleged, but they returned to this House an overwhelming majority of members all pledged to carry out the liberal—I may say democratic—measures enunciated in the Governor’s Speech. They were all pledged to carry those measures out. If we carry out our pledges—if we do what we were sent here to do—then there must be a dissolution at the end of this session, and the first session of the seventh Parliament of New Zealand must be its last session. A dissolution is inevitable if we are to carry out the measures which we were sent here to assist in carrying out. What have the Opposition done? They have drawn a herring across the scent. They tell us: You shall have your liberal measures, provided you first turn out the present occupants of the Government benches—if you accept those measures on that condition. The amendment now before the House shows that the present Opposition are not one whit wiser than the members of the late Opposition. As I have already said, the majority of members have been returned for the purpose of giving effect to certain important constitutional measures, such as the extension of the franchise, the shortening of the duration of Parliament, and the redistribution of seats on the basis of population. These few measures might be carried in a fortnight, or a month at the furthest; and, when these measures have been carried, then will be the time for making another appeal to the country, and for taking a new departure. These measures are greatly required in the present circumstances of the colony. Following in the footsteps of their predecessors, the present members of the Opposition have tabled an amendment, the effect of which would be to postpone indefinitely the carrying out of these important constitutional measures. What is the amendment they have tabled? I will prove to this honorable House, by the wording of it, that it is insolent, deceptive, and unconstitutional. We were sent here for the purpose of giving effect to the wishes and desires of the people of this country. The leader of the Opposition, in moving the amendment, affirms that we, the members of this House, are prepared to give effect to the desires of the people. How condescending! Is not such condescension really insolence? Again, the amendment appears to me to be deceptive. Pray, what is the meaning of it? I attach a certain meaning to the amendment—that we agree to give effect to certain measures. Other people attach another meaning to that amendment. You may put a dozen interpretations upon the amendment which the leader of the Opposition has laid before the House. Again, the amendment is unconstitutional. Our form of government is Cabinet government. The members of the Cabinet all join together, with the Premier as it were binding them together. The amendment is unconstitutional in this respect, that it proposes to separate those members, and finds fault with the Ministry as now constituted. They do not condescend to tell us which of the Ministers they wish to get rid of, and in that respect the amendment seems to me to be unconstitutional. If this amendment is carried, and those who have brought it forward come across to this side of the House, then I am convinced they will no longer trouble themselves with the extension of the franchise, or triennial Parliaments, or a redistribution of the constituencies. Farewell, Sir—a long farewell—to all attempts to improve the Constitution of this colony. We shall fall back into the old jog-trot state of things which the Premier has been endeavouring to rescue us from. There will come once again a reign of dulness and of governing families, and we shall then obtain that political rest which the honorable member for Egmont was so anxious for some two years ago. The wishes, desires, and aspirations of the people will be disappointed. Sir, the amendment now before the House alludes vaguely to the policy of the Government, the policy which the Opposition intend to follow, the measures which are mentioned in His Excellency's Speech. These are measures which the Colony of New Zealand, in the present stage of its history, really requires. At the beginning of a country's history we should endeavour to give to the country a good, sound, solid Constitution; and that, Sir, is what the Premier and his colleagues are endeavouring to do by bringing forward the aforesaid constitutional measures. We are just now founding a new nation, and the foundations which we are laying should be broad, and deep, and strong, and just. The way to lay such foundations at this period of our history is to pass such measures as were referred to in the Governor's Speech. The colony at the present day requires these measures to be given effect to. In this time of enlightenment and independence it is dangerous, it is demoralizing, not to give every class of the people a vote connected with the government of the country; in this time of change and progress even three years seem to be too long a period to invest the representatives with power; and in these times the growing sense of justice amongst us rebels against one man having twice or thrice or ten times the voting or electoral power of another man. Under these circumstances the measures to which I have referred are urgently required in this colony. The Government have brought forward these measures, they are here to pass them, and, by passing them, to amend and extend the Constitution. They have worked to bring these things pass. Sir George Grey has laboured earnestly and energetically in order to educate the people into the acceptance of these important and progressive measures. He deserves all credit for what he has done in this respect. The people of New Zealand are now eager for the measures; which have been treated with such half-heartedness by the leader of the Opposition and by the honorable member for Kaiapoi. The Government have educated the people, and made them ready for these measures; and what are the members of the Opposition now doing? They are determined that the Government shall somehow be baffled in their endeavour to carry out these measures, and the way in which it is proposed to baffle them is this: they profess to be in favour of the measures, but say, "Let us turn these gentlemen off the Treasury benches, and then we will carry these measures ourselves." The honorable leader and members of the Opposition no doubt profess at the present time to be favourable to these important measures. I am fully confident that they would promise that if they were only on the Treasury benches they would give us an extension of the suffrage, triennial Parliaments, and more equal electoral power; but I am at the same time equally confident that if they were once on the Treasury benches such pressure would be brought to bear on them by the fossilized members of their party as would compel them to wriggle out of their promises. They could not help doing so. They know the present Government have educated the people to receive these measures, yet they now ask us to turn the Government off their seats before they will consent to these measures being passed. They say virtually, "Turn them off, put us on, and then we will give you all you want. Indeed, there is nothing at variance with our old professions, nothing at variance with our former practice, that we will not accede to if you will consent to put us at the head of affairs." But, if they were once on this side of the House, I am convinced that they would change their minds. They would see things in a different light from that in which they see them now. We should find that, if they were on this side of the House, and carried these measures, there would be a necessity for a dissolution; and they are not prepared to face the country. If the leader of the Opposition were to go to the country, and if he were to stand on the hustings, where members are sometimes roughly treated, the first question his constituents would put to him would be, "Is it true you stole the clothes of Sir George Grey while he was bathing?" They would never pass these measures. Suppose they were in office. We should have the honorable member for Selwyn as Prime Minister, and it is said the honorable member for Bruce will be Colonial Treasurer, and I think the honorable member for Geraldine is to be Minister for Public Works. I am not in the secrets of the Opposition, and I do not know for certain, but these are the rumours. I do not know who is to be Postmaster-General, for instance. I know that the present Government, in appointing a Postmaster-General, selected the most kind-hearted man that they could find, but other Governments have always selected the weakest-minded men. Well, this Cabinet meet together for the first time; and what do they do? The question before them is how to get out of it—how not to do it. They have promised to carry these measures, and they want to get out of the promise. At the Cabinet meeting the Premier, seconded by the honorable member for Egmont, says, "We will get out of it in this way: We will knock the whole thing on the head—we will propose quadrennial Parliaments instead of triennial Parliaments." Another member of the party says, "Oh! that will not do: what we must do will be to emasculate the measures; we must tone them down until the democratic vigour has departed out of them." Another gentleman says, "Oh, there is a better course than that. We have been elected for five years. We will postpone carrying the measures until the present Parliament has got into its dotage, four or five years hence." That will be agreed to. They will come down to this House, and these measures, which seem to us immensely important, will be indefinitely postponed. That is how they are to get out of this difficulty. The amendment which is now before the House condemns more particularly the personnel of the Ministry. It is a remarkable fact that there is in it no allusion whatever to the question of maladministration. I beg the House to notice this: Here is an amendment which does not refer to maladministration;

yet every speech has been directed to the question of maladministration. That is singular. I am aware that, in speeches in connection with the Address in Reply, and in connection with motions of no confidence, every latitude is allowed; but it is a latitude which is altogether improper if it allows a debate to be carried on in connection with a subject that is not so much as alluded to in the amendment itself. Those gentlemen have all addressed the House on what they have called the maladministration of the Government. A few faults and weaknesses—perhaps a few errors—of the Government have been collected or invented—I do not know which—and these errors or weaknesses on the part of the Government have been set before the House in the darkest colours by the orators of the Opposition. It must be admitted that there may have been some truth in the charges brought by the Opposition against the Ministry. It is a fact that all Ministries blunder; but the present Ministry, in my opinion, has blundered vastly less than the “continuous Ministry” before them, or any other Ministry anterior to them. All Ministries are too prone to make promises which they cannot keep, to interfere in matters in which they ought not to interfere, and to be more extravagant with the money of the country than they ought to be. All Ministries are more or less liable to do these things; and it is very gratifying to members like myself when we see remarkable watchfulness against maladministration, even if the motive which influences that watchfulness is somewhat questionable. We like to see watchfulness: but we should be just and merciful. We should endeavour to do justice even to our enemies, and we should remember this, that it is almost impossible for a weak Government to escape from errors of this description. The “continuous Ministry” was a strong Ministry, and they had no excuse for the errors and the mistakes which they made; but a weak Ministry has excuses. A Government which holds office only upon the votes of the trimmers or the independents of the House cannot help, at times, doing wrong. A weak Government is always tempted to play fast-and-loose with promises, to exercise patronage in a peculiar manner, and to keep the bait dangling before gentlemen of easy virtue. Throughout this debate I have been much struck with one thing, and that is, that the faults or mistakes of the Government pointed out in the debate a month ago have not been so much as alluded to in this debate. We heard a great deal then about the Tapanui Railway job. What has become of it? I have not heard a word about it in this debate. We heard a great deal about the £2,000 given to Mr. Larnach, and yet, with the exception of the allusion of the honorable member for Kaiapoi this afternoon, it has not even been alluded to in this debate. We also heard then a great deal about the vast amount of improper patronage of which the Government had been guilty, but nothing of that sort has been said this session in my presence. Again, such objections as these have been made against the Government: We are told the law has not been properly administered. But there has been no evidence to show that the laws of the country are not administered as well now as when the last Ministry was in office. A great deal has been made of the neglect of lunatic asylums, and the honorable member for Selwyn appeared to take a great interest in that matter. I too take a great interest in lunatic asylums. I have been an inmate of a lunatic asylum for a whole year. Some honorable members appear to be astonished. An honorable gentleman near me looks at me as though I would bite him. Another appears to think, “It must have been a very well-conducted asylum, for you are certainly quite cured.” I was there, Sir, as surgeon to the asylum, and not as a patient; and I have always taken a very great interest in matters of this kind. I say no evidence has been given to us to show that there has been any neglect in this respect. But the thing which has most amused me in this debate is the complaint made against the Ministry of interfering with the elections. Floods of indignation have been poured out against them for what they have done in connection with these elections. Sir, we all know that it is with Ministries as with individuals—“Self-preservation is the first law”—and I ask, If these very gentlemen who have been accusing Ministers of improperly interfering with the elections had been in office, would they have acted differently? I will promise them my vote if any one of them will dare to rise up and, without laugh or blush, say they would not have done the same things if they had been in office. Not one of them, without laughter or blushing, could make that assertion. The existence of a Ministry is at stake, and the telegraph is at hand. They may use it, surely? They constantly do use it for all sorts of purposes; and it may be that in sending a telegram they have made a mistake, and not paid for it. It is the same thing with reference to the railway, and with reference to the “Hinemoa.” I say, if the leaders of the Opposition had been in office, and if they were told that they would get two or three seats in Auckland if only the honorable member for Selwyn, being Premier, was there in a day or two, he would immediately send for Captain Fairchild, and within half an hour steam would be up, and he would be on board his vessel; and would very soon be complaining that they were not going half fast enough, and would tell the captain to go at full speed, so that he might get to Auckland in time. It is perfectly certain that, if these gentlemen had been in office when the elections were going on, they would have done exactly the same thing as the present Ministry did. There is certainly one true charge brought against Ministers—and that is, their extravagance. I admit at once that the Grey Ministry have been nearly as extravagant as the “continuous Ministry” which went before them. But, Sir, till within the last two years or so this colony had been for twenty years previously under the government of a particular class, and that class had been teaching the Government extravagance for twenty years. Now, they have suddenly become prudent, and pretend to be economists in order to get back into the Government again. Who are they who first began the debt of the colony? I say the class now represented by the Opposition, and who are crying out for economy. Who are the class who stirred up the Maori war fifteen or sixteen years ago, and so led to extravagance? I say the very class who are now blaming the Ministry for extravagance. Who are they who forced the Civil Service into its present overgrown and overpaid condition but the class who are now finding fault with the extravagance of the gentlemen on those benches? Who are the people who bought residences for Ministers, and sent Home for the "Hinemoa"? Those very gentlemen who are now crying out against extravagance. Who are they who encouraged the borrowing policy, which, like alcohol, gives a little relief for a moment at the cost of immense suffering afterwards? Who inaugurated this but the gentlemen who are now complaining that the Government are not sufficiently economical? Why, Sir, it was the class to which these gentlemen belong which created the current of extravagance; the State ship got into that current, and all the present Ministry can do is to try and get that ship out of it again. The present Government went into office on the understanding that they would do all in their power to curtail expense; but they were not strong enough to do all that they could wish in that respect. One feature in this debate has pained me very much, and that is, the personal attacks upon the Premier. In the last debate, a month or two ago, and in this debate, very hard things have been aimed at him. He was charged in this House, in the last Parliament, and he has been charged in the Opposition Press outside, with being an anarchist, a revolutionist; with wanting to set up a personal government—a despotism; with setting class against class. Our venerable and worthy Premier an anarchist and revolutionist! The very idea is absurd. Statesmen who bring forward liberal measures, as he has done—are they men to promote anarchy and revolution? These are not measures that tend to destroy order and liberty. They are reform measures. The Premier and his colleagues have, as it were, kindled a fire under the kettle of reform. I remember, in reading the London Punch long ago, being very much struck with a remarkable cartoon in it. It was this: In the middle of the picture was a large vessel filled with Parliamentary Bills. This vessel was the reform cauldron or kettle. Beside it was John Bright, who was stooping down and trying to blow into a flame a coal under the kettle. It was a small live coal, and he, with his great strong lungs, was trying to kindle it into flame, saying at the same time, "I hope it will soon boil." I see that kettle now, but the figures round it are different. Instead of John Bright, I see the honorable member for Christchurch City, Sir George Grey. He is trying to kindle the coal, and on the other side, pretending to help him, is the honorable member for Selwyn. He is pretending to kindle the fire, but he is at the same time taking out a syringe and squirting water on it, while around him are a number of figures representing his followers and the Opposition newspapers, all with small syringes in their hands, pretending to help reform, but really trying to extinguish it. The Premier has also been accused of being an autocrat—of seeking to establish personal government and Cæsarism. Let me examine that charge briefly. I wonder if those who make this charge understand the meaning of the words. It is a pity they have taken flight and left the House, or I would explain the meaning of these words for their benefit. Do they know what "autocrat" means? The Emperor of Russia is an autocrat, and so is the Sultan of Turkey. Is our Premier like them? Do they know what personal government is? That is an expression which is much used by English papers now. Lord Beaconsfield has been accused of establishing personal government because he has been trying to give the Queen larger power and authority than the Liberals think right. Now, is anything of that sort shown by the Premier? Can they accuse him of trying to invest the late Governor, or the present Governor, with greater power? That would be personal government. They accuse him, also, of Cæsarism. That, of course, is the kind of government which prevailed all over the world during the first centuries of our era. Is there any resemblance between our Premier and the twelve or twenty Cæsars? No, Sir; no more than between the leader of the Opposition and the Devil himself. But I make a mistake: there is a resemblance between the leader of the Opposition and his Satanic Majesty. His Satanic Majesty formerly belonged to a higher and better sphere; but he left that sphere of his own free will, and finally turned up in a very bad world, whose name is never mentioned to ears polite. There, according to worthy John Milton, he was elected as representative, and was sent to this world. He came and played many sad tricks, and to him we owe nearly all our woes. There is, therefore, some resemblance between that personage and the leader of the Opposition. He, too, once lived in another and higher place, and left it of his own free will. He, too, turned up in the neighbourhood of the everlasting snows, and was sent here as a representative, and ever since he came here he has been stirring up bad blood amongst us. Perhaps I am going a little too far: I apologize for having done so. There is no resemblance in reality. The honorable gentleman is so kind, so amiable, so worthy, that I think it is a pity he has taken a part in the arena of politics. The Premier has been accused of setting class against class. All great men, from the beginning of the world downwards, have been accused of doing the same thing. Even in the very earliest times, such a great man as Moses was said to have set class against class, for he set a class of slaves against their masters. Then, again, patriots, philanthropists, reformers, both religious and social, have invariably been calumniated as turning the world upside down and setting class against class. I do not know whether the Premier pretends to be, or thinks that he is, either a great or a good man, but he has been calumniated and misrepresented and persecuted as much as if he had been one of the greatest and best of men. What in the world has the Premier of this colony done are given here. I then gave another quotation, of which I will now give the actual words. They are as follow:—

"In company with Dr. Traill, the rector of Schull, I met Dr. McCormick, the dispensary physician of the Parish of Kilmore. He stated that, on Tuesday, 9th March, he had met a man—a father—tottering along the road: a rope was over his shoulder, and at the other end of the rope, streeling along the ground, were two dead children, whom he was with difficulty dragging to the grave."—(Trench, p. 391.)

I may say that there are other statements infinitely more shocking showing the ways in which these persons perished by most dreadful deaths. Then, Sir, with regard to what Lord Beaconsfield said on the occasion, what I said to the House was this: that I believed that the effect of the land laws as at present existing was to harden the human heart—that the very landlords who were kind to their dependants in times of difficulty, and would give large sums of money to alleviate distress, yet appeared unconscious of the misery of the millions; and I said that the famine in Ireland was to be attributed to man, and to the laws which prevailed—laws which could be altered—and that the Government had been repeatedly—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the honorable gentleman is now enlarging upon his original speech, and going beyond a personal explanation.

Sir G. GREY.—I was only condensing, Sir; but I will not continue. I then quoted certain words used by Lord Beaconsfield. This is taken from the London Times of 20th November, 1868. It is a quotation from a part of a speech—all that relates to this subject—made by the then Premier of England, Mr. Disraeli, when addressing the electors at Aylesbury, on the occasion of a general election. After describing the deplorable condition of Ireland twenty-five years ago, he said,—

"But a greater power than man produced an effect on their economical condition. That happened in Ireland which was infinitely greater in its effects than any political or social revolution which ever occurred in any country of the world. The population was so reduced that the state of affairs—the monstrous state of affairs—to which I have adverted, that of a population greater, to the square mile, than in any other European country, and perhaps in any Asiatic country except China, ceased. And what has happened to Ireland during the last quarter of a century? The people are now no longer in the condition in which they were: they have better raiment, better residences; and they have much better food.—(A Voice: 'Three cheers for the famine.')—Well, you have given three cheers before this for things which have not done so much good to man as that famine. I was about to say, when I was interrupted by a voice that I think is familiar to me—(laughter and cheers)—that the progress of Ireland during the last twenty years has been more rapid than the progress of England."

Colonel TRIMBLE.—May I ask the honorable gentleman to read the context a little before and a little after what he has read? I saw the honorable gentleman this morning, and he promised to read the context. I would like him to do so, and I would then ask him how he can reconcile it with the words uttered by himself. He said, "Then, when a voice in the crowd which Mr. Disraeli recognized cried out, 'Three cheers for the famine in Ireland,' Mr. Disraeli assented, and three cheers were given; and, when finished, Mr. Disraeli said—" I apprehend, Sir, that that is entirely away from what the honorable gentleman has now stated, and also still further away from the context. I have the context on both sides in my hand; but of course the House will not care to have it except the honorable gentleman himself read it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The matter must stand over for the present, as the time has now arrived for the presentation of the Address.

Mr. KELLY.—Would the Premier favour us with the authority from which he has quoted?

Sir G. GREY.—"Realities of Irish Life," by Trench.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Mr. SPEAKER reported that, accompanied by the mover and seconder, and several other members of the House, he attended on His Excellency at three o'clock, with the Address in reply to the Governor's Speech, to which His Excellency was pleased to make the following answer:—

"MR. SPEAKER, AND GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,—

"I thank you for this Address, and for the assurance which it contains that the various measures that may be brought before you will receive your earnest and careful consideration.

"I am at all times desirous that my Government should be in accordance with the representatives of the people in Parliament, and I have therefore taken measures for the formation of a new Administration."

MINISTRY.

Sir G. GREY.—With the permission of the House, I wish to say that myself and my colleagues have placed our resignations in the hands of His Excellency, who was pleased to accept the same, requesting, at the same time, that we would continue to hold office and perform our duty until our successors were appointed; so that we now only occupy the position in the House of holding office until the new Ministry has been formed.

Mr. HALL.—By the indulgence of the House, I wish to state that yesterday afternoon I was sent for by His Excellency, who informed me that his Ministers had resigned, and requested me to form a new Government. After consultation with His Excellency, I agreed to endeavour to do so, and have since then been engaged in that task. I must now ask the House to be good enough to adjourn for the purpose of enabling me to complete the task. I had intended to ask the House to adjourn until Thursday, but I understand from the Prime Minister that supplies for carrying on the public service may be required before then. I therefore ask that the House should adjourn till to-morrow, with the understanding that, beyond Supply, no further business should be proceeded with, and that the House will then adjourn till Thursday. I shall then, I trust, be able to announce the formation of a Government which will command the approval of His Excellency, the House, and the country. I now move the adjournment of the House until the usual hour to-morrow.

Sir G. GREY.—I second the motion for adjournment, without in any way committing myself to the fact that the Ministry formed will meet with the approval of the House.

The House adjourned at half-past three o'clock.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

THE LATE SPEAKER.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—I have the honor to inform the Council that I have received the following letter from Mr. George Richardson, acknowledging the receipt of an illuminated copy of the resolution passed by this Council relative to the loss sustained by it through the death of the Hon. Major Richardson :—

“Dunedin, September 17, 1879.

“SIR,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 12th ultimo, forwarding to me an illuminated copy of a resolution of the Legislative Council with regard to the loss the Council has sustained by the death of Major the Hon. Sir John Richardson, lately the Speaker of the Council.

“I have to thank your honorable House for its consideration in forwarding me a copy of the resolution, and to express my deep gratification at the terms in which the Council has given utterance to the sentiments it entertained towards my father, the late Speaker.—I have, &c.,

“GEO. RICHARDSON.

“Speaker of the Legislative Council,

MINISTRY.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—Sir, a communication has been made to the Government by the Hon. Mr. Hall, who is at present engaged in forming an Administration, requesting our assistance in carrying through the Imprest Supply Bill which has only by an accident been delayed since yesterday. I need hardly say we are very happy to give as much assistance as we can. The incoming Government have not been sworn in, and it would be an inconvenient thing, and a discourtesy to this Council, to ask them to pass this Bill unless it was taken charge of by a Cabinet Minister. Consequently, I am here to-day on purpose to give such assistance as I can towards advancing the public service in passing this Imprest Supply Bill, which may be expected in this Chamber in the course of half an hour. Under these circumstances, I do not think honorable gentlemen will complain if I ask them not to press any business on the Order Paper, although, should it be the wish of the Council, and be to the public advantage, there could be no objection to appointing those Committees which may be necessary to sit in order to clear off petitions and other business. If that course is adopted, I would ask the Hon. Mr. G. R. Johnson to postpone his motion, and the Hon. Mr. Holmes likewise, and simply to take the appointment of all the Committees proposed by the various honorable gentlemen; after which I propose that we do adjourn until the Imprest Supply Bill comes up from another place. Should that meet with the concurrence of the Council, I should like to move that the Standing Orders be suspended in order to admit of the Imprest Supply Bill passing through all its stages in one day, which is the motion I now make.

Motion agreed to.

IMPREST SUPPLY BILL.

This Bill was read a first, a second, and a third time.

MINISTRY.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL.—Sir, with your permission and by the indulgence of the Council, I wish to say a few words in regard to the matter to which I referred yesterday. The Hon. Mr. Hall, desirous of showing that respect which ought to be paid by an incoming Ministry to this branch of the Legislature, in which there is as yet no member of his Government, has asked me to state that he has submitted to His Excellency a list of certain gentlemen whom he has proposed to be appointed to administer the affairs of the country. These are the names: Mr. Whitaker, whom His Excellency will call to this Council, will hold the office of Attorney-General; the Hon. Mr. Hall will take the office of Colonial Secretary and be Prime Minister of the new Government; Major Atkinson will take the offices of Colonial Treasurer and Commissioner of Customs; Mr. Oliver will take the office of Minister of Public Works; Mr. Rolleston will take the offices of Minister of Lands, Immigration, and Education; Mr. Bryce will take the office of Native Minister; Mr. Henare Tomoana will hold office as the Native member of the Executive Council. Mr. Hall begs me to state to the Council that he has not yet completed his arrangements for the Post Office, or the Mines, or the Administration of Justice, but that he is at present engaged in considering how these offices should be filled. He proposes, however, to wait until the arrival of Mr. Whitaker—who may be expected to take his seat in the Council, by virtue of His Excellency's writ of summons, next Tuesday—before those arrangements are made. Mr. Hall expresses the hope that the Council will allow me to ask for an adjournment until Tuesday; and therefore, unless there is any objection on the part of members of the Council, I will move, That, at its rising, this Council do adjourn until Tuesday, when Mr. Whitaker will be prepared to make a statement as to the policy of the Government. I beg again to say that it is out of personal friendship for Mr. Hall that I make this statement, and that, so far as I am myself concerned, it has no political significance.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—I have no objection to take against the proposal. In fact, I am sitting here at this moment entirely out of consideration and courtesy to the Government which is to succeed the one to which I have had the honor of belonging. I think it very reasonable that there should be a certain delay under the circumstances stated by my honorable friend, but I confess I do receive with some little surprise and regret the announcement that the Government which succeeded that to which I belong should not have been able to find a gentleman in the Council to represent them; and we perhaps have some reason to complain, as we have had to do in the past, that we are to be led by a gentleman introduced for that special purpose. I should have been glad if the Hon. Sir Francis Dillon Bell, or if another honorable gentleman who has generally had to differ from me, or even if my predecessor in office, had taken my place and been associated with the Hon. Mr. Hall; but it is worthy of notice that, in consequence of the course adopted, we are to have reintroduced into this Council a gentleman who in years past made himself so useful and was so great an ornament to the discussions of this Council. I have no personal feeling in these remarks, but make them wholly in the interests of the Council. I do regret that it has been found necessary to go outside our ranks to find a member to represent the Government.

Motion agreed to.

Christchurch Church Property Trustees Bill.

IMPREST SUPPLY BILL.

This Bill was read a first, a second, and a third time.

MINISTRY.

Mr. HALL.—Mr. Speaker, when the House last met I stated that I had been intrusted by His Excellency the Governor with the task of proposing to him the names of gentlemen who should form a new Government. Since then I am glad to state that I have been able to submit to His Excellency names which have received his approval. They are as follow: Mr. F. Whitaker—who will be appointed to a seat in the Legislative Council—will take the office of Attorney-General; I shall myself take the office of Colonial Secretary with the Premiership, Major Atkinson will take the offices of Colonial Treasurer and Commissioner of Customs, Mr. Oliver will take the office of Minister for Public Works, Mr. Rolleston will take the offices of Minister of Lands and Immigration and Minister of Education, Mr. Bryce will take the office of Minister of Native Affairs, Mr. Henare Tomoana will accept office as a Maori member of the Executive Council. The House will perceive that this does not comprise the full number of eight Ministers which by law may be appointed; but we have thought it desirable not to wait until the full number should be completed, believing that the number announced will be sufficient for the present to carry on the public business. We propose at as early a date as possible to complete the number. It will be seen that provision for the offices of Minister of Mines and Minister of Justice has not yet been decided upon. When the Ministry is complete there will probably have to be a certain redistribution of some of the offices, which we hope will include members from parts of the colony which in this list are not adequately provided for. The gentlemen who have agreed to act with me, having carefully considered the course which it is right to ask this House to pursue, have decided to ask for an adjournment until Tuesday next, for the purpose of enabling us to make ourselves acquainted with the state of public business, and of enabling us to mature the measures we desire to submit to the House. I feel confident the House will give us that fair opportunity which is always afforded to gentlemen in our position for not only bringing before the House their business at the earliest possible moment, but bringing it before the House in such a way as will really tend to the despatch of business. If the Government are not allowed that opportunity—if it should be proposed that we should go on with the business at once—it will be obvious to any gentleman of experience that an investigation of the business of the country, and a consideration of the measures we wish to bring before it, must be considerably delayed. We believe we shall be consulting the due despatch of public business, and also really consulting the convenience of honorable members themselves, by proposing that the House should adjourn until Tuesday next. I therefore beg to move, That this House, at its rising, do adjourn until Tuesday.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I think that the honorable gentleman is asking more at the present moment than he ought to expect this House to grant. He has been in Wellington for a very considerable time; he has had an opportunity of consulting those gentlemen with whom he is about to act; and I think that, considering the state of public business, and the natural desire of honorable members to go home and attend to their usual avocations, it is not too much to expect the honorable gentleman to be able to state upon Friday next the course he intends to pursue.

I would therefore submit to him that this House should not adjourn longer than till Friday; and upon that day, if he shows cause why this House should adjourn until Tuesday, I have no doubt the usual courtesy will be extended to Ministers; but I think he will have to show a great deal better reason than he has shown to-day. I am not going to move an amendment, but I would submit to the honorable member for his consideration that it would be better not to stop the public business for a week, but that we should meet on Friday, when he can make a further statement. I submit that his present statement is not sufficient to justify us, in the present state of public business, and at this advanced season of the year, in adjourning until Tuesday. I make these remarks in all fairness, and with every desire that the new Ministry should be able to take that position in the House which the House wishes to grant them.

Mr. MACANDREW.—I agree entirely with what has fallen from the honorable member for Akaroa. I think that, at this period of the year, we should get through business as speedily as possible. I would have no objection to adjourn from day to day, and to give as much time as reason requires to the honorable gentlemen opposite. I may say that, whenever the Ministry have taken their oaths, and are installed on these benches, I shall give notice of a very important motion. I am anxious to get that motion on the Order Paper as soon as I can. Perhaps it may seem somewhat anomalous for me to indicate anything of this kind from this bench, but in point of fact I am doing so as a private member. We have been relegated to the position of private members, and it is only through an accident that we are here now. I hope the honorable member will agree to adjourn until Friday, and, if there be any necessity for a further adjournment, I am sure the House will not oppose it. I hope the honorable member will accede to this. If the honorable gentleman does not see his way to accede to my proposition, I shall move it by way of amendment, although I would rather not do so.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—I must say I think the action of honorable gentlemen on the opposite side is not at all fair to the House as a whole. In the first place, I entirely disagree with those honorable gentlemen that it is either fair or reasonable to honorable gentlemen in the position of the honorable member for Selwyn and those associated with him to demand that the House shall meet on Friday, and that they shall then show good cause to adjourn until Tuesday. There cannot be too much reasonable consideration throughout the whole House given to honorable gentlemen placed in their position. No ground whatever has been shown by the honorable member for Akaroa for the action he has taken. All he told us was, that the honorable member for Selwyn had been a long time in Wellington, and had had plenty of time to consult with other honorable gentlemen, and arrange—what? Why, to arrange the basis on which the new Government are to meet this House under, perhaps, the most extraordinary circumstances that have ever occurred in the history of the colony. As a matter of fact, my honorable friend has only been a fortnight in Wellington, and during the whole time has been obliged to sit in the House and watch the course of the debate. I ask if this is the proper course for a reasonable member to take. I must say I was very much surprised at my honorable friend the member for Akaroa—who hitherto has had the character of a fair and reasonable man—being the member who comes forward and proposes one of the most unreasonable steps I have ever heard proposed in the House. Why should the proposition of the honorable member for Selwyn and those acting with him be questioned, when they ask for a few days to enable them to meet the House again, with their business in such a form that it can be placed at once before the House? We shall only lose time by meeting again on Friday. Another point I would press is this: that, if we adjourn until Tuesday, many of us will be able to go home and attend to pressing affairs of our own; whereas, if we meet again on Friday, it simply means that we are to hang about here for four or five days, when we have really nothing to do. If it is understood throughout the House that the ordinary constitutional and reasonable course is to be adopted, of giving the new Government time to make arrangements for the proper despatch of public business, we had better adjourn at once until Tuesday. If we only adjourn until Friday, and then adjourn again until Tuesday, we shall be doing something quite different from what has hitherto been done. I have seen seven or eight new Ministries take office, but I never on a single occasion knew objection to be made to allowing them to have time to make their arrangements. When the honorable gentleman at the head of the present Government took office there was no objection to his having time. The honorable gentleman asked for what time he pleased, and he got it. I do not remember any occasion on which a proposition by a new Ministry for time to arrange their plans before meeting the House was called in question. I am very much annoyed at the delay myself. I thought we should go on with the business as soon as possible: there is no one more anxious for that than myself. At the same time, I hold that, when an honorable gentleman in the position of the honorable member for Selwyn comes down to the House and indicates a day on which he will be prepared absolutely to go on with business, the House should not throw obstacles in his way, but ought at once to accede to his wish with that courtesy and consideration always extended to honorable gentlemen in his position.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—To save time, I will at once move, as an amendment, That this House, at its rising, do adjourn until Friday next. I think there should be fair-play always; and, when those honorable gentlemen have taken their seats on these benches, I have no doubt the House will agree to give them what time they require. To save time, I propose that we should divide at once on the question.

Mr. READER WOOD.—I beg to second the amendment. The honorable member for GERALD dine has pleaded, with his usual eloquence, in favour of the Ministry; but, if honorable members look back they will find that the practice has always been that the new Ministry should take an early opportunity of taking their seats on these benches, and of stating to the House in brief what their policy is to be, and should then ask for two or three days more before they commence the actual business of the country. What do those honorable gentlemen propose to do? Nothing of the sort. They have not made their appearance upon these benches yet. We have not yet had the pleasure of seeing them sit alongside one another. We have not heard a single word from their lips generally outlining the policy which they propose to pursue. Yet they ask now for a week's delay, for no purpose whatever, so far as I can see. They must be prepared, or ought to be prepared, by Friday to give an outline of the policy they will pursue, and of the general character of the Bills they propose to bring down. Then I am sure the House, if there is any reason for it, will be prepared to concede to them, as it always has done on similar occasions, a still further delay. But I must say I am surprised beyond measure at the course the gentlemen who are to occupy these benches are now taking, when my honorable friend the member for Port Chalmers has stated that he is anxious to have an opportunity of making a motion of a very particular kind. When honorable gentlemen heard that announcement they should, without losing a single moment, have offered to take their places to-morrow, to enable my honorable friend to give that notice of motion. It seems to me that they are endeavouring to evade the question—endeavouring to gain time, for purposes best known to themselves. I must say that I do not think the course they purpose to adopt under such circumstances is one which the general feeling of this House will sympathize with.

Mr. BRANDON.—It appears to me that the course pursued by the honorable gentlemen who may now be called the Opposition is a peculiar one. They talk of delaying the business of the country! I think the honorable gentlemen themselves may well be charged with delaying the business of the country. When last session they were defeated on an adverse motion, instead of at once retiring from those benches, they appealed to the country, and put the country to a very great expense, besides delaying the course of legislation. I think the position they have now taken up shows a spirit of factious opposition on their part.

Mr. HALL.—Before the motion is put, I wish to be allowed to say a few words. The honorable member for Waitemata has said that he is exceedingly astonished at the line that we have adopted, after the notice of motion given by the honorable member for Port Chalmers. I am exceedingly surprised at the honorable gentleman, who has had some experience of parliamentary business, having—I do not use the word offensively—the “assurance” to lay down such a doctrine as that. What has the honorable gentleman asked us to believe? That it is right and proper that a motion of want of confidence in a Government who have not yet taken their seats on those benches, should be tabled and should be considered before they have had a fair and reasonable opportunity of putting before the country the policy by which they ask to be judged. Those honorable gentlemen have said that we do not wish really to bring forward any Liberal policy—that if we were in office we never should do so. They are now proposing to do what?—to deny us the opportunity of proposing such a policy. The honorable gentleman, with his experience of the difficulty of the duty of a new Government placing before the House the real state of the business—of the difficult duty it is to prepare a policy, and to come down with the details to give effect to it—says, in his wisdom, that that can be done in twenty-four hours. What a miserable mockery of a policy that must be that can be matured in twenty-four hours! We do not wish to evade the question; we wish to meet it fully, fairly, and as promptly as possible, and that it may be fairly tried. The country will have it fairly tried. The honorable gentlemen opposite are doing themselves the greatest possible harm by adopting their present course. The answer they submit to the country indicates a most evident desire that this question shall not be fairly tried. The honorable member for Akaroa has stated that it is very desirable that no loss of time should take place—that honorable members are here at considerable inconvenience. I think the honorable gentleman ought to have been kind enough to make that suggestion to the honorable members on the Government benches after the late division. If those honorable gentlemen had adopted the usual course, instead of trying how they could possibly evade the consequences of that vote, what would they have done? Would they not have tendered their resignations to His Excellency the next morning—on Saturday morning?—(No, no.)—That would have been the constitutional course to pursue. They tried by all kinds of shifts how they could possibly evade the effect of that vote; but they have utterly and entirely failed—they are at last obliged to submit. Now, when they have taken three days to make up their minds whether they would resign or not, they give us twenty-four hours to bring down a policy. The honorable gentlemen are only playing into our hands; they are playing our game. They are not ashamed of such a proceeding; but I know their constituencies will be. Honorable members opposite propose to divide on this matter. They know very well that a great many honorable members have gone away, not expecting that this question would come on. I appeal, irrespective of party, to those independent members who wish to see fair-play. I believe there are many honorable members on that side of the House who are not bound by party ties, who will rise superior to them on an occasion of this kind, who will see fair-play, and who will give us a fair opportunity—that opportunity which we upon our responsibility ask for—that delay which we declare to be absolutely necessary to enable us to bring down a statement of policy. They will not deny that to us: I shall be very much disappointed if they do. For these reasons, I trust the honorable gentleman who moved the amendment will not decide to press it. I say that it is impossible for us, who have not yet been inside the offices—actually impossible for us, to come down on Friday next with a full statement of policy.

Hon. MEMBERS.—An outline.

Mr. HALL.—You gain nothing by an outline. We do not want to give an outline; we want to give you a full statement. In order to enable us to make that full statement at the earliest possible moment, you should not ask us to meet the House on Friday to go on with the business, but should give us time to enable us to prepare that statement. I trust very sincerely that the honorable gentleman will not press his amendment. I could quote precedents from the Imperial Parliament to show that a proceeding of the kind is entirely unconstitutional; but I do not wish to weary the House. I would rather appeal to the feelings and sense of fair-play of honorable gentlemen.

Mr. MOSS.—I heard with astonishment what fell from the honorable gentleman who we must suppose is now at the head of the Government. Until this moment, it was distinctly understood that the new Government would carry out the policy of the late Government. Now, for the first time, we hear that they are going to propound a new policy. To my mind this quite alters the whole position, and it might have influenced the last vote, which enabled a new Government to come into office. The members of the new Government are not yet sworn in. What is the cause of the unusual delay? We shall very soon find that the members of the House will be very anxious to go home. If we do not take care—if we allow too much delay—we shall lose the passage of those Bills on which we have set our hearts—those measures which the honorable member for Kaipoi urged the House the other day to “cart” out of the way. We want to see them “carted” out of the way. The honorable member for Selwyn has a policy all ready to his hand. The amendment to the Address in Reply declared that it was their intention to carry out the policy of their predecessors, if they succeeded in getting into office. They have got into office, and I do not see any reason why they should not be in a position, in one or two days, to bring down these Bills for consideration. Honorable gentlemen will have plenty of time to consider any other points of their policy when these Bills are passed. I therefore hope the honorable member will agree to the suggestion made by the honorable member for Port Chalmers, and not ask for an adjournment beyond Friday.

Mr. MOORHOUSE.—I had no intention of saying a word on this question, because it is as plain as possible that we ought to accede to the motion of the honorable member for Selwyn. We should remember that we are talking, not only to this Assembly, but to the gallery; and what would a discerning public think of a number of gentlemen who had the effrontery to come forward as candidates for the position of administrators of the affairs of the colony, if they came down and said four-and-twenty hours were sufficient to go through the offices in that enormous building on the beach? I am not prepared to have confidence in an Administration that can pretend to present a policy complete in all its details in twenty-four hours. The party to which I have for some time belonged have had no opportunity for the last two years to make an examination of the affairs in that building; and I think it is monstrous, in the face of the public, to expect the successors of the late Government to come down in twenty-four hours, without that diligent preparation which the country has a right to expect, and to state that they properly understand the affairs of the colony. I am sure the public would have a very small opinion of my honorable friends if they came down professing that they were able to understand the real state of affairs in twenty-four hours. A week is not sufficient to go through all the business. I have a very small opinion of honorable gentlemen who say that the affairs of the country can be properly reviewed, with all necessary appliances, in twenty-four hours. I say that Ministers would require to go down to those buildings and work most conscientiously for a solid week at least, before they could get a fair grasp of the condition of the country. I am not explaining my intention as to which party I shall support—I am speaking now as an independent member—I am thoroughly and most completely independent. The public creditor and the public generally would be very much dissatisfied with an Administration that would come down in twenty-four hours and pretend to make an exposition of the condition of the country. On the other hand, I think my friends on both sides of the House will say that I am justified in thinking that the country should be saved from the discredit that would follow the advent of a policy propounded, by whatever party, after an examination of the affairs of the colony extending only over twenty-four hours. I trust we shall not object to give the honorable gentlemen, who have undertaken to govern the country under circumstances of very great disadvantage to themselves, sufficient time to make a proper statement of the affairs of the country, and to prepare for the discharge of the serious duties that will devolve upon them.

Mr. MURRAY.—On the present occasion we are here as a jury to judge between two parties, and to determine which is right. The House, by a small majority, agreed with the amendment brought forward by the honorable member for Selwyn, which declared that the late Ministry did not possess the confidence of this House. We have not given the new Ministry an opportunity of stating why they should claim the support of the House, or of showing whether the change of the Administration was justified or not. Before those honorable gentlemen have actually taken their position upon the Ministerial benches, we are asked to agree to that which I consider is not a creditable proceeding—we are asked to censure them before they have put their policy before the House. I ask, as a question of fairness—that fairness which has always been the characteristic of Englishmen—is it right to judge men before you have given them an opportunity of stating their case, and to condemn them unheard? Such a course may be justifiable on the grounds of party tactics, but it is not justifiable on the grounds of fairness and justice. We have heard these gentlemen charged with having brought the no-confidence motion before the House from a desire to obtain office. The honorable gentlemen now on the Government benches will not allow them to take their places, but bring down a vote of want of confidence in them before they have assumed the duties of Ministers of the Crown, and that would appear to indicate a hunger after office on the part of those gentlemen who at present occupy the Ministerial benches, but who have ceased to be Her Majesty's Ministers. The country will have its eyes upon us at the present time. The people are there to judge us, and we are here to judge Ministers. Let the country not say that it is a fear of exposure that prevents those honorable gentlemen from giving their opponents due opportunity of examining into the affairs of the country. As to the question of policy, it is not merely the Liberal principles upon which most of the members of the House are agreed, but there are other important matters. We have got the Native policy to decide upon. There are very wide differences of opinion on that point, and I should be glad to hear a statement from the incoming Ministry of how they propose to meet the Native difficulty at present existing in New Zealand. We have had no statement of finance put before us. The country is absolutely ignorant of the state of our financial affairs, and yet Ministers are asked to state their policy on that important question without having had an opportunity of consulting public documents and ransacking that large building on the beach. We are told that it is with a view of furthering business that we are asked to meet again on Friday. I hold that such will not be the effect, and that business will really be expedited if we adjourn until Tuesday and allow the incoming Ministry to prepare their policy and place it before the House. Ever since I have been a member of this House it has always been customary, when Ministers, under circumstances such as the present, have asked for a certain delay, to grant their request at once; and I appeal to those honorable gentlemen who are supporting the amendment not to persist in a course which will expose both their policy and their practice to very grave misconstruction in the eyes of the public. I entreat the honorable member for Port Chalmers not to raise any trifling side-issue on a great question of public policy. As for the inconvenience of waiting for a day or two, I would wait a month rather than see any unfairness towards either side of the House.

Mr. ACTON ADAMS.—I wish very much that the honorable member for Selwyn would agree to the adjournment until Friday, because I am sure that the members of this House, as well as the people outside, are very anxious that the public business should be proceeded with. We have had a continuous party struggle up to the present moment, and the year is already getting old before we have proceeded to investigate and to take action towards carrying on the business of the country. I think that, if we adjourn until Friday, although we may possibly not be able to receive any statement of public policy from the incoming Ministers on that day, yet there is a certain amount of business which is not of a party character that may be taken without waiting for the statement of policy. I think the country is in an exceptional position, and I say, therefore, that I regret very much that exceptional haste has not been made on this occasion. Neither am I prepared to support the adjournment until Tuesday for the reason urged by many members—namely, that the gentlemen who are now coming into power should have until Tuesday to investigate fully into the conduct of their predecessors, with the view of raking up more charges against them than have been brought forward during the recent debate. I do not agree with that view at all. I most anxiously wish to proceed with the business of the country. We have already said that the honorable gentlemen who are still sitting on the Government benches do not possess our confidence; and, having said that, I do not wish that we should go any further, and I have no desire that public business should be delayed by any further effort to prove that they are incapable. But I agree that we should wait until Tuesday for the statement of policy from the incoming Ministry. If the honorable gentlemen who still occupy the Government benches say, as the honorable member for Port Chalmers said, that they are coming down with a vote of no-confidence forthwith, I shall be compelled to vote with my party and support the adjournment until Tuesday, because the question then becomes distinctly a party one. But I regret very much that the honorable member for Selwyn does not see his way to meet the House on Friday, and go on with some of the business of the country. I am quite sure that the country will cry out if we waste any more time in purely party struggles.

Mr. McLEAN.—I am very much surprised at the want of courtesy shown by the other side of the House in refusing the adjournment until Tuesday. I do not think a case has ever occurred before where such a refusal has been given. It is very possible that the present course is being adopted because of the desire to take advantage of the absence of a number of members on this side of the House; but it goes far to satisfy me that there is a great deal in what we have heard about these terrible scandals in connection with the Government offices—scandals about vouchers not being passed by the Audit; and it is important that the Government which is about to take office should have an opportunity of investigating these matters, and of coming down to the House with a statement which will allay the rumours, or establish their truth. This, Sir, is a serious matter, in my estimation, because I maintain that the incoming Government should adopt the words used by the Premier when he took office: "Off these benches we shall not go until we have had a full investigation of all these scandals." That is what will have to be done. It is no use those honorable gentlemen trying to burke the thing, and to get their friends in power, and to cover up those matters. I am utterly astonished that honorable members from whom one would expect fair-play should back up those honorable gentlemen in the course they propose to take. It is all the same to me what Government is in office—so long as I see honest men in power, I will support them, and I say that we are putting a number of men in power at the present moment whose honesty is above suspicion. They are men whom this country can trust; and, on the other hand, New Zealand is ringing from end to end with scandals connected with those honorable gentlemen who are now leaving the Government benches. I dare those honorable gentlemen to say that these scandals shall not be investigated—that honorable gentlemen are to sit there quietly, and not allow us to inquire into them.

Mr. MACANDREW.—Name.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable gentleman will get "name" quickly enough; I am not going to refer to any particular parties. There are different matters, and I will not single out one Minister. Those honorable gentlemen know that these scandals are flying about the country, and they ought to be the first to demand from this House a Committee to investigate them. What are they doing? They are adopting a course which is without precedent in parliamentary history, and are denying the incoming Government a fair trial. I do not believe yet that this House will deny those honorable gentlemen a fair trial and an opportunity of investigating these scandals we hear of. So far as the adjournment is concerned, I care little myself whether it is until Friday or Tuesday. If Friday is fixed, a further adjournment can take place until Tuesday, if necessary. Of course, if the matter is pressed to a division, I shall vote for the adjournment until Tuesday.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—There are some gentlemen in this House who can never say anything, or do anything, or propose anything that would surprise me. But there is one gentleman who has spoken from the Ministerial side whom I did not expect to hear speak in the manner he has done. I once worked with him in this House. I thought, then, that he was a man who would never propose anything unreasonable; and I was very much surprised indeed this afternoon to find that even the contiguity of those benches had so far demoralized him that he could stand up in this House and support a proceeding of this kind, and that he could support it by statements that were not accurate. Sir, the honorable member for Waitemata has told us that we propose to take a week's time. Now, the honorable gentleman must know that we only propose to take two days—that we only propose to miss two days of the sitting-time of the House; and I would ask him whether, in the whole course of his long parliamentary knowledge, he ever knew of a new Ministry, on coming into office, asking for so little time before meeting the House with a statement of their measures. At the same time, I would ask him if, in the course of his long parliamentary experience, he ever knew a Prime Minister who took three whole days before he could inform the Governor of his intention in consequence of a vote of want of confidence from this House. If the honorable members on the Ministerial benches were so exceedingly anxious to save the time of the House, it seems to me a very extraordinary proceeding that they should take a longer time before they tendered their resignations than was ever known to be taken before by any Ministry in this colony, or, I believe, in any other colony. We were told by the honorable member for Parnell that we were expected to adopt the same policy as the late Government; and that therefore no time ought to be taken before the gentlemen who are to succeed the honorable members on the Ministerial benches should be prepared with their measures and their policy. I think that, whatever may have been said with regard to adopting the same policy, nothing was ever said that gave the slightest indication that it was the intention of this side of the House to adopt the miserable, ill-considered measures which we have had thrown down from time to time on the table of the House by those gentlemen who have spent all their time travelling about the country in various ways, and have paid no attention whatever to the preparation of measures to be laid before Parliament. We were told once, Sir, that a certain gentleman could go outside this House and in the course of half an hour could prepare a measure that would reduce the expenses of the country by £100,000; but that half hour has never been completed yet—that £100,000 has never been taken off the expenses of this colony; and I am afraid any precipitation on the part of honorable members on this side of the House might possibly lead to results of a similar character. I think there is a very great difference between the measures that have been thrown down before this House occasionally and real liberal measures. I pointed out the other night that I did not look upon the last Electoral Bill as a liberal measure at all. It was a most illiberal measure, and one that would put the electors of this colony to inconveniences in order to obtain the right to vote to which they were never subjected before. I think it would be most unreasonable to expect that a Ministry which has not yet entered the Government offices should come down prepared to carry on the public business with only one day's remission from the ordinary sittings of the House. No person is more anxious than I am that the time of the House should not be wasted; but this proposal is simply a proposal to obstruct business. The only effect of compelling the Government to take up their positions in this House on Friday next would be to delay the business of the country and force the Government to take a longer time to prepare their measures than they otherwise would do.

Mr. HISLOP.—The honorable gentleman is rather unfortunate in the instances he has given in support of the rôle he has taken up. Ever since he saw fit to desert the party that brought him into this House a year ago, he has assumed the rôle of the moral and constitutional lecturer; but every one of the statements he made just now proves his complete unfitness for the position, for all of them were quite inaccurate. Every one who was in the House when the speech relative to the £100,000 and the half-hour was delivered knows perfectly well that the honorable gentleman's version of that matter is not correct; nor has he correctly stated the facts connected with the motion for the adjournment. He said the members on his side of the House only asked for two days. What they ask for is a week. The honorable gentleman who is to be at the head of the Government stated yesterday that when the House met to-day he would ask for an adjournment till Thursday, and at that time it was evidently his intention only to ask for an adjournment until that day. Probably he has found that there are so many aspirants for the offices to be filled that it is necessary to devote his undivided attention to that matter; but what is it that this side of the House asks for? We ask the other side to come down on Friday and state whether they are prepared to go on with the government of the country. If they then say that they are not prepared to do so, we will grant them further time. Nothing could be more reasonable than that. The honorable member for Cheviot told us that no Ministry had asked for less time to prepare to meet the House than that asked for by the honorable member for Selwyn. He surely does not forget that when the present Ministry came into office they only asked for two days' delay; and the House is now prepared to grant the same consideration to the honorable member for Selwyn. Really, I hope the independent members of the House will not submit to be bullied by threats as to what the constituencies may say. For the last month we have been doing nothing but considering what the policy should be, and, if honorable members on the other side desire to alter the policy of the present Ministry, they have had ample time during the last fortnight to compare notes and see whether they are in accord with the policy which the country wishes to see undertaken. If they are in accord, I do not see why it should take more than the historical half-hour to come down and make a statement to the House. We do not want a Financial Statement, a Public Works Statement, or a Native Affairs Statement. I do not suppose the honorable gentleman intends to give us one or the other; but he should surely be able to do what the Premier did. He came down in a day and stated what the leading features of his policy would be; and, if the honorable gentleman will do that, he will satisfy the House.

Mr. BOWEN.—It is intensely amusing to hear it stated that an old campaigner like the honorable member for Cheviot was brought out by the honorable member for Waitaki and his friends. Why, Sir, the honorable member for Cheviot was an experienced politician when the honorable member for Waitaki was playing marbles. However, the honorable gentlemen is quite able to take care of himself. I should advise my friend the member for Selwyn to accept the proposal of the honorable gentlemen opposite, because it is evident that they have counted noses. They know that four or five members who always vote on this side of the House have gone away, not expecting that such discourteous obstruction would be attempted by the other side. Those gentlemen expected that the ordinary rules of courtesy and the ordinary rules of political warfare would be observed; but it is very evident, from the shouts of delight and derision which followed the proposal of the amendment, that the gentlemen who now constitute the Opposition have determined to take advantage of the absence of the members I have referred to, and to refuse the ordinary and constitutional courtesy usually granted to a new Government. I think it would be very unadvisable to take a division on a matter like this, and give the honorable gentlemen opposite the little crow they seem so anxious to obtain. It is far better that the responsibility of obstructing the business in this unprecedented way should rest with them.

Mr. W. J. HURST.—I hope the honorable member for Selwyn will accept the amendment. One or two observations made during the present discussion convinced me that the recent vote of the House was taken upon a wrong issue. It seems now that we are engaged in deciding questions not of measures, but of men. The addition to the Address in Reply was framed with a view to detract votes from this side of the House; but now we see clearly that the simple question is, Who are to occupy those benches? The honorable member for Cheviot says that the delay was occasioned by the honorable member at the head of the Government taking so long to send in his resignation. I utterly deny that. Upon a plain vote of want of confidence those honorable gentlemen would have tendered their resignations at once; but the resolution merely stated that the House had no confidence in the Government as "at present constituted," which, in my opinion, clearly indicated that the House did not condemn all the gentlemen on the Ministerial benches, and that it was in favour of some of those gentlemen continuing in that position. The particular facts of the case should be considered. Those honorable gentlemen who are anxious to get on to those benches ask for a reasonable delay, I admit; but why do the opposite side refuse, and ask them to come down to the House on Friday? Merely because they wish to give notice of a particular motion on that occasion. The present Minister for Public Works told the House this afternoon that he wished to give notice of motion on that day; and why should that opportunity not be given? I should be sorry to vote with the side to which I belong if the only object were to carry out the miserable device referred to by the honorable member for Kaipoi. I have no desire to take advantage of the absence of any honorable members. If I thought that was the object of the amendment, I should go into the opposite lobby without hesitation.

Mr. SUTTON.—I think the adjournment asked for by the honorable member for Selwyn is a very reasonable one: indeed, I do not agree with those honorable gentlemen who say that it is an unusually long one. So far as I have been able to learn, it is a much shorter adjournment than usual on such occasions. I would call the attention of the honorable member for Waitaki to the fact that the adjournment now asked for is an adjournment of exactly the same length as was granted to the honorable member (Sir George Grey) when he took these benches. The Government of which Major Atkinson was Premier resigned on the second Monday in October, 1877, and the first occasion on which the late Ministry met the House was on the next Tuesday week. The day and date are exactly analogous, and it was admitted on all sides that if Ministers had asked for a longer adjournment there would have been no time lost. We are all anxious to get on with the business, and I believe that the adjournment asked for by the honorable member for Selwyn would facilitate business.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, I think that after some remarks which have been made I owe an explanation to the House on a certain point. I shall not remark upon what I call the very unpleasant observations which have been made about myself and my colleagues. I shall content myself with quoting from an old poem,—

An auld Scotch scold laid hands on me;
"Stop on your way, base man," said she;
"Answer all scandals of the town
Answer the stories ganging roun'."

A constitutional question has been raised as to the day on which I tendered my resignation to His Excellency. Now, it will be in the knowledge of every member of the House that on Friday a vote of want of confidence was carried against the Government. It was one of want of confidence in the Government as at present constituted. These words clearly implied a reconstruction of the Government. The House does not meet on Saturday; the House cannot meet on Sunday; it does not meet on Monday; it meets on Tuesday. The Speaker gave notice that upon Tuesday the Address to the Governor containing that amendment was to be presented to His Excellency. Now, the constitutional rule is, that the Governor sends no message to this House that is not advised by somebody, and the constitutional rule, I believe, was that the Ministry who were in office when that vote was passed should have advised the Governor in his reply, and that in giving his reply he should state the course he intended to pursue to give effect to the Address in Reply. I have no doubt that was the constitutional rule. On Saturday the question arose whether the House really did mean a reconstruction of the Government. I believe the House did. I believe that was the intention. I believe that was certainly the intention of a good number of honorable gentlemen on the opposite side. I believe their intention was that I, amongst others, should leave the Government—that if I and others were out of the Government a Ministry could be formed which would be acceptable to the House. On Monday morning I waited on the Governor, and I informed the Governor that myself and my colleagues did, in point of fact, resign; but, as I thought, the proper constitutional course would be that our resignations should be announced at the time the reply to the Address was given, and I supposed that under those circumstances we should have been asked to advise as to the nature of the reply, and that the Governor would not send any message to this House that was not advised by some member of his Executive. His Excellency differed in opinion from me. Our resignations were therefore made absolute from Monday. The House ceased to have any Ministry after Monday virtually. I am here to-day, not at my own choice, but to oblige the honorable gentlemen opposite. I was informed by the Governor last night that they were to be sworn in at twelve to-day. That hour was fixed by the Governor. Why they did not carry out the promise they made to the Governor to take office at twelve to-day I have not been informed. I am not here at my own will. I feel some indignation at being kept here so long; but, believing it to be for the public benefit that I should submit to the indignity, that consideration makes me occupy this place now. I consider that the honorable gentleman opposite was, according to all constitutional usage, bound to have taken the vote of confidence as it was actually passed—that is, to have seen that it implied a reconstruction; and, if he could not accomplish that reconstruction, I think it was his duty to have gone back to the Governor and told him so, and to have resigned the task he had undertaken, and so allowed some other person to undertake a reconstruction of the Ministry. I think, then, that the wish of the House might have been given effect to, and that the task of reconstruction might have been satisfactorily accomplished. I conceive that that error has not only been committed by the honorable gentlemen opposite, but I think that no reply ought to have been given by the Governor to this House which had not been advised by some responsible Minister, a member either of this House or of the other Chamber. I am confident that I acted according to strict constitutional usage. For myself, it must have been a matter of absolute indifference whether I was in office on Saturday or Monday; it is absurd to think that the holding of office for a day or two longer could have entered into any sensible man's mind. I endeavoured to act in accordance with the rules of the Constitution. I believe that I perfectly achieved that end as far as depended on myself; but, I contend, it was the honorable member opposite and another person really who have not acted in accordance with the Constitution. I think that the advice I tendered—namely, that my resignation should be formally accepted on the day the Address was presented—was the correct rule to be observed; and I further think, Sir, that at all events the custom of the Constitution is this—it certainly has been the practice in this country—that I should have been asked to advise who should be sent for when I resigned my office. That, Sir, was not done. If I had been asked, I should have given such advice as would have enabled the wishes of this House to be carried out. I could have named a gentleman who would have succeeded in reconstructing a Ministry which would have been entirely acceptable to the House. I think, therefore, that, instead of my being the person to blame in this transaction, I have done my duty, and that the honorable gentleman opposite has not done his duty. I think, virtually, he has no right to sit on these benches, not having given effect to the will of the

Mr. SUTTON.—Will the honorable gentleman state the date on which the Atkinson Ministry resigned?

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—That has nothing to do with the question. Mr. Larnach had taken a week to form a Ministry; but now the honorable member for Selwyn tells us that yesterday—Tuesday—he informed His Excellency that he had formed a Ministry, and he asks for a whole week from that before he gives us a statement of his policy. Sir George Grey was sworn in on Saturday, and made a statement on Monday: so that he had only one day, and that day a Sunday, to prepare it.

Amendment agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Mines Bill, Mining Companies Bill, Oamaru Harbour Board Bill, Waitara Harbour Board Land Grant and Loan Bill, Masterton and Greytown Lands Management Bill, Real Estate Bill, Hawke's Bay and Marlborough Rivers Bill.

WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

Mr. MACANDREW.—Sir, I beg to give notice that on next sitting-day I shall move, That the Government does not possess the confidence of this House. Perhaps the House will allow me to say one or two words in connection with this announcement, with the view of expediting the public business.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—Order.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the explanation is objected to I cannot allow the honorable member to proceed with making any remarks upon giving a notice of motion.

Mr. MACANDREW.—Then I will move, That the House do now adjourn. I merely wish to state that I take it for granted that the usual constitutional course will be adopted on this occasion, and that the Government will not go on with the public business until this motion is disposed of. I wish to say, on behalf of the Opposition, that we are exceedingly desirous to go on with the business of the country, and anxious to bring this question to an issue as speedily as possible. If the Government do not object, we will go to a division upon it to-day, and will abide loyally by the result, whatever it may be. For my part, I have no doubt as to what the result will be: at the same time, we know that—

The best-laid schemes o' mice an' men
Gang aft a-gley.

In the event of this motion being adverse, speaking on behalf of this side of the House, I can assure you we will accept the decision loyally, and do all we can to expedite the public business and get the many important measures now before us on the Statute Book. It appears too much to expect that the Government will go on with this motion to-day, but, if I receive an assurance from them that they will make it the first Order next week, I shall be satisfied. I may add that, if the House decides to go on with the motion to-day and bring it to a conclusion to-night, there is reason to believe we shall be able to come down on Tuesday with a Government which will possess the confidence of the House, and which will be fully prepared to go on with the business of the country without delay.

PUBLIC REVENUES BILL.

Major ATKINSON.—I beg to give notice that, on next sitting-day, I will move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend "The Public Revenues Act, 1878." With the permission of the House, I may perhaps be permitted to say that the state of the finances is most unsatisfactory. I am in this position: that I shall have to ask the House, on next sitting-day, to suspend the Standing Orders, to enable me to carry this Bill through all its stages in one sitting, in order to meet the public payments; or else these payments will have to cease from the Treasury on Wednesday, the 15th instant. I will not on this occasion enter into a statement of the position of the finances, but I will do so on an early day, when I will place before the House the exact state of affairs.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

Mr. FINN asked the Government, without notice, What action they intended to take in reference to late proceedings at Gisborne? No doubt all honorable members had read or heard of what had occurred there, and he thought it was time some action was taken for the proper administration of justice.

Mr. ROLLESTON replied that at the present time there was no officer appointed for the Gisborne District, and the duties had been discharged by the officer of another district. The attention of the Government had been called to the question raised by the honorable gentleman, and they had taken steps at once to send an experienced officer to that district.

WAKATIPU AGRICULTURAL LAND.

Mr. FINN asked the Government, When they intended to throw open for settlement all available agricultural land at the head of Lake Wakatipu, Otago?

Mr. ROLLESTON sympathized generally with the honorable gentleman's question, and the Government were anxious to afford increased facilities for settlement and for placing people on the land. They had now under consideration a proposal to that effect, which would be submitted to the House. With regard to this special case, he would avail himself of any information at the disposal of the honorable member, and he would be able to give him a definite reply at a later date.

RENWICK TOWN TELEGRAPH STATION.

Mr. SEYMOUR asked the Postmaster-General, If he will cause a telegraph station to be opened at Renwick Town, without insisting upon a large money guarantee?

Mr. HALL replied that the Government proposed to run a short line from Blenheim to Renwick Town on receiving a guarantee of £60 a year, and a free site of half an acre of land for a telegraph station.

NATIVE RESERVES ON THE WEST COAST.

Mr. TAINUI asked the Government, When they intend laying before this House the report of Mr. Commissioner Young on Native reserves on the West Coast, together with all correspondence and minutes relating thereto?

Mr. BRYCE replied that the papers to which the honorable gentleman referred were being copied, and would be placed on the table of the House in a few days. He might state that they were voluminous, or they would have already been laid on the table.

RAILWAY TICKETS AND OFFICIALS.

Mr. ANDREWS asked the Minister for Public Works,—(1.) If he will cause all railway passenger tickets for use on the New Zealand Railways to have the amount or value of such tickets printed on the back thereof? (2.) If it is the intention of the Government to take any steps to cause the whole of the officials on the Government railways to wear a distinctive dress or uniform while on duty?

Mr. OLIVER said that, with regard to the first portion of the honorable gentleman's question, the matter had been referred to the Commissioner of Railways for the Middle Island. Up to this date no answer had been received. He hoped he would be able to give the honorable gentleman further information on the subject in a few days. With regard to the second part of the question, he might state that the officials on most of the lines of railway in the Middle Island were already furnished with a uniform or a distinctive badge. As to the adoption of the same system on the railways in the Northern Island, the matter was under the consideration of the Commissioner of Railways.

THORNBURY-OTAUTAU TELEGRAPH.

Mr. H. HIRST asked the Commissioner of Telegraphs, If any steps have been taken to erect a line of telegraph from the Thornbury Junction to Otautau, in the County of Wallace?

Mr. HALL said the Government intended to erect a telegraph line from the Thornbury Junction to Otautau as soon as the railway line under construction would enable them to do so.

RIVERTON-INVERCARGILL RAILWAY.

Mr. H. HIRST asked the Minister for Public Works, If any steps have been taken to re-lay the Riverton-Invercargill Railway with 40 lb. rails, as recommended by the Engineer?

Mr. OLIVER replied that the line from Invercargill to Riverton was now being re-laid with superior rails.

LAND-TAX DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BOWEN asked the Government, Whether any instructions were sent by the Land-Tax Department to the Deputy-Commissioners as to the principle on which valuations should be made; and, if so, whether a copy of such instructions will be laid before this House?

Major ATKINSON begged to lay the instructions referred to on the table of the House.

LAND-TAX.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked the Government, If they will give instructions that the land-tax in each county may be paid at any Post Office Savings Bank within such county? He had been induced to put this question owing to representations made to him by settlers in the Manawatu District, who had pointed out the great disadvantage of not being allowed to pay the land-tax into the various Post Office Savings Banks within the county, instead of into only one of them, to make a payment into which some of the settlers had to travel a distance of over one hundred miles. There were five Post Office Savings Banks within the county, and if the Government would be willing to acquiesce in the desire expressed, and arrange for the payment of the tax at any one of these banks, it would be a great public convenience.

Major ATKINSON replied that the receivers at the principal Post Office Savings Banks had been instructed to receive the tax and to give receipts. He was unable as yet to say whether it was a wise or proper arrangement. It would be impossible to pay the tax at all the Post Office Savings Banks, as they had not been furnished with the forms of receipt. He understood that orders had already been given that any person could pay the land-tax by means of a post office order, so that practically he could pay the tax at any post office where money orders were issued. Money orders for that purpose would be issued free, so that the person paying the tax would not be put to any additional expense.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

Mr. HALL.—Sir, before the House proceeds to the Orders of the day, I desire, with its permission, to make a brief statement. I may say that on Wednesday last I perhaps did not altogether do justice to the motives of the honorable gentlemen who objected to the adjournment of the House until Tuesday. However, reflection has satisfied me that the object of those honorable gentlemen was to expedite the public business which is before the House. Sir, we are exceedingly anxious to meet them in that object, and we are prepared to go on with the public business without delay and without interruption. I think that, in justice to myself, I may be allowed also to say a word in explanation of the reason why Ministers were not sworn in before the sitting of the House on Wednesday last. It has been said that that was done in order to avoid an immediate notice of motion of want of confidence on the part of the honorable member for Port Chalmers. There is no foundation whatever for that statement. We had been made acquainted on Tuesday, by the late Government, that an imprest supply was required for the public service, to enable necessary payments to be made. We had agreed to co-operate in procuring that supply; but the late Government did not receive the necessary authority from His Excellency until after the sitting of the House on Tuesday. It was necessary, therefore, that the Bill should be passed on Wednesday. Now, as honorable members are aware, the gentleman who is to represent the Government in the Legislative Council has not arrived in Wellington; and we had intimation that the Legislative Council would object—and, I think, not improperly or unreasonably—to pass a money Bill without its being recommended by a Minister of the Crown. If honorable members have been good enough to follow me they will see that we had only this alternative: Either to postpone taking the place of the late Government until after Wednesday's sitting, or to allow payments which were essentially required for the public service to stand over until next week. That alternative was clearly before us. I communicated that fact to the honorable member for the Thames or for Christchurch—I do not know which he prefers to be called—and I think he must have temporarily forgotten it when he stated to the House that he was not aware why we had not been sworn in. I am obliged to the House for allowing me to make this statement, because the matter has been represented in a light unfavourable and unfair to the present Government. I now, Sir, respond to the desire of honorable members opposite to go on with the business of the country, by making a statement, as far as can be done at the present time, of the intentions of the Government. There are some subjects upon which obviously we cannot speak as yet, because our colleague, the Attorney-General, has not yet arrived in Wellington. It has been impossible for him to do so as yet; and honorable members, I am sure, will admit that it would be improper for us to commit the Government on subjects upon which we do not precisely know the sentiments of that honorable gentleman. With regard, also, to the question of finance, there is another reason. My honorable friend the Colonial Treasurer has been engaged most industriously in investigating the state of the finances ever since we were sworn in, and endeavouring to obtain such clear and correct information as will enable him to state to the House what our real financial position is. He has got thus far: that the financial position is one which requires—to put it mildly—the very serious consideration of the House. More than that he is not yet in a position to state; but either he or myself will, if not on Tuesday next, at any rate, I hope, on the following day, make a pretty full statement to the House of what the financial condition of the colony is. And we now say this: That it is desirable that the House and the country should know our financial position with the least possible delay. With regard to Native affairs, my honorable friend the Native Minister has been very actively engaged in obtaining authentic information upon the several important questions which have now to be dealt with. Owing to what I must call the peculiar manner in which the business of the Native Office has been conducted of late, it is not easy to obtain full and correct information without considerable labour, and without some time; therefore my honorable colleague has not placed me in a position at present to make any definite statement on this subject. But, Sir, on Tuesday next we shall be prepared to state generally what we believe to be the position of the difficulty on the West Coast, and generally what steps we think should be adopted. We shall also, if we have time, consider the large, important, and difficult question of the alienation of Native land, and be prepared, I hope, to give an outline of the views of the Government as to the manner in which that question should be dealt with. We shall also refer to a question which, we believe, should be brought fully under the notice of the House with very little delay indeed—the question of the character and the extent of the purchases of land from the Natives by the Government which are now going on. That is a matter which, we believe, requires the early and careful consideration of the House; but honorable members will admit that it is obvious we could not make a statement on that subject at the present moment. There are, however, questions upon which we are in a position to at once state what our intentions are, the main one being the large question of electoral reform. It has been the fashion for honorable members on the other side, and for their supporters outside the House, to throw doubts upon the sincerity of the members of this Government and of members supporting them—doubts as to the sincerity with which they advocate this large question of electoral reform. Sir, we propose to dispel at once and for ever all those doubts, by proceeding immediately with measures of electoral reform, and by pressing those measures on without any interruption. I hope and believe that honorable members on the opposite side will not allow any doubt as to their sincerity to be raised by their offering any obstruction to the rapid progress and completion of these important measures. The Franchise Bill—called the Electoral Bill, but which perhaps would be better defined if called a Bill to extend the franchise—has not been introduced to the House. It is, however, in type—it has been left by the late Government in type, although not complete. There are some printed slips attached containing proposals which are conflicting, and which no doubt the late Government had not time to quite make up their minds upon. I have given notice to-day for leave to introduce that Bill on Tuesday. At the present time I will only say that we do not altogether approve of the Bill introduced by the Government last session. In many respects that Bill, as has been described by the honorable member for Cheviot, is not really a liberal measure—some of its provisions are illiberal. We propose rather to go back, and take generally as the basis of our Bill the measure which was passed through this House in 1878, but which was lost in consequence of a difference of opinion with the other branch of the Legislature. I say, “take that generally as the basis,” but we believe very valuable amendments and alterations may be introduced into that Bill from the one which was introduced by the Hon. Mr. Whitaker. We hope also to embody in this Bill a proposal with reference to the Maori qualification which will be admitted to be fair, reasonable, and satisfactory to both races. The next Bill to which I will refer is one that has already been read a first time in this House, and has been circulated to-day, and which I propose to move the second reading of forthwith. It is the Triennial Parliaments Bill. We believe this is a Bill which is desirable; but I will not go further into that subject now than to say this: The Bill which the late Government left behind them provides that the House of Representatives shall continue only for a period of three years. But there is this further remarkable feature about their proposal, which I think the House and the country ought to have its attention called to: that this Bill is only to take effect after the dissolution, or other termination, of the present General Assembly. That is the liberality of the late Government. We are to declare that the people shall have the benefit of triennial Parliaments, but carefully guard ourselves against any inconvenience. On this point the Government differ from their predecessors.

Mr. GISBORNE.—That was the Bill introduced last Parliament.

Mr. HALL.—I can only say that we sent to the Printing Office for the Bill which the Government had ready, and this is the Bill that was sent up to us.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I submit that the honorable gentleman is wrong in making statements reflecting upon members who do not happen to be on his side of the House. We are quite prepared to hear the intentions of the Government, but not statements introducing matters upon which there might be differences of opinion. I submit that as a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I did not consider that the Premier had in any way transgressed the rules of parliamentary debate in the observations he was addressing to the House.

Mr. HALL.—No one in the House is more anxious than I am to avoid anything which may give members a right to complain. I shall always be glad, if I offend unwittingly in that respect, to have my attention called to it. If I have offended on the present occasion it has been unwittingly. I wished to explain to the House what are the intentions of the present Government compared with those of our predecessors in respect to this Bill. The honorable member for Totara said that this was the Bill of last session. I wish to point out that the late Prime Minister moved for leave to introduce a Triennial Parliaments Bill;

the Bill was introduced, and was ordered to be printed; and when we sent to the Printing Office for the Bill this was the one we received.

Mr. GISBORNE.—The Bill had not been settled by the Government.

Mr. HALL.—Well, this is the Bill that we found. When the motion for the second reading is made, it will be competent for honorable members to afford any explanation they may choose. The present Government, at any rate, say they are ready to go on with the Triennial Parliaments Bill, and wish to do so to-day, without unnecessary delay. The third question is the readjustment of the representation. Of course, we entirely agree that readjustment is necessary; but it is a matter of considerable difficulty. We believe that population should be the first consideration, but it should not be the only consideration: and, therefore, we object to the plan laid down in the Bill introduced by the Government last session, by which representation was to be readjusted by a mechanical process, because that would prevent fair and legitimate consideration being given to those other elements in the matter of readjustment which ought to be considered. We propose, in the Bill which we shall endeavour to pass, to have it effected in such a way as will give to all portions of the colony the rights to which they may fairly lay claim, on the ground of population; but we do not approve of any scheme which should go the length of practically disfranchising some portions of the colony, as would have been done by the Bill brought in by the last Government. The only other subject on which I can now state the intentions of the Government is with reference to land legislation. We hold it to be a mistake to suppose that it is the interest of any class that the land should not be settled. We believe that it is indispensable to the progress and welfare of the colony, and that it is to the interest of all classes, that the land should be settled, and settled as speedily as possible. At any rate, if there is any class in the community which is opposed to the settlement of the land on liberal principles, with such a class we have no sympathy whatever. We believe that an improvement can be made in the present law upon this subject; but I must add that, in my opinion, justice has not been altogether done to our past land laws. If any one will examine the agricultural statistics, he will find that the settlement of land in New Zealand has taken place at a more rapid rate than in any other colony: still no doubt the experience of the past two years shows that further facilities are required. Especially with regard to deferred-payment land, the present law has imposed burdens which have proved onerous to an extent which never was intended by the House when it passed the Bill of 1877. The price has been found to be excessive; but this is not due to the provisions of the Land Act itself, but to those of the Land Sales Act passed in that session. At any rate, the question must be reconsidered, and we shall come down to the House with well-considered proposals on the subject. This is all that the Government is in a position to state at the present time. If the

to the other liberal measures which have been referred to. He says, "We will give them every consideration, and at the same time will put ourselves to great inconvenience to bring them down as quickly as possible." I consider this motion for adjournment is an exceedingly bad move, and I feel certain that an appeal to all persons of an independent spirit will be met with the reply that it was neither a fair nor a just thing not to afford the present Government the slightest chance to bring down the measures they ardently desire to bring forward. I will not believe that all the patriotism of the honorable member for the Thames, all the tact of the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan), or all the tact of the honorable member for Tuapeka can possibly keep a number of honorable gentlemen together to do their bidding in this fashion. I do not believe that those honorable gentlemen will allow themselves to be driven like a flock of sheep into any lobby. They are gentlemen of independent spirit, and will not be driven into any lobby of this House by others. I say that the sense of fairness with which I have already perceived this House to be largely imbued will induce those honorable gentlemen to give a decent length of time to the members of the present Government to bring down their measures and to mature their plans. I trust that in the course of my remarks I have said nothing to hurt the feelings of the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan). I would be the last to do so. I have known him for many years; he is a gentleman for whom I entertain the most profound respect; but I think he travelled just a little beyond the proper limits in the speech he made. I sincerely hope that, if we come to a division on this question of adjournment, those honorable gentlemen who have come here pledged to support this Bill will see their way not to be led into any lobby by any set of men who are endeavouring to place themselves on those benches, utterly regardless as to whether this and other liberal measures are carried or not.

Mr. TURNBULL.—I do not wish to be misunderstood as to the vote which I intend to give on this occasion. The question is not the second reading of this Bill, but whether the Premier will give an assurance that the notice of motion of the honorable member for Port Chalmers will take precedence on Tuesday next. There should be no attempt made to shelve this matter by a side-issue. The honorable member for Waipa has stated, and wishes to make it appear, that the honorable member for the Thames and the members on this side of the House are now going to oppose these measures. It is a most unfair way to put the question. If the assurance is given that the motion of the honorable member for Port Chalmers will take precedence on Tuesday next, we will let the second reading pass. Until such an assurance is given, I shall oppose the motion of the Premier.

Mr. McLEAN.—I think the honorable members of the Opposition have been put into a little corner. I will tell the House that, if the late Government had been on those benches, and had brought in this Bill, a certain number of their supporters would have left them. They were warned in the lobbies, and told that they dare not bring in this Bill, and now this is the way in which they are trying to shelve it. Hitherto I have voted against this Bill, although at one time I proposed the reduction from five to four years. I have always believed that is a fair compromise—

Sir G. GREY.—I rise to a point of order. I solemnly declare that no representation was made to me that we dare not bring this Bill in.

Mr. McLEAN.—I accept the honorable gentleman's denial; but, somehow or other, friends speak for him generally. He does not speak for himself. He is always in the background. I know that in the lobbies it has been stated—by one positively—that the Bill was not to come into operation until after the present Parliament; and what has taken place to-day concurs with what I have heard in the lobbies—that those honorable gentlemen on the Opposition do not want this Bill at all. They think this a good opportunity for shelving it, and hence their action. That is the fact, and those honorable gentlemen know it. An honorable gentleman has told us that many honorable members who support the present Government voted against this Bill on former occasions. No doubt they did so, but so also did the honorable gentleman himself. Why, Sir, he went into the lobby with me against it on a very late occasion; and yet now he pretends to be a great friend of the people, and to be very desirous to have the Bill passed. He has characterized the present Government as being brass, while he and his were copper; but I think he shows a great deal of the former element when he speaks as he has done, in the face of the action which he and his party took in 1877 in regard to this Triennial Parliaments Bill. The present Government have shown the sincerity of their desire to carry out this liberal measure, so that there shall be no more mere talk about it; and I, for one, shall support them. And I say further that that Government shall sit on those benches until they have had an opportunity of fully explaining the state of the finances of the country, or I will have nothing more to say to them. They shall have an opportunity of explaining the position into which the late Government have allowed the country to drift—a position which, to my own knowledge, is most dangerous, and which demands from this House immediate relief. I do not envy any Government which has to put our finances into a proper position. It will tax the ingenuity of any Government to bring forward financial measures which will meet with the approval of the House. It is very kind of the honorable gentlemen on the Opposition benches to want to force us to a division now, when they think they have a majority, and when they know that four of our men are away.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—Sir, I rise to a point of order. The honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) was not allowed to continue his speech when he branched off from the subject of the Triennial Parliaments Bill, and referred to the want-of-confidence motion. This will be a very lengthy debate if we are allowed to do so.

Mr. Whitaker

Mr. SPEAKER.—I did not observe that the honorable member for Waikouaiti was wandering from the subject immediately under discussion. I must request honorable members not to diverge into the want-of-confidence motion.

Mr. McLEAN.—Sir, I shall always be most happy to be guided by you. I was simply answering the statements made by the honorable gentleman who moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think you were out of order on that occasion.

Mr. McLEAN.—Then I will not proceed further in that direction. I will ask honorable members if they really wish to see this Triennial Parliaments Bill the law of the land. I ask those honorable gentlemen who have declared to their constituents that they are in favour of it, whether they want to see it shelved by a side-wind. Let them face their constituents, and say whether they really mean to support the Bill, or whether they want to shuffle out of it, as the honorable member for Timaru has shuffled out of it and out of other matters lately. He is afraid of it—he dreads it becoming law. He does not want it, but he dares not vote against it except by this side-wind, so as to gull his constituents. That is the way in which that honorable member shuffles and changes with his constituents, promising one thing to-day and doing another to-morrow. He wants to shelve this measure, which is popular with the country. Let us see how many others will dare to go into the lobby with him on this occasion, and yet will dare to stand up and say they are in favour of the Bill. How many of those honorable gentlemen opposite are really in favour of the Bill? I know one very active supporter of the late Government—not in his place just now—who declared that we shall not pass this Bill so as to make it applicable to the present Parliament. That, too, is a provision embodied in the Bill prepared by the late Government, and is therefore a fair indication of their opinion. It shows clearly that, while the late Government were going to pass the Bill, they said at the same time, “We will take good care it sha’n’t affect ourselves.” I say, let us affect ourselves. What right have we to pass legislation affecting future Parliaments that does not affect ourselves? I have not supported this Bill on previous occasions; but, as the Government has brought it down, now I shall support it and see it carried through. Let those who were elected to carry this liberal measure dare to go into the lobby with the Opposition; for I tell them that if they do so they will be trying to shelve the Bill. Let us take the division at once, and let it be clearly understood that that division will show those who desire to shelve the Bill.

Mr. MACANDREW.—No.

Mr. McLEAN.—I know the honorable member for Port Chalmers does not like this Bill. I know that he and I have always gone into the lobby against it. We have a fellow-feeling in that respect. I may, however, go the length of saying that, while I was ready to make the term of Parliament four years before the provincial system was abolished, I am now quite willing that it should be three years.

Mr. SWANSON.—I accept at once the challenge of the honorable gentleman, and shall vote for the adjournment of the debate, without any fear of its being said by my constituents that I do so because I want to shelve the Bill. No one ever asked me to support this Bill, but I told my constituents after my election that I should do so, and whenever the question has been brought before this House I have gone into the lobby in favour of it. There is no doubt that the country wants the Bill, and I am very glad to find that gentlemen whose feelings are against it are forced to give their vote with me in favour of it now. Let us pass it at once. I have often seen measures passed through this House at one sitting as matters of urgency, and I am quite ready to take the first, second, and third readings of this Bill this afternoon; but let us distinctly understand that we shall take the want-of-confidence motion the first thing on Tuesday, and have it fairly out. I understand an income-tax is to be proposed; and we have to readjust the seats, as well as pass this Triennial Parliaments Bill. All these are matters of urgency. Let us, then, get through them at once. I am ready to sit all night, and all day to-morrow, if necessary, so as to get through with them. I do not care what Government may be in power: if their measures are good I shall support them. I shall go into the lobby for the postponement of the debate, but, be it understood, not to vote against the Bill. In the meantime, if the Government will hurry it through as a matter of urgency, and you, Sir, will accord the indulgence usually granted at the close of a session, and allow it to be passed through all its stages at one sitting, let us go on with it at once; but let us understand each other.

Mr. BOWEN.—What does my honorable friend call “having it fairly out”? Does he mean that there is to be a second division on a no-confidence motion? I should like to know whether the honorable gentleman means that a vote of want of confidence is to be taken twice over before it is to be considered as having passed the House. That is what he must mean. The real reason for proposing the adjournment of the consideration of this Bill is to prevent business being done by the Government until the question of confidence in them is debated a second time.

An Hon. MEMBER.—There has been no vote of want of confidence in them debated.

Mr. BOWEN.—It amounts to the same thing. The leader of the present Government moved a vote of want of confidence in the late Government and carried it; and I say it is a monstrous proposition that every time a vote of that sort is carried we are to have a second edition of it the moment other honorable gentlemen get on those benches. It is an absolutely unconstitutional proceeding.—(Laughter from the Opposition.)—Honorable gentlemen may laugh, but those who do so have not taken the trouble to pay any attention to constitutional practice. It has been over and over again laid down that Ministers have a constitutional right to a fair consideration of their policy. It has been stated by

Ministers in the House of Commons that they would not accept any vote against them until their measures were fairly considered:

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable gentleman's remarks have no bearing on the Triennial Parliaments Bill.

Mr. BOWEN.—I was answering the statements made by the mover of the adjournment. The only reasons given for moving the adjournment of the debate had nothing to do with the merits of the Bill before the House. It was distinctly stated that we should not go on with this Bill because the Opposition would try to prevent the honorable gentlemen on those benches from carrying on the business. I submit therefore, with all deference to you, Sir, that I was only answering the reason given for the proposed adjournment, and was stating that it has been laid down over and over again by the best authorities that it is unconstitutional to prevent Ministers from carrying on the business of the country until Parliament has had an opportunity of knowing what their policy is. However, I will not dwell upon that point now, as there will be other opportunities of doing so. But this I will say—and I say it as one who is avowedly not a supporter of this particular Bill—that the opposition to the consideration of the measure is a factious interruption of the business of the country. I say, too, that, if the honorable gentlemen opposite are able to carry such an adjournment, the entire responsibility will rest with them of interrupting business at a most critical time for the country, and when, as they know quite well, every moment is of the utmost importance. I have said, "if they should carry the adjournment," for I have too high a sense of the honor and loyalty of honorable members on both sides of the House to believe that it will be carried. I do not think party feeling is so strong as to lead any one to vote against the immediate passage of a measure which he has openly promised to support. I trust no honorable member will so vote, merely for party purposes. Let us come to a division on the question, and the responsibility of obstructing business will rest with those honorable members who vote for the adjournment.

Mr. READER WOOD.—Whatever unconstitutional practice there may be in these proceedings, it comes entirely from the other side. If there is one constitutional course more clearly laid down than another, it is that, when notice of a motion of want of confidence is given, the Government, if they have any respect for themselves, immediately, of their own accord, propose that all business shall cease until that question has been determined. When notice of a motion of no-confidence in those honorable gentlemen is given, we are asked to give them a fair trial. Have they ever given the late Government a fair trial?

Mr. McLEAN.—Sir, you stopped me when referring to the no-confidence motion. Is the honorable member to be allowed to refer to it?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must call the attention of the honorable member for Waitemata to the rule I have laid down, that the House is not now at liberty to discuss the vote of no-confidence, and therefore it must not be referred to.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—May I speak to the question of order now, so as not to interrupt the honorable gentleman when he resumes? I confess I am quite unable to see how we are to debate the question before the House unless we also debate the question closely connected with it. The honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) moved the adjournment of the debate on the distinct ground that he wished no business to be proceeded with until the want-of-confidence motion had been decided. I fail to understand how we are to discuss the question of adjournment without branching into the motion of no-confidence. If any way were pointed out, I should be glad to fall in with it; but, if I were to attempt to discuss the question before us, I should have to begin by going into the whole matter, in order to show whether it was right to arrest the public business at this stage. It is worthy of note that every honorable member, except the honorable member for Timaru, has been called to order by you, Sir, because they were leaving the subject before the House. If you will point out what the exact order is in such a case it would be a great convenience to the House. For my part, I fail to understand how any honorable gentleman can discuss the question of adjournment without touching upon the position of the Government as it is affected by the vote of want of confidence.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have already informed several honorable members that it is necessary to confine themselves to the question of adjournment, and not to discuss a matter which is fixed for discussion on Tuesday.

Mr. READER WOOD.—I quite agree with your ruling, Sir. I was doing the best in my power to avoid the necessity of any interference on your part with reference to a point of order. When I was interrupted I was speaking of what is now a matter of history—namely, what took place last session—and I then intended to refer to the remarks of the honorable member for Waipa and the honorable member for Kaiapoi, and I apprehend that in doing so I should be entirely in order. The honorable member for Kaiapoi stated that we were refusing to give Ministers a fair trial. I ask, in reply, when did they give the late Government a fair trial? When the late Government came down last session and announced, in His Excellency's Speech, the liberal measures they proposed to introduce, they were not allowed a fair trial—they were not allowed to bring their measures forward. An amendment was attached to the Address in Reply, and the power of introducing those measures was taken from them. Then the honorable gentleman says that we are interfering with the Government, and that we will not allow them to bring their measures forward. Their measures, forsooth! They are the measures of the honorable member for the Thames. They found them in the pigeon-holes, and adopted them. What did we hear the other day? That they were not prepared to go on with the business; and yet here we find them already prepared with the measures which they refused to allow the late Government to introduce. And what was the course they adopted at the beginning of this session? Precisely the course they adopted at the beginning of the last. Now, Sir, I am speaking of a State paper which is laid on the table, and on which I have the right to comment. Again the honorable member for the Thames came down with his liberal measures, and again he is checked by an amendment the effect of which nobody understands, except that it has placed those gentlemen on those benches under false pretences. Now, that amendment—which is part of the Address in reply to the Governor's Speech—contains words which have absolutely no meaning whatever, words which I should characterize as strongly resembling the Abacadabra, and the "Heigh—presto" of the conjuror. We have all seen a conjuror put different liquids into a couple of vases, and, with a "Heigh—presto," pass the liquid from one to the other. Here we have a "Heigh—presto" by which the member for Selwyn and his friends move the Government from their seats and take their places; but, as to meaning in their amendment, there is none. If the intention of the House had been to pass a vote of want of confidence in the late Government, one could easily have understood that; but the vote was a vote of want of confidence in the Government "as then constituted," thereby leading members to suppose that there would be a reconstruction; but the honorable gentlemen took advantage of the passing of that amendment to place themselves on those benches without the slightest attempt at reconstruction. The proper course—the fair course—for the honorable member for Selwyn to have adopted would have been to have attempted a reconstruction of the late Government—to have imported some of his own side into our side, and if he had failed in that, to have gone back to the Governor and told him that he was unable to form a Government in accordance with the views he had himself stated, and in accordance with the meaning the House had attached to the amendment to the Address in Reply. That is the course he should have adopted; but, failing that, he has placed himself on those benches with a number of gentlemen who are more objectionable to the members of this House than any member of the late Government ever was. He has placed there members of that old "continuous" Ministry of which Sir Julius Vogel was the head, which started in 1869 and lasted till 1877; which has been the fruitful cause of all the injury this colony has sustained; which has been the cause of the financial difficulty the honorable gentleman speaks of, and which he would endeavour to cast upon the gentlemen who lately occupied those benches.

Major ATKINSON.—Oh, oh!

Mr. READER WOOD.—The honorable gentleman may say "Oh, oh," but how has this financial difficulty arisen? Simply out of that speculative system of finance which was originated in 1870, which has been continued by the honorable gentleman who now occupies the position of Colonial Treasurer, and which has broken down. I say that those honorable gentlemen have no ground to stand on whatever, and have no reason to show why the want-of-confidence motion of the honorable member for Port Chalmers should not be gone on with at once. This is not a factious opposition—quite the opposite. They know perfectly well that the very fact of their placing on those benches members of that old continuous Ministry has shaken the confidence of many who would have been their supporters, and that they are now in a minority in this House. If they have any regard for their position they will give the honorable gentleman an opportunity of bringing forward his motion, and not by any side-wind put it down the Paper, and thus prevent us taking the vote of the House, which they know has no confidence in them.

Major ATKINSON.—It is a very significant fact that notice of the want-of-confidence motion has been given by a gentleman who always and upon every occasion has opposed a Triennial Parliaments Bill. I commend that fact to those who say that there is no conspiracy to burke this Bill. It is also a significant fact that the honorable member who moved the adjournment has opposed this Bill on every possible occasion, and yet we are told that it is in the interests of this Bill that the adjournment is asked for. Now, I ask if anybody can believe that for a moment. If they wish to see the Bill passed, now is their opportunity; let us put their professions to the proof. But I would ask, knowing the character of those gentlemen for parliamentary finesse, whether there is not something underlying this proceeding of to-day. I warn the friends of this Bill that there is a danger of its being lost if this motion is carried; and I hope they will bear these words in mind. It is no breach of confidence to tell the House that not a single measure of that Liberal Government is ready to be presented to this House. After two years' incubation, their liberal measures are still in a hopeless state of confusion. Underlings have been directed to draft them, and never to this day have they received the consideration of Ministers. And will the House believe that those gentlemen would be prepared to go on with the business on Tuesday, when that is the state in which they leave their offices? I am not going into questions of finance on this occasion—I will not even refer to the speculative finance touched upon by the honorable member for Waitemata—but I will undertake, on Tuesday next, to give the House an insight into the speculative finance of the honorable gentleman whom we fortunately turned out the other day. I will show that the finance of the country has been greatly neglected, and that it is in even a worse state than are those wretched Bills which those honorable gentlemen, after two years' incubation, and I do not know how many years before, have left for us. The forms of the House will not permit it, or I would produce them, in order to expose, and expose thoroughly, the insincerity of those gentlemen in pretending to desire to have these Bills passed. If they were sincere, why were these Bills not presented last session? They have had six weeks since then, and they are not in a fit state to be presented now. If they had been in a fit state to be presented, my honorable friend at the head of the Government would have been prepared to go on with them to-day; but the Electoral Bill as it stands is simply nonsense. The honorable member for Waitemata says that we in 1877 did not give the honorable gentlemen opposite an opportunity to propound their policy, and he says that that was unconstitutional and wrong. Then, I would ask the honorable gentleman whether he wishes to perpetuate unconstitutional proceedings in this House. Surely, if we were wrong, his political morality will not permit the perpetration of the wrong a second time. He ought to show us a better example. But it happens that our proceedings were constitutional and that the honorable gentleman's are not. Upon what occasion did we refuse to hear those honorable gentlemen? Upon the first occasion they shelved the no-confidence motion by—I hardly know how to characterize it, but by—a method which was certainly opposed to all rules of parliamentary practice. When that motion was shelved by the casting vote of the Speaker, we had the pair of a gentleman who was absent, and the promise of the Government whip that it should be paired when produced. Relying upon that, we produced our pair, and then the Government whip declined to accept it. There is no disputing these facts; and if the ordinary parliamentary practice and the custom usually adopted amongst gentlemen had been given effect to, we should have had a majority at that time. Whichever way you like to take it, it was shelved upon these grounds: that it was unconstitutional to proceed to the condemnation of a Ministry until they had had an opportunity of declaring their policy to the country. That was the amendment which was moved by the Hon. Mr. Reynolds, then member for Port Chalmers, which was carried, and which shelved the motion. Upon that occasion the House affirmed, in the way I have described it, the constitutional rule that it would not condemn any Ministry until it had an opportunity of making its statement to the House. Now, let us come to the other occasions. Last session, when we returned, the honorable gentleman had been performing that humiliating stumping tour through the country, beseeching people to do what Parliament was only too ready to do if he would produce measures which would enable it to do so, but which he invariably declined to do—begging people to assist him to do what he knew would be done instantly if it were only submitted to this House. The honorable gentleman, instead of attending to the administration of the country, had been devoting his time to that purpose; and when we came back we found nothing ready. We find even now, after all this time, that there is not one of those Bills fit to look at; for this Triennial Parliaments Bill only consists of two or three clauses. The honorable gentleman disowns this Bill altogether as being in the form in which he approves; and this is the only one at all complete out of the whole lot. Instead of presenting those Bills in a fit state to the House, the honorable gentleman was performing those extraordinary feats throughout the country. When we came back we found the whole business of the country in a terrible state of disorder. Nothing was done, nothing was ready; and, by one of the largest majorities which had ever been obtained in this House against a Government, we declared the honorable gentleman utterly unfit for his position. And why did we do that? Because we had had experience of him—because we knew that the Queen's Speech was only talk. We knew, by what the honorable gentleman had been saying during the recess, that he was not sincere in his desire for those measures; and the House, by an enormous majority, declared that he was entirely incapable of carrying out the policy which he had been trumpeting forth throughout the country. Not only that, but the administration of affairs was most wretched from beginning to end. I have a right to claim that it was most wretched, because this House has declared it by a majority of fourteen. Therefore that is a verdict which no one can gainsay. The administration was bad in the extreme. Then, when we came back on the present occasion, I should like to know what right the honorable gentleman had to demand anything. If he had been a constitutional Premier—if he desired to support the Constitution and the authority of the people and of this House—he would have resigned before the House met. He knew perfectly well that he had not the confidence of the country. He knew perfectly well that the elections had gone against him.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

Major ATKINSON.—Of course there are some honorable gentlemen to whom facts are of no value. When facts come in their way they say, "So much the worse for the facts." That is the state of affairs on the present occasion. But the fact is patent that we are here, and the honorable gentleman there. If the country had not decided against him we could not have changed places in the way we have. The fact is still further patent that there are not eight men on that side of the House who believe that the honorable gentleman is fit to be a Minister. I never saw such—I was going to say gross, but perhaps it is not parliamentary—disloyalty to a leader as is displayed regularly, not upon occasions when men are out of temper, but on every occasion. In the lobbies you hear continually of the uselessness and worthlessness of the late Premier as a political man. That is the universal talk in the lobbies, not among the late Opposition, but among the friends of the honorable gentleman, and among men who actually voted for the late no-confidence motion, and who, in the simplicity of their hearts, think they are now going to keep him out of any new Government which may get into office. The honorable member for the Thames and Christchurch is master of the situation on that side, and, if the House should determine to turn us out, I caution honorable gentlemen who do not know the ways of this House not to be led into a trap in this matter. If the House turns us out, and puts a new Ministry on these benches, it will be a Ministry permitted to be there by the honorable member for the Thames, and on no other conditions is a Ministry possible from that side of the House.

Then, just one word with regard to the assertion that these measures belong to the honorable member for the Thames. I want to know his credentials for claiming them. I want to know his authority. Is it because he has stopped them from being passed for two years? What claim has he to them? They were introduced to the House years before he came into Parliament. They have been introduced while he was in Parliament, and he has failed on every occasion to give them the least support, and on more than one occasion he has actually gone against them. I want to know what claim he has to those measures. The only claim the honorable gentleman has on them is, that he thought it would be an effective electioneering cry, and he therefore got it up. The honorable gentleman is not particular as to any cry, so long as it will carry him on the top of the wave of popularity. I do hope and trust that honorable gentlemen who have now got an opportunity of dealing with those Bills will set aside party feeling, and will bear in mind that we on this side of the House have as absolute a right, in every possible respect, to be called the fathers of this measure as the honorable gentlemen on that side. There are honorable members on this side of the House who supported it regularly long before the honorable gentleman came into Parliament, and who have supported it consistently. Some members on the opposite side have also done so; but I say the leader of the Opposition has no right to claim it as his own. Judging him by his actions—and we have a right to judge men by their actions—he is the one man who has delayed their being placed on the Statute Book of the colony. Therefore I do hope honorable gentlemen will not be led away—I will not think that we are to be put off from an examination of the finances of the country and of other matters by such a motion as this—by the indecent haste with which those honorable gentlemen wish to cover up their shortcomings. I have had to give notice of a serious Bill to day, and I know the late Colonial Treasurer knew the country was in this state, and yet had not the courage to tell the House. He had not the courage to ask the House to pass the necessary measures, but preferred to trust to chance. Whether persons got payment or not was nothing to him so long as he remained in office. I would ask honorable members new to the House to give the present Government a fair opportunity of placing their measures before the country, and of submitting—and there can be no possible harm in that—the finances to independent criticism. Then, if they are not prepared to give us their confidence, they will not find us resisting a reasonable vote of want of confidence at any time. But we are bound, by the commission which His Excellency the Governor has laid upon us, to examine into the affairs, and place our policy clearly before the country. Honorable gentlemen opposite may be assured that we mean to do that, despite any want-of-confidence motion, or any endeavour they may make in order to cover up what would have been in a very different position if they had been the men they represent themselves to be—desirous that this Parliament should have control of the finances and all other matters connected with the administration of the country—men desirous that the country should possess full information on all matters. If honorable gentlemen on the opposite side of the House are what they claim to be, they ought to be only delighted to find any one willing to do what my friends and myself have declared ourselves ready to do at so short a notice. I do trust honorable gentlemen will pause before they agree to the postponement of this debate. It is a snare. The only desire is to cover up things which ought to have been known, and, whatever those honorable gentlemen on the opposite side may do, the true state of our financial position shall be known before we leave these benches.

Mr. MACANDREW.—I think the only true statement the honorable gentleman who just sat down has made is, that there are some honorable gentlemen whose facts are of no value at all. I think that applies to almost all the facts stated throughout the honorable gentleman's speech—they are of no value. What was one of the facts on which he laid the greatest stress, and which he repeated over and over again? He said that I had always opposed the Triennial Parliaments Bill. I have been looking over Hansard for I do not know how many years, but I cannot find any record of such a thing, and I do not believe any record exists, at any rate for many years. I do not know how long it is since I came round to advocate the Triennial Parliaments Bill. I admit I was not always in favour of it, but I certainly have been for the last three years, and have not voted against it. So much for the facts the honorable gentleman has treated us to. I wish distinctly to have it understood that, in supporting the adjournment of the debate, I and those acting with me are by no means opposing the passing of the Triennial Parliaments Bill. To say otherwise is simply drawing a red-herring across the scent. We have every desire that this Bill shall be carried. It is our Bill, and not their Bill. The Bill was in print last year, and was intended to come into operation at the termination of last session of Assembly. That is now a mere clerical error, which will be remedied in Committee. Our object in supporting the adjournment is to compel the Government to accept our challenge. I consider that a most unconstitutional position has been taken up in connection with the notice of motion I gave to-day, representing, as I believe I do, a majority of this House. To shirk that question now is unworthy of the occupants of those benches. I hope honorable members will not be led away by the childish charges that we are attempting to oppose or burke this Bill. Nothing of the sort. We are determined this Bill shall be carried through; and we are also determined that our challenge shall be accepted in a clear, constitutional way.

Mr. HALL.—Before the question is put, I wish to add one word to the debate. The honorable gentleman who has just sat down has asked us to observe some constitutional rule, some constitutional practice. That is exactly what we ask this House to do, and we shall be able to show, at the proper time, that constitutional rule and constitutional practice are entirely against the course the honorable gentleman is now adopting. There is nothing more clear, nothing more definite, and nothing more fully established, than that the Ministers of the Crown are entitled to a fair hearing and a fair trial. What is it that the honorable gentleman seeks to do? He asks this House to condemn us. For what? Is it for defects of administration? We have not had an opportunity yet of doing anything. Is it for our policy? He wants to deprive us of the opportunity of showing what our policy is. There is nothing more absolutely clear in parliamentary or constitutional rules than the practice which that great Assembly which should be our model distinctly lays down—that every newly-appointed Government have a right to lay their policy before the country, unless they are grossly unfit, by their antecedents or incapacity, to be trusted with any confidence whatever. I trust no honorable gentleman will go so far as to say that of us. I say, barring that, we are entitled, and the country is entitled, to what we now ask for. We do not care personally—I, personally, do not care two straws—when we leave these seats; but the country has a fair right to ask, and the country will ask, that those gentlemen who have been honored with the confidence of His Excellency, and appointed the representatives of the Crown in this House, shall have an opportunity of putting before the country the measures they believe to be necessary for the welfare of the country. As soon as we have done that, if we cannot continue on these seats by the confidence of the House, we shall be quite content to leave them. I say it is utterly unreasonable that we should be limited to Tuesday next, as that is a space of time altogether insufficient. Ordinary courtesy should compel honorable gentlemen to accept the statement that that time is altogether insufficient to enable us to come down to the House with a statement of our policy. The country will require that we shall do so. The country cares nothing whether Mr. A. or Mr. B. sits on these benches. The country wants the best Government it can get; and the country will condemn any improper obstruction. If honorable gentlemen opposite insist on our immediate removal because they have converted one honorable member who last week voted one way, and have persuaded him to vote in a contrary direction, the country will condemn it. The country will condemn any proceeding by which members placed on these seats are to be hunted out of office before they have had an opportunity of speaking to the country and telling the country what measures they believe should be brought forward. I do not wish to say anything harsh, but I say, from the insight which we have had into the offices, we ask this House to give us an opportunity of going further into matters. I ask honorable gentlemen to do themselves this justice, and not to deny us the opportunity of going further, and ascertaining that which we believe should be ascertained. If they approve of this motion at such a time as this, they will deprive us of that opportunity, and I say that the House and the country will not approve of their action. My answer to the honorable gentleman who asked whether we would not give precedence to his motion on Tuesday is this: We will not give precedence to his motion on Tuesday; we will go on with the business as soon as we have an opportunity of finding out what the state of the offices is.

An Hon. MEMBER.—When?

Mr. HALL.—I cannot exactly tell you. Those honorable gentlemen can tell better than we can when. The further we go the further we may have to go. As soon as we have had that fair opportunity which we ask, then we will give precedence to the honorable gentleman's motion: we will then not shrink for one moment from any resolution which may test the confidence of this House—we will then give honorable gentlemen every facility for doing that. If the House will not give us its confidence, we shall then leave these seats; we shall not take three days to consider whether we shall resign or not. With regard to the particular motion itself for the adjournment of the debate, I am afraid that we have wandered somewhat from it. What would honorable members opposite gain by carrying the adjournment, and postponing the consideration of this Triennial Parliaments Bill, which some members of the late Government say is their Bill, and which others say is not their Bill at all? Should this particular Bill be postponed, what would they gain? Do they think they would force us into doing what they want? Certainly not; we would go on precisely the same. Supposing they carry their motion by a chance majority in the absence of some of our supporters, they cannot force us to give precedence to the want-of-confidence motion. This Bill, which the people have asked for, and which honorable members have been asked to pass, would indeed be postponed for an indefinite period. On that ground alone I appeal to the honorable gentleman to withdraw his motion. It can do no good, and if carried it may do a great deal of harm.

Mr. MOSS.—After what has fallen from the Premier, I do not see how he can consistently object to the adjournment of the House in order that the motion brought forward by the honorable member for Port Chalmers may be considered. The honorable member says he has taken up a purely constitutional ground, and also that he asks for that which a Ministry recently appointed has always a right to receive from the House. I find in Todd's "Parliamentary Practice," page 418, "It has never been the usage in England for any Government, upon acceding to office, to make use of its power and influence in Parliament to bring under investigation the acts of its predecessors." That is exactly the opportunity which the Ministry tell us they desire to have, and I am quite sure that on this side of the House we are perfectly willing they should have the opportunity. They will remain in office long enough to ransack every pigeon-hole, and to get all possible information they desire. When they have got it they will not be able to use it so long as they remain on those benches. They are debarred, according to the constitutional usage and practice of the Imperial Parliament, to which I have referred, from bringing under investigation the acts of their predecessors so long as they remain in office. But if they are relegated to the other side of the House we shall have the benefit of the information acquired. That is what I take to be the constitutional view of the position. As to its being unfair and contrary to usage to attack the Government, I admit that, as far as my reading enables me to judge, it is very unusual in the Imperial Parliament to bring down a vote of want of confidence in Ministers until they have had an opportunity of laying their policy before the country. But it is distinctly laid down that this is only done out of respect to the Sovereign, by whom they are in England directly appointed. I do not think the same rule applies here. We might as well claim for the Legislative Council of New Zealand the privileges of the House of Peers at Home. I object to the introduction of English precedents to guide us, when we are asked to take the letter of those precedents, and not look into the spirit of them. As to the other reason alleged by the Hon. the Premier why a vote of want of confidence should not be considered at present, I have fairly shown that, if they did think fit to constitute themselves a detective Ministry, neither the House nor the country can derive the slightest benefit from their researches in the pigeon-holes, or from the great discoveries they are going to make, so long as they remain in their present position. No one is more desirous than I am to see the Triennial Parliaments Bill become law, and I would oppose any motion for adjournment if I thought it would interfere with the passing of that measure; but I am sure that unless the Government that sits on those benches absolutely commands the confidence of this House it will be impossible that any business can be proceeded with. They may make a little rush, and possibly they may succeed in carrying the second reading of a Bill, but obstacles will arise, and the Government will find themselves in a minority, and be unable to carry on the business of the country. I do hope the Government will not depart from the constitutional usage, but, after having taken ample time to ransack the pigeon-holes, will allow the motion of the honorable member for Port Chalmers to be brought forward.

Major ATKINSON.—I wish to make a personal explanation. The honorable member for Port Chalmers gave as one of his statements of fact that he had not opposed the passing of a Triennial Parliaments Bill. I refer him to Vol. XIX. of Hansard, 1875, page 36. When the Bill was last introduced by Mr. Reynolds, he will find by the division list Mr. Macandrew voting against it, Sir George Grey voting against it, and Mr. Sheehan voting against it. He will find Mr. Bryce and myself voting for it.

Mr. MACANDREW.—That is four or five years ago.

Mr. GISBORNE.—The honorable gentleman opposite has given us an extraordinary instance of his own inconsistency. In 1878 he voted against the Bill. That is a later date, but the honorable gentleman has forgotten it. His memory goes beyond that date. The honorable member for Selwyn asks for fair-play; but there should be reciprocity in these matters. We complain that the honorable member has dealt unfairly with this House, after obtaining a bare majority on a vote of want of confidence against the late Ministry. By the wording of that resolution, it was the understanding of all honorable members that he would reconstruct a Ministry that would have the confidence of this House. After he had succeeded in getting that majority on this understanding, he forgot the understanding, and he has selected himself and his colleagues on those benches from one party in the House. Therefore the question is, Has he the confidence of the majority of this House or not? That question ought to be tried before any public business is proceeded with. We argue as the honorable member for Egmont argued in 1877, when the late Premier first assumed office. The honorable gentleman immediately tabled a want-of-confidence motion, although there had been a majority of three or four against his own Ministry. His argument was, We say that you have not the confidence of the majority of this House, and it is unconstitutional, improper, and unseemly that a Government should be sitting on those benches which is actually in a minority in this House. The question to be decided is, Does that state of things exist now or not? As soon as it has been decided that it does not, it will be quite right for honorable members to go on with the public business; and we on this side of the House—at any rate as far as I am concerned—will be willing to give them every assistance in carrying on our measures. But, until that has been decided, it is not a question of the merits of this Bill or that Bill; it is the great constitutional question of whether a Government should sit on those benches which does not possess the confidence of a majority of the representatives of the people. The honorable member for Egmont said that our Bills were in disorder, and that we had brought nothing before the House. Now, what chance had we during the last two sessions of bringing measures before the House, except, perhaps, for a little time last session? Directly the Governor's Speech was delivered, and the Address in Reply was proposed, we were met by an amendment of want of confidence. But look at the Bills called "dropped Bills," which include Government Bills among others, that were brought in during the first session in 1879—two months ago! Look at these Bills which were brought before the House, and which were at least in such order that they could be laid on the table of the House. There are the Bribery Bill, the Chinese Immigrants Bill, the Electoral Bill—

Major ATKINSON.—The Electoral Bill?

Mr. GISBORNE.—Yes; it is here on the list of dropped Bills—Bills which had been laid on the table of the House. They have got the imprint of the Ministers who brought them in, and are part of the records of the House. They had been circulated—

Major ATKINSON.—Will the honorable gentleman give the names of the authors of the Bills which the late Government proposed to introduce this session, and say that they were distributed?

Mr. GISBORNE.—I am talking of last session. The honorable gentleman said we had got no Bills ready to carry out our policy. I say that last session we introduced and laid on the table several political Bills, and I am now enumerating them. There are the Bribery Bill, the Chinese Immigrants Bill, the Electoral Bill, the Land Act Amendment Bill, the Plurality of Votes Bill, and the Representation Bill. These were part of our political programme, and they were all laid before the House last session. We should have been prepared, if we had had an opportunity, to lay the Bills—and, of course, in some instances, revised Bills on the same subjects—before the House. But we never had that opportunity, and the honorable member has no right to bring it as a charge against us that we have not brought forward Bills this session, when the first thing that was done by his honorable friend was to meet us with a vote of want of confidence. I hope the majority in this House will not be misled by all these appeals which have been made, or at all influenced by the terrorism which is attempted to be exercised over them when they are told that the constituencies of the country will object to the public business not being proceeded with. The simple question—and it is a question which the people in any free country will appreciate—is this: Is a Ministry to govern this country which does not possess the confidence of the representatives of the people?

Mr. DE LA TOUR.—Sir, I think the House should clearly understand what the vote really is. The vote, as I take it, will be a vote of confidence or no confidence in the Government. That is clearly the issue. It is, whether this House has confidence in the Government. In no other form can we bring the motion on. The Premier has assured us to-day emphatically that we are not to be allowed to bring on a motion of want of confidence—that the Government will purposely keep such a motion back. Well, the shortest way to arrive at a vote on that question is to take it on this motion. The whole debate has been whether this House has confidence in the Government or not. The speeches of the Treasurer and the Premier were speeches on behalf of the Government. They have not been attacked, and I do not care to attack them now; but the vote emphatically will be as to whether this House has confidence in the Government or not. We have been told that it is constitutional for the Government to pay no attention to a notice of motion such as has been given by the honorable member for Port Chalmers. Now, the precedents that have been quoted are from those old times when the Crown exercised a high prerogative—when Ministers were kept in power against the popular will by the influence of the Crown; and I do not think that they are applicable to our times. I am quite sure that the spirit of the people of this country will allow no exercise of that high prerogative, in the highest estate of these realms, to keep in office a Ministry not possessing the confidence of this House. I only rose to point out what the real issue is on this vote. We can allow for absent men; and there will be no accusation against our side of a mere wish to catch an opportunity, one or two members being absent. Allowances can be made for that. I think that, as the Government will not allow an opportunity to the honorable member for Port Chalmers, we may very well take the vote to-day on this motion. I think the leader of the Opposition has a right to ask his supporters to vote for the postponement of this Bill until Tuesday or Wednesday. After the motion for the postponement is carried, it will then be for honorable members to fix the date to which it shall be postponed. There will be no shelving the Bill at all. That is no question before us now; it is merely as to whether this Bill shall be read a second time now or on Wednesday next. I do think that we are entitled to meet the Government on their own ground, and to credit their statement. They have said that the policy of the late Government is their policy. I think we are entitled to credit them in that respect, and therefore to negative the request they make to us now to have time to bring forward another policy. We on our side are quite satisfied with the late Government's policy. The honorable gentlemen have told us it is their policy. Very well, we accept it. Why should they fabricate another policy? I do not know that anything need be said at all as to the appeals which have been made to independent members to give them a trial. I would say this to honorable members who have not been previously in this House: that perhaps the explanation why we do not attach so much importance to these appeals as they may feel inclined to do is that we have borne the heat and burden of the day; we have been in all these conflicts; we have never had quarter given to us; and it is a strange thing to us that appeals—piteous appeals—should be made to us, who have never received quarter, to give unusual quarter to our adversaries. We also fight fairly and straightforwardly—that has been the rule in this House—using the political weapons that are available; and the honorable gentlemen, especially the honorable member for Egmont, have no right to complain. Last year, as has been said, the late Government were never allowed to make a single administrative statement to the House. For two sessions they have never been allowed to make a statement about administration. And, really, in the face of such facts, for the honorable members—the old political men who are sitting on those benches—to ask us piteously to give them time and to beg for quarter is a very strange thing. I do not see why we should not divide at once, and take a decision on this motion as being the opinion of the House. I am quite sure this House is not prepared, on behalf of the country, to allow any recurrence to those old days of high prerogative when a Government had to be kept in power against the will of the majority in Parliament. I hope we shall hear no more hints, by the precedents which the Premier has given us, that such a state of things is likely to come about. I am quite sure it will not be tolerated in our days, when responsible government has reached to the extent it has in the colonies, where no voice is known but the voice of the Parliament, being the voice of the majority in the Representative Chamber.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—The last speaker has made a statement which I am quite sure the House will not be prepared to accept. He asks the Government to take the decision of the House in respect to one matter as the decision of the House in respect to another. He asks the House, in voting for the adjournment of the debate, to say that it has no confidence in the Government. If the Opposition are reduced to such a strait that they have to take the division on the question of the adjournment of a debate as indicative of the decision of the House on a matter of such importance as that of which notice has been given by the honorable member for Port Chalmers, I am very sorry for them. I do not wish here to go at length into recriminations with regard to the past, but I think there are two or three things in the present debate that it is necessary to notice. We heard, for the first time in this debate, that the honorable member for Port Chalmers is the leader of the Opposition. It occurred to me then, as it would to honorable members all round the House, what a strange position politics have got into. I was going to use a word stronger than "strange." Our whole parliamentary system has been degraded and degenerated by the course taken by the late Government during the last two years. We are suddenly informed that the honorable member for Port Chalmers is the leader of the Opposition. Well, Sir, what has this party been for the last two years? Has it come to this—what we have heard all round the country—that members were returned on what has been called the "Grey ticket"—that members paraded the name of an honorable gentleman who has occupied prominent positions, and is respected very much in other countries as well as in New Zealand—that his name was paraded, his flag raised, and then the members who have come in under the shadow of his wing are to ignore him, are to set him on one side, and to appeal to sentences they have inserted in addresses—saving clauses which will enable them now to set aside their leader? Such political perfidy, whatever may be the result of it in this House, will be deemed by the country to be an insult. The argument has been raised in this House that honorable members on this side the House have held different opinions on the question of this Bill. Now, I am one of those members who have held a different opinion as to the expediency of this Bill. The fact is, that the question of triennial Parliaments is a question of degree. It is a question of what time is most expedient for the duration of a Parliament. It is not a question of principle at all. I have held in the past that the adoption of triennial Parliaments would lead to throwing the control of the elections into the hands of men of wealth to a greater extent than is now the case; and on that ground I have always felt that this measure was of very doubtful expediency. My opinion has changed with regard to it, partly because I am satisfied that the country is intent upon testing the merits of this measure, and partly because I recognize that a great difficulty has arisen in our Constitution in respect to dissolutions of Parliament. A great difficulty arises in these colonies in connection with the dissolutions of Parliament, because our system of finance differs from that of the Old Country. In the Old Country the prerogative of the Crown with regard to dissolutions can be unconditionally exercised in respect to the granting of supplies, because a year's supplies are given in advance, and an appeal to the country can be granted by the Crown without interfering, as is liable to be the case here, with public payments and the public convenience throughout the country. But here our finance is not the same, and the Crown is not able to give unconditional dissolutions without to some extent imperilling the interests of the people at large. I think that this question of triennial Parliaments comes to this: that it diminishes any necessity which is likely to arise for the granting of dissolutions; and for that reason I think the Bill is one which should be supported, and which I must myself support. Reverting again to the question of differences of opinion between members of the Government, I should like to say that there are members on these benches who have held different opinions from mine; but while we are here we shall always express one opinion and one policy, and we are not going to vote in different lobbies on subjects that come before the House. So long as we are on the Government benches, we are going to represent the united opinion and policy which we are prepared to support; or we leave these seats. The honorable member for Mount Ida said we were taking up the policy of the late Government, and that, as the policy of the late Government was well known, we are not entitled to say that our policy is not before the country. I say it is perfectly ridiculous to make the statement that the policy of the late Government in these two or three measures is the entire policy of the present Government. We have got measures to bring down—and will bring them down—which are considerably in advance of the measures of the late Government, and some of them are of more practical, immediate interest for the wants of the country than any proposed by the late Government. We do not ask for quarter. We want no quarter. We will only maintain our positions so long as we can do it with honor and pride. We have a duty here as Ministers of the Crown; we have a duty here as representatives of the people; we have a duty here to ourselves and to the country; and we will maintain our positions here until such time as we have performed that duty. The House may rely upon that. I speak with all due respect to the House, and nobody will yield more cheerfully than I will to the decision of the House when the proper time has come. There will be no shirking a want-of-confidence motion when we have done our duty to the Crown, to the people, to ourselves, and to the House. There need be no mistake about it. We will not accept a motion for the adjournment of the House as a decision upon the question as to whether His Excellency's Ministers have the confidence of the House. A more ridiculous proposal was never made.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—The adjournment of the debate upon a Government Bill. I did not say "adjournment of the House."

Mr. KELLY.—I had not intended to speak upon this occasion, and should not have done so had it not been for a few remarks by the honorable member for Mount Ida. He is a gentleman whom I always like to listen to, because he generally speaks fair, and what he says is mostly worth listening to; but on this occasion I think he has fallen into an error. He said that the late Government never asked for quarter.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—Never got it.

Mr. KELLY.—That is a very different thing. But I know they did ask for quarter, and that they got it, because I was one of those who gave it to them in 1877. Honorable members who were in the House on that occasion will remember this: that when the Atkinson Government were turned out of office by a majority of three—I supported the Atkinson Government, and formed one of the minority—and when the Grey Government came in, a vote of want of confidence was tabled at once. It was then said by the members and supporters of the Grey Government that it was unfair to table a want-of-confidence motion until the Government had had an opportunity of stating their policy to the House. That was asking quarter; and quarter was then given. No member of the late Government or its supporters will deny that they then contended it was unfair to table a want-of-confidence motion until the Government had had an opportunity of making their Financial and Public Works Statements. And what was the result? The appeal made to the House was responded to, and the Hon. Mr. Reynolds—not at that time honorable; he was a member of this House then—myself, and others considered the motion rather premature, and that the forbearance claimed by the Grey Ministry should be given. Therefore, when the House came to consider the matter, it was resolved to give them an opportunity of developing their policy before the adverse vote was carried. That altogether refutes the statement made by the honorable member for Mount Ida—that quarter was neither asked nor obtained by the Grey Government. Quarter was asked for by that Government, and the House acceded to the request. When the want-of-confidence motion came on, an amendment was moved by Mr. Reynolds to the effect that, as they had had no opportunity of submitting their policy to the House and country, the motion would be premature, and therefore ought not to be passed. The result was that the House divided on the question. There was a tie, and the Speaker gave his casting vote in favour of the Government. If the members of the late Government will recollect what occurred on that occasion, and will apply to themselves the same rule which the House applied on that occasion, they will see that it would be only fair to give the present Government a chance. I shall take up the same position now as then. I was a supporter of the Atkinson Government, but I considered that, until the new Government had had an opportunity of bringing forward their policy, and of stating what were their measures, it was unjust to vote against them. Upon that principle I and other gentlemen acted; and, if that was the right course in the year 1877, surely it is the right course to pursue now. The question now before the House is simply whether the Triennial Parliaments Bill shall be read a second time, or whether the debate shall be adjourned. But the honorable member for Mount Ida wants to have the matter placed on such a footing that, if the House is pleased to adjourn the debate, that decision is to be accepted as expressive of want of confidence in the Government. That is most unfair. I never heard a more nonsensical statement in my life. I think the proper course is to do as was done on the occasion to which I have referred—give the Government ample time to bring forward their financial policy and their public works policy. That was what was done in 1872. In proof of that, I need only appeal to the speech of a strong supporter of the late Government, Mr. Rees. Referring to the course pursued by Mr. Vogel, when the Fox-Vogel Ministry was defeated by Mr. Stafford in 1872, Mr. Rees said,—

"Mr. Stafford's vote of want of confidence was carried on the 5th September, and he was sworn in on the 10th September. The House went into Committee of Supply, and Mr. Gillies moved the old estimates, on the 23rd September—thirteen days after the Ministry was sworn in. No Financial Statement had been made, and it was not made until four days after going into Committee of Supply. The Public Works Statement was made on the 2nd October; and then, when the Financial Statement and the Public Works Statement were fully before the country, Mr. Vogel moved his want-of-confidence motion on the 4th October."

This gave Mr. Stafford's Government twenty-four clear days, after being sworn in, to declare their policy, while the present Government is attacked by a want-of-confidence motion on the very day they take office. Such a course is simply monstrous, and quite opposed to all constitutional practice. The proper course is to give the Government ample time to bring down their Financial Statement and their Public Works Statement, and then tackle them on the question of want of confidence. If the Opposition wish to give the Government fair-play, and wish to show the country that they do so, let them give the Government time to bring down their financial policy, their public works policy, and their Native policy; and, in order to do that, let them withdraw the present motion. It may be thought by members residing in the South Island that the disturbances on the West Coast are of trifling importance, but I will tell them, as a resident in the North Island of twenty-two years, and having several times had to move from country into town owing to the danger arising from Native disturbances, that this Native question affects the whole colony. It does not affect the settlers on the West Coast only, although it is a matter which means ruin to them unless settled within a very short time.

The hour of half-past five o'clock having arrived, Mr. SPEAKER left the chair.

HOUSE RESUMED.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. KELLY.—When the House adjourned, I had risen to reply to a statement made by the honorable member for Mount Ida (Mr. De Launty). In the year 1877, the members of the Grey Government received quarter at the hands of members of this House who had hitherto supported their opponents; and I went on to argue that it was only fair that the same line of conduct should be pursued on the present occasion. These were the sentiments that guided my conduct in 1877, and which will also guide my conduct now. I think it very desirable that this course should be taken now, because it is very evident to any person at all acquainted with political matters that no Government ought to be condemned until they have had an opportunity of showing the House and the colony what their policy is and what they intend to do. It would be a waste of time on the part of the Opposition to proceed in the manner they are now doing, because it will not serve the purpose intended, and the country will be disgusted with them. I said before that I personally desire to know what is the financial policy of the present Government, also what their public works policy is, what their Native policy is, and what their land policy is. As yet they have had no opportunity of showing what this is. If that opportunity is afforded them, and the policy that is brought down, especially with regard to Native affairs and land, is not of such a nature as would be calculated to benefit the colony and those who live in it, they will not find me a supporter of theirs. I have no doubt that the same feeling is entertained by many honorable members of this House; and it is to be thought for a moment that I am to be caught in the meshes of the Opposition, unless they give me an opportunity of judging of the policy which the present Government intend to submit to the House and to the country? I think it is the most unwise course that could be adopted. With regard to Native affairs, it will be seen that the question is not only attracting attention in this House, but also in England; and it is no use looking it over, and it is no use delaying settlement of it any longer. The sooner the thing is met fairly and dealt with in the proper way the better, not only for the interests of the Natives, but also for those of the Europeans. I think the interests of the Natives and the Europeans are identical. What is the position of affairs at present on the west coast of this Island? We find that the Natives, under the influence of Te Whiti—a fanatic, but a very clever man, although I admit that he is insane on any religious point—are in actual rebellion against the Government of the colony. What about the Europeans? We find them in a state of great alarm, and armed almost to a man in consequence of these Natives. What has the late Government done to allay the state of alarm on the West Coast—alarm on the one side of the Natives, and alarm on the other side on the part of the European inhabitants, both the Natives and the Europeans desiring not to have war?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the honorable member is travelling beyond the question before the House.

Mr. KELLY.—I am one who is a friend to the Natives, and always have been. I have admired their many good qualities, and their bravery in the field; and I am desirous that their wants should be attended to, and that the Europeans on their side should not be kept in a state of alarm. I want to know what is the policy of the present Government as regards the Native question and the land question also. The late Government were two years in office. I helped to keep them in office for the purpose of ascertaining what their policy was, and I was greatly surprised at that policy. We have in Taranaki very good land, upon which persons of small capital desiring to settle were enabled to do so under the Act of 1874. In 1877 that law was entirely altered by the Government in power then, and now in opposition. I say, with respect to the policy of deferred payments which is at present in operation, and which is called the great Liberal policy, that it is a mockery, a delusion, and a snare. The sooner such a system is put an end to, the better for the people of the colony. I did not intend to speak on this question, and was not prepared to do so; but I was induced to address the House by the remarks which were made by the honorable member for Mount Ida. In conclusion, I simply state this: I have no doubt that on both sides there are members who will not be beguiled by these miserable tactics which are being pursued by the Opposition. I will appeal to those gentlemen to act with a truly independent spirit, to judge for themselves, and then come to the conclusion whether it is for the interests of the colony that the present Government should not have a fair trial.

Mr. ACTON ADAMS.—Sir, I did not intend rising to speak in this debate until quite recently, because I thought that the present Opposition would probably reconsider their determination to push this matter to a division. The honorable member for Port Chalmers says that he is willing to accept the decision of this House loyally. Well, now, I say, if that is an honest expression of the feeling of the honorable member, he ought to accept the decision of this House given the other day. That was not a decision come to in any hurried way, in the absence of any honorable members, or with undue precipitation. Although that division was carried by a very small majority, we must consider it was the outcome of a very lengthy party fight. The party then in opposition had been previously successful by a very large majority, and the Grey party had gone to the country on the question as to whether they were right or wrong. I need not point out how the Grey Government managed to return more members to this House than I think represent the real opinion of the country; I need not go into their electioneering now: but I will simply ask, in spite of all that was done—whether rightly done or wrongly done; and much of their electioneering was unconstitutional—yet, Sir, in spite of all their efforts, what was the result? We came back again, and, according to constitutional usage, the matter was immediately debated once more, and there was a majority for us and against them. Now, I say the honorable member for Port Chalmers ought to accept that decision loyally, and ought not to waste any more time in debating motions of want of confidence. The honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) referred to the debate of last year, and he said that, while they then met the first no-confidence motion readily, yet he admitted that they practised certain tactics in order to defeat the second motion of no-confidence. Now, Sir, is not the Government doing exactly the same thing now? Although the parties are changed—one is now where the other was then—yet I say this is the same way of fighting. We have already had two debates upon this matter, besides a general election, and these debates have been decided in a way that is favourable to the party which recognizes the honorable member for Selwyn as its leader. Well, to put the worst possible construction on the motives of the Government, what are they doing now? Having fought these people twice, and beaten them, they say, "We will not fight again, until we have laid our policy before the country, and until we have had some chance of showing how well or how badly we can administer the affairs of the colony." What is the answer to that? There is no answer. The honorable member for Mount Ida—a man whom I am always very glad to hear speak in this House, with whose ideas I largely sympathize, and whom I consider one of the best members in this House, at all events on theoretical questions—wishes us to interpret this motion—a mere motion for adjournment of the debate on the second reading of the Triennial Parliaments Bill—as a no-confidence motion. Well, it does not express that in any way whatever. It cannot be held to express it by any twisting of language which the honorable member for Mount Ida can possibly use, and I am quite sure that honorable members of this House will not accept the interpretation given to them by the honorable member for Mount Ida. When the motion is one for the adjournment of this debate, we will not accept the honorable member's meaning, that it is a want-of-confidence motion. It is not anything of the kind. I am quite sure that on this motion general questions of policy will not be debated, and the Minister of Lands has already said that the Government will not accept it as a no-confidence motion. The Government are quite right. I contend that, according to constitutional precedent, the Government have been so lately placed upon those benches that they ought certainly to have a fair trial. I hope that the present Opposition, after this very long fight, will at all events not follow the honorable member for Port Chalmers when he wishes to move a vote of want of confidence, and gives notice of that motion before he has left the bench upon which he was sitting as a member of the late Government, and before the new Government are sworn in. I think I never saw so eminently improper a proceeding. Of course, I have not had the chance of seeing many proceedings, not having long been in the House; but I have never read of such an improper proceeding, and I have had some chance of reading what has taken place in different Parliaments. I will refer honorable gentlemen to Todd's "Parliamentary Government," page 212, &c., as to the question of whether honorable gentlemen opposite are treating this question in a constitutional way or not. Mr. Todd writes,—

"The Ministers chosen by the Sovereign are entitled to receive from Parliament, if not 'an implicit confidence,' at the least 'a fair trial.' This has been the established rule and practice of the Constitution."

I refer them to the conduct of Mr. Pitt in 1783, when for a long time he held office against an overwhelming majority. Todd says,—

"Mr. Pitt took his stand upon the principle that it was irregular for the House to endeavour to control the Crown in the choice of its Ministers by denouncing them without waiting to see their acts."

Again, in 1801 a similar question arose, and Mr. Todd says,—

"Mr. Pitt expressly claimed that the new Ministers were entitled at the outset to a constitutional confidence; in other words, that, unless some good reason was assigned to the contrary, the House was bound, by the best principles of policy, as well as by the true spirit of the Constitution, to wait to see the conduct of Ministers before they should withhold their confidence. The House of Commons acquiesced in this reasoning, and refrained from any attempt at disturbing the new Ministry."

Again, in 1807, on a no-confidence debate, Mr. Todd writes,—

"The ex-Ministry had a majority in both Houses. But Parliament refused to concur in resolutions of censure, or to take any steps towards refusing to the new Ministers of the Crown a fair trial."

The same author concludes his references to this subject in these words:—

"Having vindicated the right of the Sovereign to the free choice of his constitutional Advisers by whom the administration of the Government is to be conducted—a freedom which necessitates that they should be unreservedly accepted by Parliament at the outset of their career until they prove themselves, by their general policy and public conduct, to be undeserving of confidence," &c.

I certainly wish to see the present Government remain in office until they have a fair chance of showing the House what their policy is. I am not a very warm admirer of all the members of the present Ministry, but I have given no uncertain sound as to my views with regard to triennial Parliaments and other liberal measures. I have heard it stated in no-confidence debates that the honorable member for Selwyn and his supporters were not true Liberals, as they did not really believe in the Grey policy. I say, therefore, that, as far as my small efforts can go, they shall have a fair trial; they shall have a fair chance of bringing down these measures; and if they fail to bring in such Bills as the Electoral Bill and this Triennial Parliaments Bill, I shall be one of the first men to vote against them. I do not wish that there should be any uncertain sound about my Liberalism. I set up to be a thorough and true Liberal, and I will support any Government that will give to the people of New Zealand one of the best electoral constitutions it is possible to give to any people. We have arrived at a period in our history when all parties are agreed as to the extension of the franchise, and I think, such being the case, now or never is the opportunity to pass measures which will enlarge the electoral franchise, and not only enlarge it, but place it on a permanent and practical basis. I may be permitted to refer to the Electoral Bill. The two franchises there provided are very intelligible. They are permanent, and will not require to be altered, and I think we shall be granting a great boon to the people if we grant these extended franchises to them. I say to all new members of the House—to all those who can in any way separate themselves from party feeling—that the debate to-night ought to be treated as a matter of principle, and not as a matter of party. The question before the House is one of the most important Bills in our new Liberal programme, and I ask honorable members, will they like to be told, when they go back to their constituents, "Oh! you voted against the second reading of the Triennial Parliaments Bill; or, at all events, you voted for postponing what we conceive to be a very great boon"? No doubt honorable members will be ready enough with excuses; but I ask those who have experienced contested elections what chance they will have to explain their conduct in a satisfactory manner. It is not very easy to explain questions of party to large assemblages of electors, and I am quite sure those honorable gentlemen who vote for the adjournment of the second reading of the Triennial Parliaments Bill will find they have something to answer for when next they meet their constituents. I feel that I should have something to answer for if I took that course, and I shall not place myself in such a position. I ask honorable members to consider. I ask them whether they are prepared to give up the debates in this House to these two contending parties, or whether they will join with me and others in trying to forward the business of the country as much as we can. It is now three months since we were called together to do business, and up to the present time we have done practically nothing. We have been—perhaps not wasting time, but—spending time in deciding what half-dozen gentlemen shall sit on those benches; and I say if we are to prolong that sort of contest it will be taking a course not creditable to ourselves or beneficial to the country. I trust honorable gentlemen will consider this well before they join the honorable member for Port Chalmers in adjourning the debate on this very important Bill. It is not as if this question of no-confidence could not be tried. It can be tried well enough on a day not far distant. I have no doubt it could be tried very well towards the end of next week, or at the beginning of the following week; but I say, if it could not be tried for a month, I would vote in that direction, because I think the very least we can do to the men at present on the Government benches, who have got there after a long and protracted struggle, when the merits and demerits of both sides have been fully discussed, is to see whether they can develop in themselves any means of governing the people better than they have been governed during the last two years. I am waiting to see if they have that power in them. Many of them are politicians of old standing; all are men of some mental standing; and I am certainly not prepared to embarrass them in their efforts to get their policy before the House and the country. I ask the younger members of the Grey party to consider this well. Their leaders have said, and they perhaps believe it, that the present Government have no intention to pass these liberal measures—that it is a snare and a delusion. But the honorable member for Selwyn is now on the Government benches, and the first day he appears there as Premier he brings down one of the most important parts of the Liberal programme. Are you then going to stop him at the outset? Are you going to shut the door and prevent him carrying this out? Will you not give him a fair chance to pass these liberal measures, and to develop the powers of administration of his Government? If, after he has had a fair and honest trial, we find him wanting, then I shall be prepared to join with other honorable members in passing a vote of want of confidence in him; but, until he and his Government show that they do not deserve the confidence of the House, I am not prepared to embarrass them in the way sought by the motion before the House.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—We have had, Sir, I think, a striking illustration this afternoon of the truth of what has been said by the honorable member for Wanganui (Mr. Bryce), who now sits on the Government benches—that, however desirous a certain gentleman might be to see liberal measures passed, he is infinitely more desirous that they should be passed by him than that they should be passed at all. Notwithstanding the large amount of time which has been spent on this debate, we have had some compensation in that exhibition. We have seen one member of the Grey Government eagerly claiming this Bill as their property, and another member of that Government immediately dropping it as if it burned his fingers. I imagine the honorable member for Totara, when he disclaimed this Bill, did not know that it had "Sir G. Grey" so distinctly printed on it; but, even without that brand, any one could see that it was one of the Grey measures. Notwithstanding the way in which this Bill was lauded as giving to every one everything he desired, we find it was to have no effect whatever for the next eight years. For five years we were to remain in this House, and then the next Parliament was only to sit for three years: consequently, before this measure could have any operation, eight years might have passed, and eight years is a considerable period at the age to which the late Premier and myself have arrived. I am surprised that he has not, even for self-gratulation, endeavoured to get some of these measures into operation at an earlier period. I did not rise with any intention whatever of prolonging this debate. Whatever party may desire a speech for that purpose need not come to me, for I shall never take a part in what I consider a most disreputable proceeding—the wasting of time in talk instead of going on with business. I wish now to offer my vote. We have heard of a great many transactions of that kind under the rose, but, as I do not approve of such proceedings, I am prepared to offer my vote openly to-night to either party. We have heard this afternoon charges made by the honorable gentlemen who have just taken their seats on those benches. They have given the House to understand that they have something to reveal to the country which will show a disgraceful state of things; which will show that money has been wasted; which will show that no proper provision has been made to meet the expenditure of the country; which will show that the accounts of the country have been kept in a most disreputable manner; which will show that expenses have been wilfully and wantonly incurred which ought not to have been incurred. And yet, in the face of all these charges, the gentlemen who have just left those benches say, "Let us get back before you discover anything more." Why, Sir, a shop-boy would be ashamed of such a proceeding. A shop-boy, on hearing such accounts as these, would disdain to come back before the charges had been proved or refuted. Now, Sir, is it possible that a gentleman who has occupied positions which the Premier has occupied all his life should place himself in the position of demanding that his own friends should go on to those benches for the purpose of closing up all that has been done there for the last two years, instead of defying those honorable gentlemen, and saying, "You have brought these charges against me, and you shall stay there long enough to prove them; or you shall come back to this House and say you cannot prove them"? That is the position such a gentleman ought to take up; and if those gentlemen who have said so much as they have said to-night are not in a position to bring before the House something of the sort which they have said they can bring, then my vote goes against them if they have time and opportunity to do what they say they can do. If they will bring before the country a state of things such as they have given us to understand they are in a position to disclose, then I trust very few votes on either side of the House will go to restore the men who brought such a state of things upon the colony.

Mr. WAKEFIELD rose to speak after the voices had been given, when Mr. SPEAKER ruled that, being too late, he could not proceed.

Question put, "That this debate be adjourned," upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

The amendment was consequently agreed to.

Mr. HALL.—I think it right to explain that two gentlemen who are supporters of the Government are absent and are not paired. I now move, That the debate be adjourned until next sitting-day.

Mr. ALLWRIGHT.—I also wish to make a short explanation. The gentlemen on the Ministerial benches may take it for granted that because I voted with the Noes on the present occasion I shall be found voting with them on future occasions. I dare say some of my party thought it strange that I should vote with the Noes, but I came here intending to vote for the Bills introduced by the Government, and I am determined to do so; but it is well that I should let the honorable gentlemen on the Government benches understand that when the motion of the honorable member for Port Chalmers comes forward it is very possible that I shall vote for it.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—There is no objection to the adjournment of the debate until next sitting-day. It will be time to "pair" the absent members when they come back. We intend to give the new Government fair-play. Some honorable gentlemen seem to treat that remark derisively, and, if that is the spirit of the opposite side, it is possible that we may not give them fair-play. In the meantime, it is sufficient to say that we shall not oppose the adjournment till next sitting-day.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—When I was about to address the House just now, a number of members of the great Liberal party, as is their wont on all occasions, took the opportunity of stopping my mouth. With that fear of free speech which characterizes all their actions throughout the country, they objected to my expressing my views even upon so unimportant a question as the adjournment of the debate upon the second reading of a Bill. My honorable friend the member for Akaroa loudly cried out, "No, no; you cannot speak." Why the honorable gentleman should be afraid of me I cannot think. The honorable gentleman was in a state of the greatest perturbation. He seemed quite pale. He was in a panic. That terrible member for Geraldine was going to say something shocking about the honorable member for Akaroa. The honorable gentleman need not be afraid. I am not going to waste powder and shot upon such small deer. But I am entitled, by the forms of the House, to speak to the motion now before it, and I intend, by the grace of the great Liberal party, to express my views upon the question. I remember, during the debate on the want-of-confidence motion last session, hearing an honorable member in this House make a statement which struck me very much at the time, and which I long shall carry in my memory. It was the honorable member for the Thames (Sir George Grey). What he said was this: "If I find that I am beaten in the country during the general election I shall not wait for the meeting of the House, but I shall at once resign, in order that the new Ministry may have plenty of time to prepare their measures." I had often differed from the honorable gentleman in politics. I had, as honorable members of this House are aware, had some sharp passages of arms with him in this House. I had often been aggrieved at what I regarded as moral lapses on his part. But, when I heard him say that, I felt that we had a man of character and power among our statesmen. I felt that there was something in the honorable gentleman that I could admire. My heart warmed towards him when I heard him express so noble a sentiment as that. I thought, "Whatever we have thought of the honorable gentleman in the past, and however much we have differed from his political views, still he is setting an example to the public men of this country which ought to have a good effect, and cannot but have a good influence on the country." I watched him with great interest as the elections went on, and when the general election was over I fully recognized that the result was so uncertain that the honorable gentleman could hardly be expected, under the circumstances, to resign before the House met. I fully agreed that he was quite justified in coming down to the House and allowing the issue to be put as an amendment on the Address in Reply. I in no way withdrew from him the admiration which had been excited in my breast by the noble sentiment he had expressed. But now, wonderful to think, after his express desire to give the new Ministry plenty of time to prepare their measures, when he has ascertained absolutely by the vote of the House that he is in a minority, and that the country is against him—

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—Those honorable gentlemen from Auckland seem to me to be not aware of the forms of the House when they interrupt in this manner. They make such very odd noises, such curious sounds, that they are a little disconcerting. I was about to say, when I was interrupted by the noisy member for Auckland City East, that the honorable gentleman undoubtedly had his mind made up, by the last division on the amendment to the Address in Reply, that he was in a minority in this House; and then he resigned. I do not blame him for taking two or three days to do so. I have heard him blamed by some gentlemen who perhaps rather strain a constitutional point. I always believed he would resign in a becoming manner; and he did so. But, so far as his subsequent action is concerned, I say that he and those acting with him have not kept the word he gave to the House as regards giving the new Ministry plenty of time to prepare their measures. That is what I blame him and his friends for. The sentiment he expressed last session was a good one—a sound, patriotic, and statesmanlike one; but his action and that of his friends to-day is as bad, as unconstitutional, and as unpatriotic as the sentiment he then expressed was the reverse. Certainly there is one advantage in what has occurred to-day. That is, we have learned who is the leader of the Opposition for the day. I understand that the leadership of the Opposition has been placed in commission. Seven members, representing, I presume, the seven gentlemen who are to hold portfolios from the Crown, if successful in their present attempt—seven sham Ministers—have been appointed, and they, I understand, are to hold the position day by day in turn. Last sitting-day my honorable friend the member for Akaroa was leader, and I cannot say that he made a very promising figure; but I am not going to worry him. To-day, it seems, it is the honorable member for Port Chalmers who is leader of the Opposition. I think I noticed that one of the other leaders was a little jealous of his even taking the leadership for a day. The honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) was evidently very sore because the honorable member for Port Chalmers assumed the leadership even for his day, and I could not help admiring the manner in which the honorable member for the Thames kept hiding behind the honorable gentleman. We could only see his head and spectacles over the shoulders of the honorable member for Port Chalmers, making the leader of the Opposition look like a double-headed nightingale. He was evidently prompting the honorable gentleman, and ultimately took the leadership out of his hands. The honorable gentleman (Mr. Sheehan) danced all over the House, and spoke from no less than three different places, taking the running out of the hands of the honorable member for Port Chalmers. I think that was rather severe on the honorable gentleman, who should have been allowed to have his day. They say every dog has his day, and I feel that every leader of the Opposition ought to have his day. I am glad, however, that the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) did snatch the leadership for the time being from the hands of the honorable member for Port Chalmers, because he has had considerable experience of circumstances such as these in which we stand to-day; and he has on former occasions taken considerable pains to instruct this House as to what the procedure ought to be. Before he fell into evil ways and neglected his parliamentary duties as he lately has done, he used to claim to be a great authority on parliamentary and constitutional practice; and I recollect very well that, on the last occasion when Ministers stood in the position in which Ministers now stand, the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) came down to the House and told us that everything seemed to be going wrong in Parliament now; that he could recollect a time—when he was younger—when such a thing would never have been permitted or attempted as an attack on Ministers before they got their measures before Parliament. He went on to show that really a proposition to interrupt the business of the country in order to force on a want-of-confidence motion before Ministers were ready for it was something perfectly preposterous. The honorable gentleman spoke very nicely on that occasion. He was always a very unselfish man, and was always thinking of others. I was very much struck on that occasion by the kindly thoughtfulness he had for those who might come after him. The circumstances were then exactly the same as at present, and the honorable gentleman then said,—

“If the honorable gentleman (Major Atkinson) wishes to bring forward his resolution, he must bring it on in the usual way. I contend that it would be out of order for him to attempt to bring a motion forward by intercepting the business on the Paper. It must be quite evident that, if such a thing were allowed to be done, or if it could be done, it would be impossible to proceed with the public business. We are not speaking for ourselves in this matter, or from any consideration of how far it will affect us; but we are considering this position: that any Government placed on these benches may be prevented from day to day bringing forward their business if it could be held that a motion of this kind could be brought forward at once, so as to intercept and suspend altogether the Government business.”

Mr. Wakefield

That was the opinion of the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) two years ago. We have heard what his opinions are to-day—that no violence that can be done to constitutional practice or to the rules of this House is too great for him, provided it interrupts public business and brings on a want-of-confidence motion before the time at which those honorable gentlemen choose to receive it. On a previous occasion he also spoke very strongly on the subject, especially with regard to honorable gentlemen not having been allowed to bring forward their measures. Speaking upon the Land Bill, he said,—

“If we remain in office the Bill will become law during the present session. The honorable member for Egmont has intimated his intention of moving a vote of want of confidence in the Government to-morrow, and it will come with very singular propriety, inasmuch as the present Government have as yet had no chance of putting their views before the House. As we have not had an opportunity of putting our measures before the House, I think it would be unwise to take a motion of such importance into consideration before proceeding to other business.”

That was the view taken by the honorable gentleman when on the Government benches. He then held that any attempt to force a motion of want of confidence on the Government by stopping public business, or even private business, was altogether wrong and out of order; and I ask whether the House can pay any attention to the arguments he brings forward to-day, when we are aware that such was his view—and the House confirmed that view—in 1877. On that occasion I entirely supported the contention of the honorable gentleman. I held then that he was quite right, and that the Government were perfectly justified in taking the course they did take; and I have never varied from that view. The honorable gentleman has gone half round the compass, and I have remained just where I was then. I maintain that the action taken by those honorable gentlemen is perfectly out of order and unconstitutional, and that the Government are perfectly right in taking no notice whatever of the motion of want of confidence, except such notice as they may please to take of it when they make up their minds how to treat it. Any attempt to intercept public business, such as adjourning the debate on this Bill, is really a mere act of obstruction. That is the point honorable gentlemen ought to consider. It amounts to this: The Grey Government have been turned out of office. They think that one or two members of the party who voted against them have since gone over to them—have changed their minds and gone against the present Government. They think that they are therefore justified in immediately moving a vote of want of confidence, and in turning out the new Ministry. But I say clearly they are not justified in doing anything of the kind. When men change their minds so easily, and go over, after having voted with us the other night, after having been at our caucuses, after actually attending the banquet we had after the division, after having been in our confidence and giving us every intimation that honorable men can give that we were in their confidence,—their loyalty is not worth much. They may come back to-morrow for whatever consideration induced them to change their minds to-day. Are we to be told that there is a change of opinion in the House, that the Ministry are in a minority, and that they are not to be allowed even to come forward with their measures, because one gentleman of the character I have described has chosen to “wobble” across the floor of the House? It is perfectly nonsensical. He may wobble back again to-morrow, or he may wobble into oblivion in the course of the next few days, and never be heard of again this session. He may oscillate between two parties, as I have no doubt he will, until his political career comes, as it ought to come, to an ignominious termination. That is not the way to decide so important a question as the question whether the administration of this country is to be carried on in an efficient and honest manner, or whether it is to be carried on by a system of what I may be permitted to call a conglomeration of neglect and corruption. The question is in no wise to be settled in that manner. Let us look at what has happened. We had an up-hill fight during the previous session of Parliament, and the Government were defeated by an overwhelming majority. They got a dissolution under the most extraordinary circumstances: they got a dissolution under circumstances when it was hardly credible that any Ministry would have got a dissolution. Still, they got it, and they appealed to the country. All the influence of the Government was brought to bear upon the elections. They came back to this House, and were defeated. It has been said that the late Opposition did wrong in bringing forward their amendment on the very threshold of the first session of a new Parliament, before the Government had brought forward their policy. Does anybody really and sincerely believe that? Does even the most violent Greyite in the House believe that the Opposition acted wrongly in moving the amendment upon the Address in Reply? It was the only constitutional thing they could do. Having defeated the Government during the previous session, and having been sent by them to the constituencies to answer for their conduct, it was their constitutional duty to bring down an amendment upon the Address in Reply at the earliest possible moment. They had no other course to pursue. If we had been even sure of being beaten by a majority of twenty, it was still our duty to bring down that motion, take our beating, and go on with the business of the country. It was our duty as honorable men to do so, whatever the consequences might be. On the hustings I pledged myself to my constituents that my whole object in going back to Wellington was to turn out the Grey Ministry—that, if nobody else would do it, I should move an amendment to the Address in Reply which would have the effect of bringing that question to an issue at once. It was not a question of measures or of policy. We had their measures and their policy before the country for two years, and we were not likely to get anything more than we had already. We knew that they had nothing more to present to us. We did perfectly right. And, then, what was the consequence? Some of those honorable gentlemen tell us that it is owing to the peculiar wording of the amendment to the Address in Reply that they now take this extraordinary course of arresting the progress of public business and obstructing the measures of the country whilst in the hands of the new Ministry. That is their story. Let us see what actually occurred. It has already been pointed out to the House, and honorable gentlemen must be aware of it, that any amendment to the Address in Reply is absolutely a vote of want of confidence, and that the Ministry must resign upon it. They do not reconstruct; they resign. The Premier must resign; and, if he goes, the whole Ministry must go with him. Any honorable gentleman who knows anything of constitutional government knows that the resignation of the Premier carries with it the resignation of the whole Ministry. And yet they complain that somebody—although who could have done it I am not aware—that somebody ought to have allowed the honorable gentleman to obtain a reconstruction within the ranks of his own Ministry or party. How was it possible that that could be done? The honorable gentleman had to resign because of the amendment to the Address in Reply. It is quite clear that this House indicated the honorable member for Selwyn as the person to be sent for by His Excellency to form a Ministry in consequence of that amendment having been carried. There is no doubt about that. My honorable friend accepted the task imposed upon him by the Governor of forming a Ministry. To them has been intrusted the responsibility of office; to them has been intrusted the duty of bringing before the Parliament, for the first time since the session of 1878, the state of the finances, and the state generally of the public business. I might refer to the only instance in my knowledge in New Zealand of a vote like this being carried. That was in 1866, when my honorable friend the member for Ashley carried a resolution in this House that the Ministry as then constituted did not possess the confidence of the House. What occurred on that occasion? The honorable member for Ashley was sent for. The honorable gentleman the member for the Thames was then Governor; and I believe that a very amusing scene took place. They walked up and down the garden for a couple of hours before the Governor raised the question at all of the formation of a Ministry. What did the honorable member for Ashley do? He did not ask for a reconstruction of the Ministry. He advised the Governor to send for Mr. Stafford.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I really do not think these matters have anything to do with the question now under discussion.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—I was under the impression that they were, through your allowing me to enter upon the subject at all.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I allowed the honorable member to proceed, in the hope that he might show what bearing the matters he was referring to had upon the subject under discussion, which he has not yet done.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—I submit to your ruling, Sir. I am glad to have interested you so much that you have listened to me for so long a time without having interrupted me. If I have gone somewhat beyond the question I am very sorry. I think I shall be able to go back in a few moments. I may simply point out my reason for referring to a matter so remote as this. My only reason was to show that there was no obstruction of public business. There was no desire on that occasion to turn out the Ministry at all. The intention of the Legislature was to get rid of the Premier, and go on as before with the remaining colleagues and one or two more. I was going on to say that the honorable gentlemen on those benches have undoubtedly been intrusted with the powers of the Crown, and they are not going to give up—to surrender—the responsibility imposed upon them, simply because honorable gentlemen carry a catch division for an adjournment on the second reading of a Bill. Nothing of the sort. As a matter of fact, if we had all our friends here, all the members of our party, we should have carried this motion. Why are the honorable gentlemen opposite so anxious to have this debate adjourned? Why are they so anxious to bring on their motion of want of confidence at the earliest possible moment? Simply for this reason: They know full well that, if the Government are allowed to sit on those benches for a week, the majority that the Opposition boast of now, and boast of wrongly, will be gone. Does anybody believe that, if those honorable gentlemen in opposition were likely to have a majority in this House—if they could depend upon having a majority in a fortnight hence—they would take the course they have now pursued? Why, of course not. They would say to the Government, "We will give you the fullest fair-play. Make your Financial Statement; do as much work as you can: you will save us a great deal of trouble; bring in our Bills, pass all our Electoral Bills; do all you can; we will give you the fullest fair-play: as soon as you do all this, we, with the majority at our command, will then turn you out of office." That is what they would have said and done. But I am convinced that the independence of honorable gentlemen will assert itself, and that the Government will be placed in a position to enable them to carry on the public business, at all events during the remainder of the session. The honorable members opposite know it. Although I grieve to think it, I have a suspicion that one other reason why they object to go on promptly with the business is, that they are afraid of the disclosures the Government will make. I watched the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) very closely to-day, and I have learned to judge pretty fairly as to what is in his mind by his action and his speech; and, if the honorable gentleman is not weighed very heavily upon by some such consideration as that, then my penetration of character is not worth much. I am convinced in my own mind that those honorable gentlemen are afraid of the disclosures they think my honorable friends will make. They will do anything to avoid that. They will resort to any trick to prevent those honorable gentlemen getting sufficiently firmly seated on those benches to disclose to this House the true state of the public affairs, and the true position of the public finances. I am perfectly satisfied that such is the case. If it were really a mere question of party, they would have no objection to those honorable gentlemen holding their seats for a while longer, and would then bring on their motion of want of confidence in due course, when the Government must accept it and bring the question to an issue. What they want is to shake the Government in their seats before they fairly sit down, and prevent them from bringing before the House anything that would be of any importance. I do not pretend to be in the confidence of my honorable friends opposite, but they are not the men I take them to be if they are going to be jockeyed by any such trick as that. They have a heavy responsibility resting upon them—a responsibility which the whole country recognizes—and they would be failing in their duty to themselves, failing in their duty to the Crown, failing in their duty to every member of their party, if they budged from those benches until they had discharged the duty they owe to those who placed them in power, and the duty they owe to the country. Let the Opposition bring down their no-confidence motions and carry them. If I were one of the Ministry no power on earth could move me. I would not move until I had done my legitimate duty to this House. Do you think, if they did succeed in obtaining a majority, they could carry on the business? If by breaking a pair, or resorting to some such trick as that, they really obtained a majority, do you believe they would be able to go on with the business? The honorable member for Selwyn is not the man to remain in office longer than is necessary; he is not the man to cling to office against an adverse vote of this House. He has taken that place, as I am fully aware, at great personal sacrifice to himself, and with very great unwillingness; and nothing, I am perfectly certain, but a strong sense of duty would induce him to remain there a single day longer than he considered absolutely necessary. If the honorable gentlemen, the seven leaders of the Opposition, be agreed to make up a majority consisting of honorable gentlemen who have no mind of their own, who have no conscience of their own, then of course they are bound to turn the Government out in time, because the Government will not attempt to hold office simply for the sake of holding office. They will hold office simply that they may have an opportunity of bringing their measures before Parliament, and entirely disclosing to the country the real state of its affairs. And they are perfectly justified in doing so by parliamentary precedent, by constitutional practice, by self-respect, and by every other consideration that ought to weigh with gentlemen in their position. I do hope we shall not see this course of obstruction carried to any great length. If we do, we cannot help it. There are men in this House who have power of endurance and some knowledge of party tactics, and I venture to say that we shall see both their endurance and their knowledge of party tactics exercised to the utmost. The Opposition will not be allowed to prevent the Government carrying their measures, or to stop public business by mere factious obstruction, and by what I very much fear is mere greed of office. They think, I suppose—they told us in this House—that they could put a Ministry in which could carry on the public business on Tuesday.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is discussing the want-of-confidence motion, and going beyond the immediate question before the House.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—I admit that I have transgressed a little, Sir. Perhaps I was carried away slightly by my feelings. I will not encroach again, and shall sit down in the course of a very few minutes. All I will say is this: that I have observed with real regret that honorable gentlemen who have obtained in this House a high reputation for political ability and political character have lent themselves to a proceeding which is in reality nothing but pure obstruction. There was an opportunity to-night to get the Triennial Parliaments Bill passed—to get it absolutely passed and done with. It might have gone to the Legislative Council to-night, and I did grieve to see—I am not a bit surprised to see some honorable gentlemen, the honorable member for Tuapeka, the honorable member for Rodney, and some of those honorable gentlemen, act in this way: of course it is their cue to do this kind of thing—but, Sir, there are honorable gentlemen in this House whom I am grieved to find lending themselves to anything of the sort, because they will be ashamed and sorry for it afterwards, whatever the issue may be. Party lines are not so marked in this country yet that honorable gentlemen can afford to lend themselves to proceedings of this kind, merely for a momentary attack on those who are in opposition to them at the time; and I was grieved to find that there could be found so large a party in this House who would lend themselves to such proceedings as we have seen to-night. I was glad to see an honorable gentleman like the honorable member for Lyttelton have the courage and independence to act as he pleased. I felt that his explanation was scarcely necessary, because nobody, certainly not myself, ever supposed for a moment that his vote to-night meant anything more than a desire to follow honestly the line he pledged himself to at the hustings, and to vote for the Triennial Parliaments Bill. I should no more have thought of taking advantage of the vote he gave to suggest to him, or in any way to assume, that he was one of my party than I would have done anything else that was improper. I certainly admired the honorable gentleman's conduct to-night; and I say this: that, if there had been two or three other gentlemen in the House who would have done as he did, and acted according to their conscience instead of following a very doubtful leader, the Bill by this time would have been as good as law—a Bill which everybody wants to see passed, but which has been seriously imperilled by the obstructive and disorderly action of those honorable gentlemen.

Mr. SPEIGHT.—I am not going to answer the honorable member for Geraldine; and I will tell you why, Sir. Because a respected member of this House assures me he is unanswerable. The honorable member for Bruce assures me positively that he is unanswerable; and when a gentleman of the keen perception of the honorable member for Bruce gives me that assurance I may take it for granted that there is a good deal of truth in it. But, before proceeding further, I may be allowed to say that I am very much pleased indeed that, whatever this debate may have failed to do, it has accomplished one thing: it has made the honorable member for Bruce take a side at last—it has supplied some reason why he should take a side. I do not know whether it is the introduction of a Drainage Bill that will satisfy him, or anything of that nature; but certain it is that he has taken a side at last; and he has receded from the position of holding the balance so evenly that it was impossible to know where he was going to throw the straw that would turn it. Therefore it is satisfactory to have done with that, because one now knows exactly what position to take up. I think the honorable gentleman's assurance to me is correct, that the honorable member for Geraldine is unanswerable. But, Sir, will you permit me to say that, notwithstanding the fact that the honorable member for Geraldine sits on the opposite side of the House to me at the present time, I look upon him to a very large extent as being an excellent model for some of those young members who are constantly being appealed to? I say, in some respects; and I also say that the honorable member for Geraldine is a glaring example of the evils which young members may rush into if they imitate him. If I might speak my mind straight out with regard to the present position, I would say, "A plague o' both your houses." You are simply discussing the question of who is to go out of office and who is to step into office, and you are—at least on this occasion one side is—afraid to discuss that question by a solid vote. Now, I will say, irrespective of party considerations, that my idea of the position is this: If honorable gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House are sincere in the statement they make that they desire that the business of the country should be proceeded with, let them consent to have the no-confidence motion disposed of. The honorable member for Geraldine tells us that what is now the Opposition should give the new Government a fair chance. To do what, Sir? To mutilate and to maul the measures introduced by other people into this House—to put them in such a state that their own fathers and sponsors would not know them—to put those Bills in such a position that when they emerge from this House the people will look at them and say, "What have we gained by their passage?" Is that the chance the honorable members want? If so, I trust it is a chance this House will never give to any Ministry. But the honorable gentleman takes for granted one thing which I think is not admitted by those who look a little deeper. He takes it for granted that all those things which he and other members have been quoting as exactly analogous to the present position are analogous. Now, I am not thoroughly versed in parliamentary matters, but I am a little versed in regard to the present position, and I say it is this: that honorable members come down and table an amendment to the Address in reply to the Governor's Speech—an amendment which, on its face, bears this impress: "We want a reconstruction of the present Ministry"—an amendment which, apart from what it bears on its face, was distinctly framed in order to gain votes, and which did gain votes in consequence of its being so framed; and an amendment which, having been proved to be false in the promise which was held out, lost the votes of those who formerly voted for it. I think that that is the starting-point to go from, and, until we take that starting-point, we are not in a position to judge of the results with regard to voting hereafter. Honorable members may think that it is a perfectly dignified course to adopt to speak of other honorable gentlemen, who give their votes as conscientiously and as honestly as they do, as "wobbling" across the floor of this House. I said at the beginning of my remarks that I was anxious to take the honorable member for Geraldine as a model; but I do trust that, whatever model we young members in this House may follow, it will not be one that lays down such a very injurious course. I do not think that, because an honorable gentleman in this House chooses to record his vote in a certain way, he should be open to such a statement and such an insinuation as that he was prepared to "wobble" back again. The honorable gentleman objects to the course which is being pursued by the Opposition. Why? Because, he says, they have got no leader, or, having a leader for to-day, that leader is not there to-morrow. I wish to hold out an inducement to the honorable gentleman—an inducement of a character which, I think, will have full weight with him, and that is, that he ought to join our party as quickly as possible in the hope that that dog "will have its day." If these honorable gentlemen are to be leaders for a day, perhaps there may be an opening for the honorable gentleman in the same capacity. All I can say is that, if those honorable gentlemen he named have a following, the tail that will follow the honorable member for Geraldine will be very small indeed. I may further say that, if the honorable gentleman opposite means to infer, or to lead this House to believe, that the Opposition are in a disorganized state, he never made a greater mistake in his life. If he means to infer that there are divided counsels, he makes a great mistake. If he tells the House that, he is leading honorable members into an error—an error which, I think, will be proved, not to his entire satisfaction, but to his entire conviction, before many days are over his head. I will not lay claim to that keenness of perception which can see right through a man, as the honorable gentleman does. He states that he watched the late Native Minister and saw exactly what was passing through that honorable gentleman's mind in consequence of the different positions which he has taken up in the House to-day—first in one place and then in another. I would like to ask, if some great seer were to look through the honorable member for Geraldine, what he would think of the change of opinion which that honorable gentleman has expressed on the different subjects which have been discussed in this House, and what he would think of the position he has taken with regard to party government in this country—having stood behind one party to-day and being prepared to support another party to-morrow. It appears to me his proper place is in opposition, and, though he supports the Government at the present time, I believe ultimately he will be found in opposition, no matter what Government is in power. And I say, Long may he continue so. I believe he is a most useful, able, and active member of Opposition, and it would be one of the greatest mistakes he ever made in his life for him to support the Government. I hope he will see the matter in that light, and will devote the abilities he possesses to criticising clearly and fully, and by no means in a friendly manner, the action of every Government that comes into power. He objects to certain honorable members having such easy consciences that they can "wobble" across the floor of this House from opposite sides to those to which they had "wobbled" before. And why? Because they had done outrage to their consciences by voting against gentlemen at whose festive board they had sat on the occasion of a certain party spread. Well, it is too bad, when you look at it, that honorable gentlemen should go and sit under their mahogany and hob-nob with them, and then vote against them! Really, I put it to honorable members, is it not too bad? All I say is, that I hope that on any future occasion those honorable gentlemen will feel it incumbent upon them to call their people round them and analyze the characters of the guests they invite to their festive board, in order to see if it is possible that they may "wobble" into the Opposition lobby afterwards. But it appears to me that, when honorable gentlemen appeal to such a low standard, and say that, because a man has eaten at the board of another man, therefore he is to vote with him when appealed to—when honorable gentlemen do that, they are driven to the last resource to catch votes. It appears to me, furthermore, that it would have been much better, and certainly much more politic, if the honorable gentlemen had waited until the victory was secured, and had afterwards had their enjoyment over the festive board. But, under present circumstances, honorable gentlemen must not feel aggrieved if not only one or two, but half-a-dozen, are to be found, when the next want-of-confidence motion comes on, in the Opposition lobby, who have sat at the festive board with them; and I trust a number of those honorable gentlemen who are in that position will not be frightened or intimidated in the least by the threat held out by the honorable member for Geraldine, but will honestly do their duty to the country and to the constituencies who sent them here. Now we have to deal in this transaction with what is called "constitutional government." It appears that whenever a man wants a nice-sounding term with regard to these things he applies that of "constitutional government." You may mean one thing by it, and honorable gentlemen on the other side may mean quite another thing: therefore it is a perfectly safe expression. With regard to the present dispute, or the present contest, it appears to me it is not a question of constitutional government, but a question of sound common sense with a large number of members; and I put it in this light to the common sense of honorable members: Is it reasonable that a Ministry which has taken its place on those benches through a false representation of the ultimate intentions of those who proposed the amendment by which it gained its place, is to be permitted to fortify itself in the stronghold of office, when it does not possess the confidence of this House? It appears to me that members have only got to look at the thing just for a moment, and they must see it in this light: that, were the Opposition to permit those gentlemen to strengthen and solidify themselves upon those seats, they would not be doing their duty to the country. I will tell you why. The reason is this: that the struggle for the permanent possession of those benches is to be fought out after this debate is closed. Therefore it is all nonsense for members to throw hints out that this measure must be forced through, and everything else put on one side. That Bill is not in the slightest danger of being lost, if honorable members on that side of the House mean what they say, because members of the Opposition are sincere in their desire that that Bill shall be made law this session. I believe some honorable gentlemen desire to get home as quickly as possible: if, however, members are not prepared to come here and carry out in a legitimate manner the business of the country, they ought to say so to their constituents; but those of us who are not prepared to shunt the business, but are prepared to stand by to the last and do the work, ought to have none of those threats held out to us. The Colonial Treasurer told us plainly that, if things were to go on in this manner, these Bills would never be passed: in other words, if they are forced into the position into which we shall at once force them, they will offer opposition which cannot be overcome. Well, I say no member ought to be influenced by such threats as that. Let us come here to do our duty, and let us do it honestly, intelligently, and faithfully, no matter at what sacrifice of time to ourselves personally. An honorable member opposite says we have resorted, or have attempted to resort, or desire to resort, to snatch divisions, and that we have broken pairs. Well, I am led to believe that one of the most important things in this House is the honor of its members—that, if members make a certain agreement, of necessity that agreement must be kept at all hazards, whatever be the effect to party. Now, I take the references of the honorable member opposite to be to the case of the honorable member for Wairarapa, and, if he means to infer that there was any attempt on the part of that member of the Opposition to break his pair in that case, he is stating that which is not the fact. I was present when the honorable gentleman with whom he paired distinctly stated his intention of being present at the division to-night; and I think it is altogether ungenerous, and calculated to have a most injurious effect upon the arrangements made by members of this House, if these unfounded aspersions are to be levelled at honorable members. The honorable member for Geraldine ought not to have made the assertion he did make.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—Perhaps I may be allowed to say the honorable member does not know what he is talking about. I referred to another matter altogether, and the honorable member is entirely wrong.

Mr. SPEIGHT.—That is the only case that has occurred this session that I am aware of. Of course, if the honorable gentleman says he did not mean that, it must be so. The honorable gentleman further says we want a smart division. Of course we do. And why do we want it? Not for the reason the honorable gentleman assigns. The honorable gentleman thinks that what is now an assured majority will melt into a minority if the time be taken up. But will that be so? The members of the party of which I am but a humble unit hold a different opinion. No amount of insinuations with regard to corrupt practices the proofs of which are said to be contained in those mysterious pigeon-holes will weigh with any one who wishes to do his duty—no amount of mud-throwing will blacken, unless the mud is made to stick. Unless these honorable gentlemen are in a position to prove the charges they make they have no right to make them, and, once having made them, woe betide those making the charges if they do not in some measure substantiate them. There is not a man who has a seat in this House who would not condemn them: but that is not the only condemnation from which they will have to suffer. To cast aspersions upon the character of those who have held office for the past two years, by accusing them of being guilty of the conduct which is covertly imputed to them, must recoil upon the accusers if these assertions are not proved. There is not an honorable member of this House who would not regret the proceedings of men who could stoop so low; but not only that, instant condemnation would fall upon them throughout the country at large. Furthermore, I do not think it is calculated to encourage that public spirit, that spirit which should characterize our public men—and there are men of high principle on both sides of the House—if such aspersions are cast out without any attempt being made to prove them; and certainly it does not become honorable gentlemen who profess to be able to teach us young members what our duty ought to be to throw out such insinuations without attempting to prove that their charges are well grounded. The honorable gentleman made one other assertion, with which I must agree. He said that, if he occupied a position on the Government benches, no motion which the Opposition could bring forward would stir him from those seats until he pleased. I believe him; but I do hope that, whatever mistake this House may make, it will never make the mistake of putting any men there who seek to obtain office and keep in office because they have a certain object that they wish to carry out. It appears to me that when Ministers, having been defeated by a small majority, took the course of tendering their resignations to the Governor, and when the new Ministry was not reconstructed upon the lines clearly laid down by the House for its reconstruction, it is quite proper that that new Ministry should be met by a vote of no-confidence, and that that vote should be disposed of either in their favour or against them. Until that is done, it is utterly impossible that any business can be done, and the sooner a conclusion is come to the better for members, and the sooner the session will be closed. I can only conclude by thanking the honorable gentleman for the splendid example which he gives us as young statesmen. I am much obliged to him in that respect. But, at the same time, I must add that we have studied too carefully the antecedents of the honorable gentleman to follow his precepts in all things.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—I do not rise to reply to the speech we have just heard. We have had a very handsome lecture read to the House by a very young member—one of those gentlemen who, the honorable member for Christchurch City led us to believe, were to be such an ornament to the House. I am glad the House has had the opportunity of listening to the honorable gentleman and forming an opinion of him. He has been paraded to us as one of the great examples of the “working-man” who are coming down here to improve matters so greatly; but I think that in his speech to-night he has made a great mistake, and that he will be known in future as the “talking-man.” There is one great mistake he made, which did not originate with him. It came first from the honorable member for Totara, but the honorable member for Auckland City East has repeated it; and this is the statement I wish to refer to. It is this: that the motion carried at the instance of my honorable friend the Premier distinctly pointed to a reconstruction of the late Ministry; that the House adopted it with the intention that the Ministry should be reconstructed; and that, therefore, as there has been no reconstruction, this Ministry does not satisfy the conditions of the vote of the House. Let me answer that statement in this way: If there was any one declaration from the late occupants of the Ministerial benches which was more emphatic than another, which was more unqualified than another, it was that the late Ministry would be parties to no reconstruction. The House carried the resolution in the face of that well-remembered declaration, that no members of that Ministry would assist in any reconstruction.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Coalition.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—They would admit neither of coalition nor reconstruction; and at the meeting of members of the party this resolution was come to: that there should be neither one nor the other. That was distinctly understood, and I absolutely deny that any man gave his vote in the dark, or in the belief that there would be any reconstruction.

Mr. Speight

tion of the old Ministry. It was thoroughly well known that, if that resolution was carried, the necessary consequence would be that the leader of the party who proposed that resolution would be sent for, and that he must construct a Ministry. There is one other thing I should like to refer to: indeed, it was mainly to refer to this that I rose. The honorable member for Auckland City East has taken upon himself to speak of the honorable member for Bruce in a way in which no member who has not spent his first session in the House should speak of an old member. I have worked with the honorable member for Bruce on both sides of the House for many years past, and I say that there is not a better party man in the House than the honorable member for Bruce. I am aware that there is always a great difficulty in reconciling party obligations with individual feelings and opinions, especially when a young member comes into the House; but this I say: that no member in the House has more consistently and conscientiously exercised his own judgment, and at the same time complied with party obligations, than the honorable member for Bruce. And yet we are told, by an honorable member who has scarcely made his appearance in the House, that the honorable member for Bruce does not know his own mind, and is capable of changing his opinion without any occasion whatever.

Mr. STEWART.—I had hoped that the proceedings of this Parliament would be carried on with that courtesy and gentlemanly conduct which have hitherto characterized it; but I regret very much to notice that the honorable member for Geraldine has adopted a course which will not tend to perpetuate good feeling in the House. Such a speech as his can only be accounted for by supposing it to be a post-prandial speech; and, if we are to take his dictum as to what is to be the proper rule of conduct, where are we to go for his successor? The honorable gentleman has presumed to dictate to members of this House the latchet of whose shoes he is unworthy to loose; he has dictated a course that shows clearly this: that he can become a zealous advocate of one side of the House because those on the other side have not been able properly to recognize his merits. He finds himself in this position, that, if he deserts the party with which he is at present connected, he is nowhere. That is his position. He must remain where he is, or sink into oblivion. I always find, Sir, that, no matter how very ably, how very seriously, and how very satisfactorily the debates in this House are carried on, after some adverse vote is carried there is a species of buffoonery indulged in with a view to break the fall, and some gentleman is introduced for the purpose of acting the appropriate part. We have been treated to-night to a scene of that kind; but, though the remarks made were uttered no doubt with a view to provoking some discussion, and perhaps to producing some irritation of feeling, I am not going to allow it to warp my better judgment by now declaring that I shall do this, that, or something else, because an insulting speech has been made affecting the character of any honorable gentleman. And now with regard to myself. On the present occasion my course is perfectly satisfactory to my conscience, perfectly satisfactory to the judgment of my friends whose opinions I respect, and ultimately will be satisfactory to the intelligent and thinking men in the House. What did I come here for? Did I not tell my constituents that I came here for a special purpose—a particular purpose—and that was to oust, if possible, a very distinguished statesman, Sir George Grey, in whose administrative ability I had no confidence? I respected, as I told my constituents, the distinguished services which that statesman had rendered the British nation, and I always regarded him as a gentleman whose character was in every respect unassailable. All I said, and now state openly, was that I had no confidence in that gentleman's administrative ability. I may be right or I may be wrong in that opinion. Subject to that qualification, I told my constituents that I was prepared to support the honorable gentleman who has given notice of a vote of no-confidence; and is it to be said that, because I independently carry out the line of action I declared to my constituents, I am doing something that is open to doubt? When I came here I attended no caucus meetings of the present Government party; I was not consulted as to the amendment moved to the Address in Reply; and I do not wish to commit myself in any way as to any future conduct I may think proper to pursue. I shall exercise an independent discretion as to what course I shall take in the future. Now, what was that vote of want of confidence? It was a vote of want of confidence in the Ministry as then constituted. What was the logical conclusion to be drawn from the motion? It was this: that honorable members were fairly entitled to expect that an effort would be made to reconstruct that Ministry; and is it to be said that, because I voted with that party in order to accomplish the avowed purpose for which I came to this House, I am to be tied to the gentlemen with whom I voted on that occasion through the whole of their career? I claim for myself that the moment that the vote was carried I was perfectly free in every respect to select from this House any gentleman whom I could follow with confidence; and to suppose that I must act the part of some jackal in blindly following a certain gentleman is simply to suppose that I could be guilty of a thing of which I should be ashamed. I do not wish, of course, to allow my feelings to carry me away in any way by saying anything which, on more mature reflection, I might regret; but this I do say: that the present Premier, I think, ought fairly to have endeavoured to bring about what was really intended by that amendment—that he ought to have made some effort to carry out that resolution; and that, had he failed in doing so, his duty was to tell His Excellency the Governor that he was unable to carry out the resolution of the House. I may submit to this House, without saying anything whatever reflecting on the present Premier, that I think any one in his position would have said, "Your Excellency, you have sent for me; I am unable to give effect to this amendment; and I now tender you the commission which you gave me;" and then His Excellency would have been entitled to communicate with any gentleman in this House whom he thought worthy of its confidence. But what do we find?—that the Premier (Mr. Hall) wrongly conceived that that resolution entitled him, without consulting the House or getting an explanation from His Excellency, to select a Ministry of his own choice; and, if he has chosen such a Ministry, he must stand the consequences. If the Ministry of his choice does not possess the confidence of the House, the House is clearly entitled to pass a vote of want of confidence on the question. I do not know that I need refer to anything further, beyond this: that a good deal has been said about constitutional law. Every person seems to be well versed in constitutional law; they quote Todd, and suppose all the knowledge in the world on the subject is in that book. Now, I venture to say this: that, whatever authorities may be brought before this House—something like seventy or eighty years old—they are not to be taken as absolutely binding on the House. The principle throughout all these precedents I take to be this: that the voice of a representative Assembly of the people is the supreme voice; and that whatever expression of opinion this Assembly gives His Excellency, he, as the representative of Her Majesty, will give effect to, without inquiring whether that resolution has been come to on sufficient grounds or not. This Assembly I take to be the representative Assembly of the people. The Executive are the mere agents of this Assembly; and, if the Assembly has no confidence in its agents, it is entitled at any time to withdraw its authority, and say, "We shall no longer intrust you with the power attaching to your office," and confer the power upon some other gentlemen. That seems to me to be the proper solution of the question. And to say that this Ministry, or any other Ministry, is to remain in office in defiance of the express wish of this House is to use threats, I think, which will not meet with the approbation of this House, or of any other representative Assembly. His Excellency is no doubt entitled to select a gentleman from this House to construct a Ministry, but it is always upon the assumption that that Ministry will prove satisfactory to the House; and, if it is not satisfactory, this House will not hesitate to express its opinion on that question. Sir, I was extremely grieved to hear threats of that kind held out—threats which may be fortified by some extraneous rumours as to what will be done in respect to the honorable gentlemen opposite holding their seats. I say that no Ministry can constitutionally occupy seats on those benches for any time after the House has given expression of its want of confidence in them.

Mr. MURRAY.—Sir, I did not intend to take part in this debate; but reference has been made to me by the honorable member for Auckland City East. That honorable member is a fair specimen of the class he represents—members who support persons instead of principles, and oppose men rather than measures. I am not going to be drawn by the honorable member into this very irregular debate; and I regret, Sir, that you should have permitted one honorable member to so far forget and transgress the rules of Parliament as to introduce matters so foreign, and thus cause the unfortunate discussion which has taken place to-day, and which was altogether irrelevant to the question—namely, the second reading of the Triennial Parliaments Bill. All I trust is, that this will be prevented on future occasions. I will take another opportunity to vindicate my position, when the question of a vote of want of confidence is before the House; but I think my consistency will not be called in question by any honorable member who has experience of me in this House.

Mr. MACANDREW.—The House has unmistakably expressed its opinion that this debate should be adjourned until Tuesday. I think it had better be so. On this side of the House, we do not wish to waste further time, and I hope the House will allow the adjournment to take place at once. In the meantime, the Government may think better of it, and on Tuesday allow us to bring forward the motion of want of confidence. No time should be lost. That must come, and will come, and the sooner the better.

NEW MEMBER.

The Hon. Mr. F. WHITAKER was introduced, and took the oath.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

The Hon. Mr. WHITAKER.—Sir, I desire to make to the Council a short statement explaining the position I am in as regards the Government, and also the position the Government is in. The Council no doubt is well aware that during the last week the Ministry of which Sir George Grey was Premier went out of office, that the Hon. Mr. Hall was sent for by His Excellency to form a Government, and that he has done so. Mr. Hall himself is Premier; I am Attorney-General; Major Atkinson is Treasurer; Mr. Rolleston, Minister of Education and Justice, and holding other offices as well; Mr. Bryce, Minister for Native Affairs; and Mr. Oliver, Minister for Public Works. Such is the Ministry in office at the present time. There is one vacant portfolio, and also a vacancy in the Executive Council. These would have been filled up before this, but, as matters stand, it would perhaps not be a pleasant thing to offer to any gentleman a seat under such circumstances as those which at present exist, and therefore, until something definite is done in another place, the offices will not be filled up. Although I have to-day been introduced into this Council, at the same time I may say it is not the first time I have held a seat here. I was one of the first members of the Legislative Council of New Zealand. In 1853, Sir George Grey, being then Governor of New Zealand, appointed the Hon. Mr. Swainson, the Hon. Captain Kenny (now Colonel Kenny), and myself as the first three members of this Council. Colonel Kenny, I am sorry to say, is in such a state of health as not to be able to take his seat during this session. Mr. Swainson objects to travelling by sea, and it is quite probable that the Council will not again see him sitting here. Therefore I am the only one of the three now in the Council—how long I may be here I do not know. Our appointments were dated May, but before the first sitting of the Council was held a number of other members were appointed. Some of them I see now in the Council—the Hon. Major Richmond and the Hon. Sir Francis Dillon Bell. All the other members of that first Council are now absent, some being out of the colony, and many dead. Although I have to-day been introduced as a new member, really I am what may be termed renovated, for I previously for some years represented the Government in the Legislative Council. During that time I endeavoured to conduct the business of the Council satisfactorily, and I appeal to my honorable friends who were then in the Council with me whether I did not conduct the business satisfactorily. At any rate, I never had any unpleasantness with the Speaker, with the Council, or with any member of it. The business was conducted so far satisfactorily then, and I hope that I shall be able to conduct the business now in a manner which shall be satisfactory to the Council. I am aware that the other day an honorable gentleman who is sitting opposite—the Hon. Colonel Whitmore—took some exception to my appointment. Well, it may have been reasonable, but when I explain the circumstances which led to my appointment he will see that I have stopped gaps which could not otherwise have been stopped, and that therefore my appointment was, as it were, necessary. In the first place, it was necessary that the Government should have a representative in this Council. So far as the duty of representing the Government in the Council is concerned, no doubt there are gentlemen in the Council better able to do that than I am; but there were special qualifications required. It was necessary that the representative should come from the northern part of the colony—from Auckland, in fact. No other member of the Government comes from that part of the country, and it was considered that I should be a reasonable representative in that respect. My honorable friend Dr. Pollen no doubt would have filled the position so far; but, unfortunately, there was another qualification required, which was that the member of the Government in the Council should be a lawyer, inasmuch as he had to take the position of

Attorney-General. There was no member of the Council who united these three qualifications, although in other respects there are plenty of members of the Council who could have filled the position much better than I can hope to do; and therefore the Government thought it very desirable that I should be appointed to the Council to represent the Government here, and to act as Attorney-General. I hope my honorable friend opposite will be satisfied with this explanation, because I should be sorry to have any exception taken to me expressly by him. However, looking at the position I have occupied already, and having known him for a great many years, I have no doubt we shall get on very well together. I am quite sure my honorable friend did not mean anything personal to myself—I am certain he did not desire to be personally offensive in his objection, because, all the years we have known each other, though differences of political opinion have occurred, we have never had a difference of an unpleasant nature. I only hope that he will be as satisfied with my coming to the Council as I am satisfied to see him sitting over there. Having made this personal explanation, I think it is but right that I should inform the Council as to the course which the Government intend to take with regard to public business. Honorable members are no doubt perfectly aware that, for some considerable time past—that is to say, for the last two or three years—a great deal has been said about liberal measures in the way of electoral reform. Promises have been made by various Governments from time to time that certain liberal measures should be introduced. Such measures have occasionally been introduced into Parliament, but they have fallen through from one reason or another. I am not going to describe the way in which the different measures have come to grief, but I may say this: that matters stand in exactly the same position now as they have done for years past, and, notwithstanding all promises that have been made, the electoral law of the colony has not been placed on a proper footing. Very early in the history of this colony—as long ago as 1858—I assumed to myself the position of being a reformer of the electoral laws, and I prepared a number of Bills for that purpose. Some were rejected by the Council, some by the House, and some became law. I then endeavoured to point out to the Council that the legislation I proposed was in the direction in which legislation must one day or another go—that it was no use putting it off, for such legislation would inevitably come to pass—that we had a democratic Constitution, and we should deal with it in that view. As to the measures I proposed, whether they were or whether they were not accepted then, they must be accepted some day or another. During the last few years I think that the prediction I then announced to this Council has been entirely fulfilled. Part of the electoral reforms then proposed have been granted. There have been extensions of the franchise: but still a very great deal remains to be done; and I trust that, when the Council comes to deal with such measures as the present Government will bring forward, they will bring to their consideration a liberal spirit. Immediately upon arriving in Wellington, having arrived only on Saturday, I devoted my attention to the matter for the purpose of putting the electoral measures on a proper footing. I am happy to say that I have completed the various measures which I think are required, and that, with one or two exceptions, they are printed, and will in the course of the day be distributed amongst members of both branches of the Legislature. The first measure to be considered will be in the direction of repealing the whole of the electoral law at present in existence, so that in fresh legislation we may reduce our law to narrow limits. At present the law governing electoral matters extends over twenty or thirty Acts; and I must confess that, though a lawyer, and experienced as I am in these matters, I find it is exceedingly difficult to ascertain under what particular Act particular steps are to be taken, when the Acts of Parliament under which we proceed extend over twenty-three or twenty-four years, and are exceedingly numerous in themselves. I think it would be desirable that our legislation on this subject should be confined within as narrow a compass as possible; and a measure has been prepared, under the direction of the Government, by myself for the purpose of repealing all these laws. Then we come to the question of what laws are to be passed in their place. One of a very important character is that which deals with the question of the franchise. A great deal has been said and written upon this subject during the last few years, and, to a great extent, persons and parties have been in accord as to what direction new legislation should take. I may be allowed to say that the Government are perfectly agreed as to what measures they will submit to the House—these measures, of course, being submitted to the other branch of the Legislature first, as they are more applicable to the House of Representatives than to the Council; and when they come to this Chamber I shall endeavour to place before you the reasons which have induced the Government to take the steps they have done in this direction. The Qualification of Electors Bill is one of the first to which I shall refer. At present there are six or eight different qualifications. All these are abolished, and the qualifications are reduced to two simple franchises. One will be that every person having a freehold estate, situated in any electoral district, of £25 in value is entitled to register as an elector; and every man who has resided in the colony twelve months, and has resided in a particular electoral district for six months, will also be entitled to the franchise. We shall by that means get rid of all these various franchises, including that most objectionable one, the miner's right. I do not propose to weary the Council by discussing this measure. Probably I shall have an opportunity of doing that at a future time, when I shall enter fully into the reasons which have induced the Government to take this course. One thing I might mention: the Government, under my advice, has decided to put these various measures of reform into separate Bills. In 1877

I prepared a Bill which was intended to be an entire electoral code. I still believe that that is the best course to follow; but the objection to it is this: If you put all these provisions into one Bill, one man objects to this point, another man objects to that point, and so on, till the result is that you get no Bill at all, and there is no electoral reform. Therefore each particular subject will be brought under the consideration of the Council in a separate Bill, and then, if they are passed, and if I should still continue to be Attorney-General, I should desire to put all these separate Acts into one Act, so that they would then form a complete electoral code. So far as regards the electoral law, that is the position of the Government. All of these Bills, eight in number, are, with two exceptions, prepared, and either have been distributed or will be distributed to-day. The Qualification of Electors Bill I have referred to. Then there will be the Regulation of Elections Bill. That will be very much like the present one. There will, however, be a few alterations, such as an extension of the hours of polling, and several other alterations which are of no great consequence; but the whole of the present Act will be re-written, with the view of reducing its bulk, and making the law more clear than it is at present. Whether I have succeeded in doing so is a matter which will come on for discussion hereafter; but, so far as I have been able, my object has simply been to make the law as clear as possible, and to reduce it in bulk. The next Bill to which I shall have to call the attention of the Council is the Registration of Electors Bill. Now, to my mind, the present system—and I have had some experience of it—is as bad as it can be. I know of nothing more cumbersome—nothing more calculated to deter people from taking the trouble to put their names on the register—than such a system. Especially when we come to the Revision Courts, and to the examination of witnesses—and we know what takes place at these Courts—I conceive that no worse system than our present one could possibly be adopted. It is true it is the system which has been adopted in England, and that it is in operation at the present day; but, nevertheless, it is utterly unsuited to our requirements. It has been the object of the Government, in considering this subject, to establish a system under which every man who has the qualification of an elector should be placed upon the electoral roll, and under which every man who has no right to be on the roll shall be put off. The mode in which it is proposed to do this is very simple. It is proposed that the Registration Officer shall not be a Government official holding numerous other offices, and thus be unable to attend to his duties as Registration Officer, but that he shall be an active, energetic officer, appointed simply for the purpose of seeing that the name of every person entitled to vote is upon the register; it will be his duty also to see that every person holding freehold to the value of £25, or being a resident in the district for six months and in the colony for twelve months, is placed upon the roll. The Bill makes provision also that, in the event of any Registrar not performing his duty, and not putting people upon the roll who have a right to be on, those people shall have an opportunity of making their claim to be put on at any time, and if the Registration Officer object he may be summoned in the ordinary way before the Resident Magistrate's Court at any time to show cause why he should not place such persons' names on the roll. When we take care that all those persons shall be put upon the roll who have a right to be upon the roll, and provide that the roll shall be purged by taking out summonses against persons who have no right to be on the roll, to compel them to show cause why their names should not be removed from the roll, I think we shall get a system which is simple, and by which we shall get on to the roll all those entitled to be on it, and keep off all those who have no such right. That, at any rate, is the object of the Bill. Whether it will secure that object time alone will show. In Committee, perhaps, suggestions may be thrown out as to amendments which would improve the Bill. There is another Bill to which I will refer, and that is the Corrupt Practices Bill. It is very much the same as the English Act, but it will be reduced in bulk and made somewhat clearer. Then there is the Regulation of Elections Bill. That is not printed; but there is no question of policy involved, its object merely being to make as simple as possible the recording of votes. It is at the Printer's now. The only other Bill to which I shall call attention is the Election Petitions Bill. I am quite sure that the Council will see, as I have seen, that the mode of trying disputed elections—the mode of trying election petitions—is, of all things, the most unsatisfactory. I know of no tribunal that is more unsatisfactory than a tribunal of certain members taken out of the House of Representatives for the purpose of trying a petition against the return of one of the members of the House. I have sat on these Election Committees, and I say that they are altogether unsatisfactory. They have been found so unsatisfactory in England that for some time past jurisdiction in regard to election petitions has been placed in the hands of the Judges of the superior Courts of Westminster. Following, therefore, the lead of England in this matter, we have prepared a measure for the purpose of having appointed the Judges here to try election petitions as nearly as possible after the English form. There are a number of provisions in the English Act which are not applicable to us; and in preparing this measure the object of the Government was to reduce the Bill to as small a compass as possible. Although I have sat as a member of the House of Representatives, and always wish to speak of that branch of the Legislature with the greatest possible respect, still I cannot thus speak of it with reference to the present system of dealing with election petitions. These Election Committees are, of all the tribunals I have had to do with—and I have had to do with a great many—the most objectionable. I hope I am not wearying the Council. I am only desirous of explaining what the Government of which I am a member are doing. I desire to say nothing further on the electoral law. The Bills will shortly be in the hands of honorable members themselves, and they will be able to judge how far they are an improvement on the legislation that is in force at the present time on the subject. There is another question which is not peculiarly applicable to this Council, but to which I should like to refer—namely, the question of finance. The question of finance is really the foundation of everything else, because without money I do not know what you are to do at all. Impecunious Governments, like individuals, find themselves in great straits. It has been the endeavour of the Colonial Treasurer (Major Atkinson), during the past few days, as far as possible to arrive at a complete estimate of the present financial position of New Zealand. I am bound to say, so far as his investigations have gone, that the present financial position of the colony is not of a very satisfactory character. The expenditure during the last twelve months has been very much in excess of the revenue. The expenditure we are going on with at the present time—in this present financial year—is very largely in excess of the expected revenue; and in June next there is no question that, unless some step is taken either to increase the revenue or to decrease the expenditure, or both, there will be a very large deficiency indeed in the ordinary revenue to cover the expenditure. That is not a satisfactory state of things; but such it is at present. The only object which the Government has in view is to see exactly the financial position of the country—not, in the first instance, to make any proposals with a view to raising revenue, not to pass any condemnation on what has been done, but simply to lay before the Assembly a complete statement of the financial condition of the country—and that, before any questions of taxation, of raising additional revenue, can be gone into, it is absolutely essential for any Government to do. And, whatever may be the result of what is under the consideration of the House of Representatives with reference to the present Government, no doubt that will be the foundation on which any Government must shape its legislation with a view to balancing the revenue and expenditure of the country. It seems to me that a man who lives beyond his income cannot go on for ever; and so it is with a Government. It must come to an end at some time or other. Therefore, if at the present time there is a very large excess of expenditure over income, the matter ought not to be allowed to rest a single day without looking it in the face, and adopting some means of placing the finances of the colony on a more satisfactory footing. The object of the Government is not, in the first instance, to propose measures by means of which additional revenue may be raised, but simply to ascertain and lay before the General Assembly—the House of Representatives and the Legislative Council—the exact financial position of the country. Sir, an endeavour will be made to have that done; and, supposing that matters proceed in the way which I presume they will this afternoon in the House of Representatives, it is the intention of Major Atkinson to make a statement showing exactly, so far as he can trace it up to the present time, the position of the colony financially. The subsequent measures which will be necessary will be the subject of discussion hereafter. So much for the questions of electoral reform and finance. The next question to which I wish to refer is one surrounded with great difficulty and danger—the Native question. No doubt Native affairs in two or three parts of the colony are at this moment in an extremely unsatisfactory state. No doubt considerable danger and apprehension have been caused by what has been going on for some time past on the west coast of this Island, and I am sorry to say that at the present time it does not seem as though that danger is passing readily away. There are a number of Natives in prison at the present time—some convicted, some committed for trial—and no doubt it has been a source of very considerable anxiety what is to become of these. The position of matters somewhat resembles the position of a man who has got a wolf by the ears—it is dangerous to let go, and dangerous to hold on; and it is difficult to say on which side the danger is the greatest. For some time, affairs on the West Coast have been in a very unsatisfactory position. Te Whiti is still holding his meetings from month to month, and altogether the appearance of things is far from satisfactory. The Natives are no doubt watching with great anxiety what is to become of their friends and relatives who are now incarcerated in the gaols of Wellington and Dunedin. It is the intention of the Government, with reference to this question, to appoint a Commission for the purpose of investigating whether or not any real grievances exist. Grievances are alleged by the Natives, and by some Europeans on the part of the Natives. They may or may not exist—I am not in a position to express any opinion upon it; but it is evident, at the present time, that some very decided steps should be taken for the purpose of ascertaining whether grievances do exist, and, if so, of redressing them. If there are no grievances, then probably strong means must be adopted to allay the feeling of anxiety that at present prevails, and to insure the peace of the colony. With regard to the other portion of the colony where Native matters have not been in a satisfactory state—the Thames District—no doubt the position of affairs there is very awkward and unpleasant just now. There are certain men there who have committed an offence against life. Some Natives there discharged shots at Europeans, and wounded one man severely. They have put themselves beyond the law; they defy us to take them, and are building pae and fortifying themselves. Now, that is a most unfortunate thing, and in a civilized country it is impossible that such a state of affairs should be allowed to continue. It is a threatening attitude which they assume, and it is of the greatest possible importance that this matter should be set right, so that it may no longer be a threatening danger to the community. No doubt the people in the neighbourhood are excited, and would, perhaps, like to urge the Government to take immediate steps in the matter; and no doubt the Government which preceded this one was urged on to a course which might possibly involve the country in war. Once begun, there is no knowing where that war would end. I am sure that honorable members, and those who have to deal with Native affairs, know that when war begins there is no telling to what part of the country it may extend. As regards the present, nothing is being done further than that Mr. Mackay has been sent to the Thames by the late Government for the purpose of investigating the matter and seeing what should be done. Until we get his report it is difficult to say what course should be pursued. Nothing is causing greater anxiety to the Government than the question of Native affairs; and it will be the anxious endeavour of the Government, as far as we can, to deal with this question in a way to avoid war. I know of nothing that would be more disastrous to New Zealand than a Native war. I remember the colonists of the North were at one time charged with a desire for war on account of the commissariat expenditure which it gave rise to; but no charge was ever more unjust and unreasonable. The amount expended during war-times by the Imperial and Colonial Governments went into the pockets of a few individuals only, and the great bulk of the community were as opposed as I was to war, believing it to be the most injurious event that could happen to the colony. It will be the object and the great desire of the present Government to avoid war. On the other hand, we must not shut our eyes to the fact that we may be placed in a position where we cannot evade it. Offences against the law cannot be allowed to take place without doing something to prevent their recurrence and to punish the offenders. In endeavouring to inflict this punishment, however, we must proceed in such a way as to avoid a complication of Native difficulties. The intentions of the Government are these: that they will, as far as possible, redress any grievances the Natives have; that they will punish offenders as far as it is possible to do so, and evade war if by any possibility that can be done. Sir, those are the great and important questions which will engage the attention of the Assembly during this session—the electoral business, the Native business, and the finances of the country. If these questions can be disposed of during the present session, I am quite sure this Council will say the Assembly has done a good deal of work, and more than could reasonably be expected to be done. Whether or not we shall be successful in bringing these matters to an issue, it is impossible for me now to say. I am sorry to say that we cannot proceed speedily with a number of measures which we should like to introduce; but the three subjects which I have mentioned are those which the Government are at the present time attempting to deal with. There are also, no doubt, a number of other subjects of great importance to be dealt with, such as the purchase of Native lands, and the reforming of the Native Land Court; but these measures are not of that urgency which appertains to the other subjects I have already referred to. Of course, looking to the fact that it is now rather late in the year, there may be difficulty in going into some of those measures that ought to be settled speedily; but the Government will be prepared to devote its best energies to the subjects with which it will have to deal, and will be willing, as long as the Assembly think fit to sit, to go on with the measures which I have indicated. I have troubled the Council at some length; but I was desirous of explaining these three subjects. I would only remind honorable members that there are other matters of a great deal of importance—especially those questions relating to the dealing with Native lands—which will also receive the anxious consideration of the Government. There was a proposition by the former Government that there should be a particular mode of sale by the Government acting on the part of the Natives. The present Government are disposed to entertain that favourably; but the fear I have is, that the Natives will not accept that position—that we shall have some difficulty in inducing them to agree with the proposal. I quite agree that no better system, if practicable, could be adopted; and, if we have time, the Government will bring in a Bill dealing with the sale of Native lands, and another reforming the Native Land Court. These things will be dealt with in two different Bills, because if you mix up too many subjects together in one Bill you get your Bill thrown out—because one man disagrees with one part, and another man disagrees with another part. The intention of the Government is to divide this subject into two—to reform the Native Land Court, and to leave the matter there, without determining in that measure how the land shall be subsequently dealt with. There is also, on the part of the Government, a desire to reduce the price of land, especially as regards the deferred-payment land. Great exception has been taken that the price is too high—that it deters people from settling on the land. A Bill will be introduced for the purpose of dealing with this subject, and other minor Bills will be brought in. I am quite sure that when these Bills are introduced the Council will give them that fair consideration which they deserve, and that they will deal with them in a liberal manner. I am much obliged to honorable members for having given me this opportunity to make this statement to the Council.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—Although there is no motion before the House, I desire to say one or two words of a personal character. The Hon. the Attorney-General complained of some remarks made by me with reference to the action of the Government in going outside the walls of this Council to appoint a representative here. I beg to say that my remarks were not directed against the Hon. the Attorney-General in his personal character. I have enjoyed his friendship for a great many years, and I do not think there is one of his friends who has a greater admiration of his political character than myself. The honorable gentleman has, in times past, conferred services on this country which have never been sufficiently recognized. He at one time sat in this Council, and left it to take a seat in another place. It was always a matter of regret to me that he left this Council, and apart from other considerations it is a great matter of gratification to me to see him return here once more. In making the observations I did, I carefully said that, if the choice was to fall upon any person outside this Council, there was no one upon whom I would be more glad that it should fall than the honorable gentleman. I simply confined my objection to the Government seeking outside the walls of this Council for members to represent them here. There are but one or two members who can attain that position, and it seemed to me hard that they should be passed over for any political reason in that way. In spite of what the honorable gentleman says about myself, I accept the appointment as being complimentary to the Council, as no more competent man could be appointed. With regard to the future Bills to be brought down, I think they can be better discussed at some other time. While I guard myself against saying that they are not open to exception, I at the same time have only a right to reply upon a personal point, and to assure the honorable gentleman that my remarks were not of a personal character, and that my feelings of friendship towards him are what they always were. I would like to ask a question without notice: Does the Attorney-General propose to take business, or would it be more convenient to adjourn the business of the country for the present?

The Hon. Mr. WHITAKER.—I am entirely in the hands of the Council. I have come here to-day quite prepared to proceed; but, if the Council think it more appropriate to adjourn, I am quite willing to do so. For my part, I have no feeling one way or the other. I see no reason why we should not proceed with the ordinary business. If an honorable member moves the adjournment, the Council can then express its opinion. I shall bow with deference to the opinion of the majority, but for my own part I see no reason why we should not go on.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—Then I shall move that this Council at its rising do adjourn until Friday next. Inasmuch as the honorable gentleman has told us there are Bills of importance—Bills of a political character—I think it would be more convenient, and more consistent with our past practice, to adjourn till Friday next. The honorable gentleman says he is not aware of any circumstance to justify our adjourning until that date. The only thing that justifies me in moving the motion I do is that I understand that a distinct want-of-confidence motion has been tabled in the other Chamber, and it has been our practice, as a rule, not to proceed with business here while such a vote is pending. I have no other reason for moving the adjournment beyond that it will be more consistent with our practice in the past. I have no feeling with regard to proceeding with business of a non-political character; but, after the disposal of such matters, I think it would be more convenient and consistent if we did adjourn until Friday.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—I think there would be an advantage in going on, at any rate, with the notices of motion, and disposing of them. Probably two Committees will be appointed, and honorable members who would be in town would have something to employ them in the meantime. These notices of motion can scarcely be regarded as having a political character. They have no political signification whatever, and it would be advantageous if they were considered; so that honorable members, instead of loitering about town, would have an opportunity of turning time to beneficial account. I see no objection, on the rising of the Council, to adjourn till Friday; but, at any rate, these notices of motion should be disposed of first.

The Hon. Mr. WHITAKER.—Do I understand the honorable and gallant member to move that the Council, at its rising, do adjourn till Friday? The honorable gentleman did not propose that we should adjourn forthwith?

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—I meant to move, when we came to the Orders of the day, that the Council should adjourn till Friday, if the honorable gentleman did not himself move to that effect.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT.—Is it competent for me to move an amendment? I move, That, on the rising of the Council, we adjourn till Tuesday next. I do so in order that we may not walk about the streets idly in the meantime. I want to go into the country, and see the nakedness of the surroundings of Wellington. It is necessary for the sake of our health that we should go away from the stinks and smells of this abominable city. I should like to renovate my health by going into the country. It has been the custom of this House to adjourn when a motion of want of confidence has been tabled in the other branch of the Legislature.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL.—No, no.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT.—We did it when the last Ministry went out; and that is a precedent for my moving that the Council, at its rising, do adjourn till Tuesday. I shall take a division on the matter.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL.—I wish to explain the contradiction which I gave to the remark of the Hon. Colonel Brett, that it had been the practice to adjourn while motions of want of confidence were being debated in the other branch of the Legislature. I think the precedent cuts the other way. Two sessions ago there was a want-of-confidence motion on the Paper for many weeks, and yet this Council went on with the business, and the want-of-confidence motion remained on the Order Paper till the last day of the session.

The Hon. Mr. G. BUCKLEY.—I intend to support the amendment. It is usual, when votes of want of confidence are tabled in the other Chamber, that business should not be proceeded with here. I listened with great attention to the statement of the Hon. the Attorney-General, but I was disappointed about this: that I expected him to make some reference to the motion of want of confidence, and to state what was the intention of the Government respecting it, because I have heard, on very good authority, that the Government have not a majority of the House of Representatives, and that they intend to meet this want-of-confidence motion. If that is the intention of the Government, I do not see that there is any use in the Council going on with the business. They might as well adjourn for a longer period than Tuesday. I shall support the amendment.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL.—I hope the Council will not think it presumptuous in me, as one of the only three members present in the Council of those who met in May, 1854, if I venture to offer to the learned gentleman opposite (the Hon. Mr. Whitaker) my congratulations on his having returned to his seat in this Council. It has not only been my good fortune to be united with that honorable gentleman during all our lives by ties of close personal friendship, but it was also my good fortune to be associated with him in the first Government that was formed after responsible government was introduced to this colony; and, ever since that time, the services which the honorable gentleman has rendered to the country, irrespective of party and the various political conflicts in which he has taken part, have been such that none of us, on whatever side of politics we may be, can do otherwise than feel a high satisfaction at again numbering amongst the members of this Council a gentleman whose career has been so distinguished as that of my honorable friend. I hope the honorable and gallant Colonel opposite will not press his amendment that we should adjourn until Tuesday, because it will be necessary to make some provision for the public service immediately, and if we adjourn till Tuesday we may place the public service at a great disadvantage. I quite allow that, when a motion of want of confidence is pending in the other branch of the Legislature, it is not convenient for us in this Council to advance any political business, or to deal with subjects that may bring up party considerations and party conflicts; but we need not adjourn over such a time as might debar the House of Representatives from making that provision for the public service which it is necessary to make.

The Hon. Captain FRASER.—I should like to say a few words in the way of congratulating the Hon. Mr. Whitaker on his presence in this Chamber. I have known him for twenty years, and I have always been of opinion that no more able man could be found in this colony. I am sorry to say that I cannot support either the motion or the amendment, because I think it quite possible that before Friday next there may be another Government in office, who may wish to carry on the business of the colony at once. If we were to pass such a resolution as this it would place obstacles in the way of the Government, so that I hope we shall adjourn for a shorter time. I am glad to hear that the Attorney-General has no intention of proceeding with any Bill to-day, but, at the same time, I was very much pleased to hear that the Government proposed to take action with regard to the sale of agricultural land on deferred payments. As a matter of fact, I had drafted a notice of motion on the same subject, which I will now read. It is as follows: "That, in the opinion of this Council, it is desirable that, when there are two or more applicants for a section of agricultural land on deferred payments, the section should not be put up to auction between the applicants, but be decided by lot." My object in bringing forward that motion is this: that applicants for deferred-payment land in future should merely pay what we have paid in the past for our land—namely, the upset price of the land.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER.—While congratulating the Hon. Mr. Whitaker on his appearance in this Council, I may express the hope that, if there should be another Government in existence on Friday, as the Hon. Captain Fraser seems to indicate as being possible, it will distinguish itself by making an appointment as satisfactory to the Council as that of the Hon. Mr. Whitaker. I am sure there is not a supporter of the present Government who will not in that case feel some compensation for their loss. I agree that the proposed adjournment till Tuesday next would be too long, and would much prefer to vote for an amendment for shortening the period.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES.—I shall venture to move, as an amendment, That the Council adjourn till Thursday next. It seems to me that, if the circumstances are such as were shadowed forth by the Hon. Sir Dillon Bell, we should not adjourn for such a period as might put the Government, or any new Government that might come into power, to any inconvenience. Therefore I think it would be better that we should meet earlier than Friday, in order to deal with any business that may arise. I will now move, That the Council adjourn till Thursday.

The Hon. Mr. WHITAKER.—With regard to the observations which fell from the honorable member, Mr. Buckley, about the Government "stone-walling" a want-of-confidence motion, I can only say I have never heard of it. I have never been a party to "stone-walling," and have no intention of being so. All the present Government wishes to do is to place the position of the colony clearly before the Assembly, so as to enable the Assembly to judge what course should be pursued. With regard to whether such a proceeding is contemplated in the other House, I knew nothing about it, and I do not think that it is right to go upon such an assumption. I am not aware that it is convenient that what is said in the lobbies from time to time—the scandal, or whatever it may be—should be imported into the debates of this Council, and should be held up as a guide as to the course which we should pursue. I think it is not convenient. I shall say nothing upon that point. So far as I am concerned—so far as the Government are concerned—we have no desire to press the Council to go on with any business; but I think the suggestion made by one honorable gentleman opposite ought to be adopted, and there should not be any long adjournment, and for this reason: It is the intention of the Colonial Treasurer to ask to-day, in another place, for leave to introduce a Bill for the purpose of increasing the amount of deficiency bills which may be issued for the payment of the current expenditure of the Government. The Government, under the Public Revenues Act, have power to issue deficiency bills to the extent of £400,000. At the present time the whole of these bills have been issued, and, what is more, the whole of the money has been spent. As a consequence, if further money is not obtained, a great number of persons who would be entitled to receive money from the Government cannot be paid. The intention of the Colonial Treasurer is to ask the House to increase the power to issue deficiency bills to £600,000, or, in other words, to issue £200,000 more. Money is urgently required by the Government, and, if the Bill passes the other branch of the Legislature, it will be necessary to obtain the sanction of the Legislative Council to it. Therefore I propose that the adjournment shall be until to-morrow, so that, if the Bill should come up, we may be in a position to deal with it. I hope the Council will take that view of the matter. In regard to ordinary business I am entirely in the hands of the Council. I do not care whether we go on with it or not. It will be seen by the Order Paper of another place that it is proposed to suspend the Standing Orders for the purpose of procuring the money required, so that we may expect the Bill up here at very short notice, and it is our duty to be in a position to assist the other branch of the Legislature in passing this necessary measure.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—I hope I may be allowed to withdraw my motion. In introducing it, I pointed out that so long an adjournment ought not to be made if it would cause inconvenience to the public service. I now think it would be well to meet from day to day, so as to be able to pass such a measure as has been foreshadowed by the Attorney-General. I have no objection at all to meeting day after day, so long as we understand we are not to go on with ordinary Ministerial business, but that we simply meet to do business of a formal character, to confirm action with regard to financial matters which may be taken in another place.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

RAILWAY CONTRACTS.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL, in moving the motion standing in his name, said he should probably meet the wishes of the Council by refraining from importing into the question any debatable matter. The fact was, there was no political object in this motion; but there was some reason to believe that the provisions of the Railways Construction Act, and the Public Works Act which was incorporated in the Railways Construction Act, had not been completely observed in the letting of contracts since the session of 1878, and that there must have been some misapprehension on the part of some departments as to the intention of the Legislature: and, if so, it was necessary to point out what was the correct interpretation, or to make the intentions of the Legislature more clear than at present they appeared to be. It would be sufficient for him to remind the Council that the 17th section of the Immigration and Public Works Appropriation Act was agreed in Conference between the two Houses to be withdrawn and treated as a nullity; and that it was nothing but a technical difficulty which prevented the Speaker of the other House from agreeing to the course which the Conferences had laid down. But contracts had nevertheless been entered into under the authority of that clause, and payments made under it: so that the whole object they had in view at the Conferences, as a mode of getting over what threatened to be a very serious conflict between the two branches of the Legislature, had been entirely frustrated. He need not remind the Hon. the Speaker of this, nor that he (Sir F. Dillon Bell), having held the same office as he (the Hon. the Speaker) held in 1878, ventured to express complete agreement with the course taken by the Speaker on that occasion in declining to assent to the Appropriation Act being amended by message from the Crown; but the result had been, so far, that the agreement made between the two Houses had been entirely frustrated. The honorable gentleman, the late Colonial Secretary, would not suppose that he attributed to him unfair dealing with the Council, or had himself been concerned in a breach of faith towards the Council; but he did think the honorable gentleman made a mistake last session in saying that the Government had acted upon legal advice as to the true meaning of the 3rd clause of the Railways Construction Act. Perhaps the Hon. the Attorney-General would be kind enough to say whether there existed any record of the advice he was referring to—namely, that, although the Railways Construction Act said that contracts should not be entered into “unless” the Governor’s assent was given, and certain other formalities gone through, yet it was not necessary for such assent to be given before the contract was entered into, and it might be given afterwards. He (Sir F. Dillon Bell) was prevented last session by the forms of the Council from doing that which he now proposed to do—namely, to read the original proposal made by the Managers of the House of Representatives to the Conference. It was in these words:—

“Before contract: 1st. The Chief Engineer to certify that route chosen is the proper one. 2nd. The plans and estimates to be approved by Governor in Council. Further proviso: At each sitting of Parliament, plans and estimates that have been approved by Governor in Council, and on which contracts have been taken and also on which no contracts have been taken, to be laid on table of House and Council.”

That was written by the Hon. Mr. Stout, whose absence from Parliament they all regretted, and who held at that time the same office which was now held by the Hon. Mr. Whitaker—the Attorney-Generalship of the colony. And if the proposition had not been so clearly expressed, that those formalities should be gone through and completed before any contract was entered into, he (Sir F. Dillon Bell) was absolutely certain that the agreement which was come to between the two Houses would never have been made. Under those circumstances, he thought it was very desirable, without attributing blame to anybody, and without any object which might be supposed to have any party colour, that the Council should take steps to find out all about the letting of those contracts. If he was found to be wrong in assuming that the provisions of the law had not been strictly adhered to, no one would be more glad of it than himself. But if, either through imperfect audit or through the want of proper apprehension of the law by any department, it should be found that the provisions of the law had not been complied with, the Council would doubtless take such steps as were necessary to secure that the intentions of the Legislature should for the future be always strictly carried out. They were about to sanction the appropriation of the loan of £5,000,000, and, on whatever side of politics they might be, it was obviously necessary not to allow that appropriation to be so made as to permit any action in connection with the spending of the money which was not strictly in accordance with the law. He was sure every one would agree that that was a proper object to be gained; and the Committee would do good service by laying down more strictly the rules which should be pursued in future, as every step they took in the present state of the finances of the colony only showed more and more that that strictness was absolutely necessary.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That a Select Committee be appointed, to inquire into and report upon the several contracts for railway construction entered into since the session 1878; the dates when the engineers' reports and certificates were submitted to the Governor in Council, and His Excellency's assent received thereto; the nature, amount, and date of each contract; the several payments made thereunder, and the votes to which the same are charged. Such Committee to consist of the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse, the Hon. Mr. Miller, the Hon. Mr. G. Buckley, the Hon. Mr. J. Johnston, the Hon. Colonel Whitmore, the Hon. Mr. Wilson, the Hon. Mr. P. A. Buckley, the Hon. Mr. Wood, and the mover; with power to call for persons, papers, and records. Four to be a quorum. To report in three weeks."—(Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell.)

The Hon. Mr. WHITAKER had no objection to the motion. Of course it was of the utmost importance that the provisions of the law should be strictly complied with. Whether they had or had not been in this case, he had no means of knowing at the present time. The Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell intimated to him on the previous day that he thought there was a legal opinion on the subject, which, if it had any existence, he desired should be placed before the Committee or the Council. He had caused inquiry to be made, but no such legal opinion had been found. However, there seemed to be an impression in the Government offices that an opinion had been given; and further search was being made. If the opinion were found, it would be produced, should the Government think it proper and desirable. Of course there were occasions on which such opinions were produced; but there were many instances in which it would be most improper to produce them, for legal opinions given by the Law Officers of the Crown were generally regarded as confidential, and not to be made public.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE thought the result of the honorable gentleman's motion would be to prove that all the requirements of the law had been complied with in this case. He desired to say that he regretted the clause having been included in the Act; but the honorable gentleman himself, the Hon. the Speaker, and those better informed on constitutional law than he (Colonel Whitmore) professed to be, held that no change could be made in it by message from the Governor, and that no clause could be eliminated after the Bill had passed another place. The clause having been included in the Bill, and having become law, there was no alternative but to comply with its provisions. There was no discretion left to the Government. He thought it would be found the law had been carried out; although, of course, there were Law Officers and Law Officers. Legal opinions might differ; but, if the Government acted upon the opinion of their Attorney-General, that was sufficient to justify any action they might take. He was not prepared to say that there had been any written legal opinion, and he certainly had guarded himself from intimating that there was such an opinion on record which could be produced. The honorable gentleman assured them that there was no political significance in the motion, although there were persons who would say that it looked very much as if there was. However, he would recognize it as a non-political motion, and presume that the desire of the honorable member was simply to see that the law was adhered to. He hoped the result would be that, if the report of the Committee showed that the requirements of the law had not been attended to, the occurrence would act as a caution to future Governments; but he thought it would be shown that the Government had done all that the law required them to do. Honorable gentlemen would bear him out when he said that in 1878 he did not pledge the Government that they would not act under the clause; and he said this because on former occasions the honorable gentleman had rather led him to believe that he (the Hon. Colonel Whitmore) was accused of a personal breach of faith. He had referred to Hansard, and he could not find that he had given such a pledge; but, if he had, he had acted wrongly, because he could not have so pledged the Government to neglect the law. He was quite ready to agree to the motion before the Council, and acknowledged the honorable gentleman's courtesy in asking him to appoint one or two members of the Committee.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE said it was his intention to support the motion of the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell. At the same time he must express his regret that the motion was so limited in its character. He thought great advantage would be gained were the inquiry to be made more general in its nature. Therefore it was his intention to move the addition of a few words to give effect to that idea. With reference to the subject of audit, it was a matter of which honorable members generally appeared to have a very faint idea. To him it seemed that the audit was a costly and cumbrous machinery to render more difficult the straining at gnats and more easy the swallowing of camels. A few years ago the Audit Act required that the Auditors should report direct to Parliament upon matters coming within their department: indeed, it was expressly provided that, within thirty days of Parliament assembling, the Auditors should make their report; and, as the Controllers of Audit were officers of Parliament, it appeared to him that such a proceeding was right and proper. But for some years past—for what reason he knew not, nor did he know the Government under whom the change was made, nor the circumstances attending the change—this provision had been set aside, and the reports had not been made. He could not but think it would be well to revert to the practice which formerly obtained, of the Controllers of Audit reporting directly to Parliament, which stood towards them in the position of masters. The words that he proposed to insert in the motion were as follow, to come in after the word "charged:" "and also generally to examine into and report upon the efficiency of the existing mode of audit." If this amendment were adopted, it would be the duty of the Committee, to report, first of all, upon the special circumstances referred to it, and, secondly, upon the general subject of the existing audit. He thought there would be great advantage from this inquiry. It would not be one of a political character, but would simply be such an inquiry into the audit as would satisfy honorable gentlemen generally both of its character and of its efficiency. But, apart from that, such an inquiry was desirable after a system had been in operation for some years. By that time the officers themselves should be aware of its weak points, and be able not only to point them out, but to indicate the steps which should be taken to improve the system in the future.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE hoped this would be put in a separate motion, because there was no necessary connection between the two subjects. It would be very much better if the honorable gentleman would bring forward a distinct resolution recommending an inquiry into the mode of audit. That would have his support, but, as it was, the amendment mixed up two distinct matters.

Amendment agreed to, and motion, as amended, agreed to.

AUDIT OF PUBLIC COMPANIES' ACCOUNTS.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES, before proceeding to move the motion standing in his name, wished to congratulate the Attorney-General upon his return to the Legislative Council, and also the Council upon the addition to its members of a gentleman so able, and possessing so much the confidence of all the members of the Council. The motion he was about to move had been suggested to him by reading from time to time in the public papers of the defalcations of managers, clerks, and treasurers of companies and associations of different kinds. He attributed these defalcations primarily to inefficient audit. The manner in which the auditors were appointed was the worst evil in the whole system. The plan usually adopted was for the shareholders to appoint auditors; but, generally speaking, the names were submitted by the managers or directors of the company, and the auditors were elected as a matter of course. Another drawback was, that in many cases the remuneration was not sufficient to cover the expenses of an efficient audit, and the duties which the auditors performed were of a perfunctory character, and did not go into the essence of audit at all, the auditors merely taking for granted the statements placed before them. To this he attributed the failure of a great many companies—to the shareholders not having a thorough knowledge of what was going on from time to time, and to speculations. Were a more efficient audit established, it would be impossible to carry on a system of speculation. In a very short time it would be found that these acts were being perpetrated, and the evil, instead of occasioning a complete collapse, as was the case from time to time with banks and companies of various kinds, would be stopped before it reached a climax, and there would be an avoidance of that loss and misery which so frequently followed the acts of unfaithful directors and others in charge of these companies. Many instances had occurred within the last year—notably those of the City of Glasgow Bank and the Provincial and Suburban Bank of Melbourne—in which huge losses had been sustained by shareholders. Now, he asked, would this system of fraud have been continued had a proper system of audit been established from the commencement? He took it that, instead of the auditors in these cases performing their duties efficiently, they had taken for granted the statements placed before them, and, without counting the coin in the bank, without looking at the securities held by the bank, or in any other way making themselves acquainted with the internal management of the institution, had certified to the correctness of the accounts; and the evil went on from year to year until a collapse brought to light the utter failure of the audit. He would not have put this motion on the Paper had his honorable friend the Attorney-General occupied the bench on which he now sat, because that honorable gentleman must be aware, from his long connection with public business in the colony, that there was no subject of this character which was of greater importance than that of having a proper system of audit of the accounts of public companies. What he wished to see was this: that the Government should pass a Bill making it imperative that every auditor should be licensed by the Crown, and should pay a small fee for his license, and give ample security for the due performance of his duties. Although this was apparently a small matter, yet it was really one of large importance, touching as it did nearly all the public companies in the colony. They heard from the mother-country, where there were large benefit societies and trades unions, that, through mismanagement, or the absconding of the principal manager, most, or the whole, of the funds of some of those societies had been lost, and persons of economical and provident habits, who had been imagining that they had saved a maintenance for the future, had suddenly found themselves left penniless. He therefore thought that this was a subject which a Committee should take in hand, and with regard to which some measure should be passed making it compulsory on all auditors to have a license from the Government, and to give ample security for the due performance of their functions.

Motion made, and question put, "That, in the opinion of this Council, it is desirable that the question of the auditing of the accounts of public companies or associations in the colony should be referred to a Select Committee. Such Committee to consist of the Hon. Mr. G. Buckley, the Hon. Mr. J. Johnston, the Hon. Mr. Menzies, the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn, the Hon. Dr. Pollen, the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse, and the mover."—(Hon. Mr. Holmes.)

Motion agreed to.

TIMBER IMPORTS.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. G. R. JOHNSON, it was ordered, That the return, showing the quantity and value of the timber of all descriptions imported into the colony during the years ended 30th June, 1878, and 30th June, 1879, respectively, which was laid upon the table of this Council on the 25th September last, be printed.

The Council adjourned at a quarter-past four o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, 14th October, 1879.

First Readings—Second Reading—Third Reading—Waikari Telegraph Station—Nelson Waste Lands Board—Drainage Bill—Ministerial Statement—Public Revenues Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Primitive Methodists' Temporal Affairs Regulation Bill, Napier Swamp Nuisance Bill.

SECOND READING.

Church Property Trust (Canterbury) Bill.

THIRD READING.

New Plymouth Company's Gas Bill.

WAIKARI TELEGRAPH STATION.

Mr. SAUNDERS asked the Government, If they will erect and open a telegraph station at Waikari during the present year? He might say that Waikari was an important town immediately north of the Weka Pass. It was the natural centre of a large agricultural district, and would soon be the terminus, for a time, of the Great Northern Railway. Although the wire passed through the town, they had not yet a telegraph station. This state of things had only existed so long in consequence of the town having been forgotten altogether by the late Government. He trusted to hear that the Government would be prepared to take some action to have a telegraph station erected.

Mr. HALL replied that the Government would, during the present financial year, take steps to establish a telegraph station at Waikari.

NELSON WASTE LANDS BOARD.

Mr. PITT asked the Minister of Lands, Upon whose recommendation Messrs. Joshua Bird and John Kerr were lately appointed members of the Nelson Waste Lands Board; and if he will lay before this House any papers connected with such appointments? He would simply say that these appointments had occasioned considerable surprise in the district in which they had been made. The particular qualifications which these gentlemen might possess had not hitherto been generally known. The appointment of one of these gentlemen had caused considerable astonishment, inasmuch as he belonged to a class which had not generally found favour with the late Government. He was a runholder; and also resided fifty-two miles from the City of Nelson, the place where the Land Board met.

Mr. ROLLESTON said the papers relating to these appointments did not show that they were made upon the recommendation of any one. They simply showed that instructions had been given to the department. If the honorable member would call at the Government offices he would see the papers, and if there were any which he wished to be laid on the table the Government would furnish them to the House.

DRAINAGE BILL.

Mr. SEYMOUR asked the Minister of Lands, If he will introduce a Drainage Bill this session? It would be in the recollection of some honorable members, at any rate, that when Mr. Donald Reid occupied the position of Minister of Lands he introduced a Drainage Bill. The late Government, when they took possession of the Treasury benches, declined to go on with that Bill amongst other things. It was a subject of very considerable interest to a great many persons in the colony, and that was the reason he put this question on the Paper. He trusted the present Minister of Lands would be able to give a favourable answer to it.

Mr. ROLLESTON replied that the Government would bring in a Bill upon the subject this session.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

Mr. HALL.—Sir, before the business on the Order Paper is proceeded with, I desire, with the leave of the House, to make the Ministerial Statement which I promised on Friday last. But perhaps the House will first bear with me for a few minutes while I make a personal explanation which I promised to the House, on the occasion of the debate upon the motion of want of confidence in the late Government, I would make to it. Upon that occasion it was stated that I had sought out certain Maori members of this House and had made certain proposals to them. It was stated that I had offered one of those honorable gentlemen the position of Native Minister, with all the powers of a European Minister, and that I had promised to give him control over all Maori lands not Crown-granted.

It was, in addition, said by the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) that that Maori member had stated that I had promised to stop all sales and leases of land. I do not imagine that the honorable gentleman persists in the statement, because it is too evident an error for him to follow it up.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—The honorable gentleman is in error. I did not say that he promised to make the Maori member a Native Minister and give him control of all Maori matters.

Mr. HALL.—The honorable gentleman stated that Tomoana had said that I promised to stop all sales and leases of lands. He is in error in supposing that the honorable gentleman said that.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I myself heard the statement made in Maori, and afterwards repeated by the interpreter.

Mr. HALL.—I was astounded at this statement. An honorable gentleman who sat near me at once said, before I spoke, that the honorable member was entirely in error.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I spoke from my personal hearing. The statement was made in the House.

Mr. HALL.—It is a matter of memory. It really makes no difference to me, however, because I can prove that the statement is not correct. The Maori members were not sought for by me. A meeting had been arranged at their request, but it was adjourned because we could not get a satisfactory interpreter. I then had a meeting with the Native members in Mr. Locke's house, he being ill in bed. There were also present my honorable friend Mr. Rolleston, the honorable member for Wairarapa (Mr. Beetham), and Mr. Ormond. Every word that passed was heard by those honorable gentlemen. I have asked them to be good enough to put down in writing what took place, and they have done so. I did the same. I have compared the two accounts, and there is a substantial agreement between them. I do not know whether the House wishes me to read the document; I am entirely in the hands of the House as to that; but it completely exonerates me from the imputation that I had held out any unreasonable hopes whatever, or said a single word which I should be ashamed to see published in every newspaper in the colony. The following is the statement:—

"The following is my recollection of what passed between Mr. Hall, Te Wheoro, and Henare Tomoana:—

"Henare Tomoana told me he and Wheoro wished to meet Mr. Hall at Mr. Locke's lodgings: the object being to get a reliable means of communication between the parties.

"A meeting was arranged accordingly; Mr. Hall, Mr. Rolleston, Mr. Beetham, Mr. Te Wheoro, Mr. Henare Tomoana, and myself being present. Mr. Locke interpreted.

"Henare Tomoana said one of their wishes was to have the dealing with the land handed over to the Maori Ministers.

"Mr. Hall replied that could not be done; and asked if he meant right of interference with the Land Court, &c.

"Henare explained he meant land that had not been through the Court; and Mr. Hall declined to make any definite reply, saying he would consider the question, and reply at some future meeting.

"Henare Tomoana and Te Wheoro inquired what the position of Maori Ministers would be under Mr. Hall's Government, if he took office, particularly what name they would be known by. Both chiefs complained that, in the past, the so-called Maori Ministers had had no power or recognized duties. They instanced Hoani Nahe.

"Mr. Hall replied that any Native acting as Maori Minister with him would be expected to work, and would have a recognized position; that he would consider about the name, and communicate again. On Native matters they would, in conjunction with the European Minister having charge of Native affairs, make recommendations to Cabinet, and take part in their discussion and consideration. They would be expected to take an active part in seeing the decisions of the Government on Native matters given effect to among their countrymen.

"Henare Tomoana expressed an opinion there should be Native committees in each principal district, working under the European and Native Ministers. But Mr. Hall made no reply to that proposal.

"The interview then terminated, the Natives undertaking to put their views in writing, for Mr. Hall's consideration.

"I omitted to say that, at the beginning of the interview, Mr. Hall stated his main object was to get rid of personal government in Native affairs, and to so work as to bring the Natives and Europeans equally under the laws of the country; that that would be his great object, and so get rid of the attempt at personal government as practised by the present Native Minister.

"October 6, 1879."

"J. D. ORMOND.

"We thoroughly concur in Mr. Ormond's report of the conversation between the Natives and Mr. Hall.

"W. ROLLESTON."

"On Friday evening Henare Tomoana handed me a paper in Maori, which he said contained the views of Te Wheoro and himself. He asked me to get Mr. Hall to sign it. I told him Mr. Hall was too busy to look at the paper then; that it must be translated and considered; and that I would get Mr. Hall to fix some time to meet him and Te Wheoro about it. I did not myself look at the paper until the next day. When I met Henare I told him it contained reference to subjects that had never been named at our interviews, and which would never be agreed to by any Government or party. This he allowed, and said the subjects I referred to had been inserted by himself and Te Wheoro, without any previous communication with us.

That gives a plain and straightforward account of what took place between myself and the honorable Maori members. I should not have thought it necessary to make this explanation, if the statements made on the evening in question had not gone beyond the four walls of this House; because I think the intention of those statements and their general character were sufficiently obvious to those who heard them. Nor should I have thought it necessary to make the explanation to any gentlemen who have known me for any length of time. But, Sir, those statements are on record, and they will go to parts of New Zealand where I am not personally known; the character of its public men is the property of the colony, and a cloud should not rest upon their character when that cloud can be dispelled. I will only say, with reference to the statement of Mr. Tomoana, that an honorable gentleman who sat near me at the time said at once that the interpretation was not correct.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Name.

Mr. HALL.—Mr. Ormond.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—He does not speak Maori.

Mr. HALL.—He may not be so well acquainted with the Native language and manners and customs as the honorable gentleman; but still he possesses a certain knowledge of the Maori language; and his assertion was confirmed, before I had been ten minutes out of the House, by others who are undoubtedly Maori scholars. I apologize for having taken up the time of the House. I promised to state to the House what the real facts of the case were. I have now done so. I can only add that, if I had held out the extravagant expectations that were mentioned, I should have been unworthy to fill the office I now hold. I thank the House very much for having listened to me.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—As a statement made by myself has been impugned by the honorable gentleman, I hope I may be allowed to say a very few words. First of all, I will say at once that I accept, as I am bound to accept, the honorable gentleman's own denial that he made these promises. But I will point out to him this: that, in the very paper he has now read, the Maori member admits that he said these things in the House, but that he was not authorized to say so—it was his own thought.

Mr. HALL.—No; he does not say he stated them in the House. He said he put them in a letter which he handed to Mr. Ormond, and which I have never yet seen.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I say this much in the presence of the House, in the presence of the Maori members, and in the presence of several gentlemen who speak Maori: that what the honorable gentleman did say was this—in substance: "Mr. Hall is a new man to me. I have seen him. I did not go to him; he came to me. I asked him so-and-so, and he said Yes; I asked him so-and-so, and he said Yes; I asked him so-and-so, and he said Yes"—three distinct statements one after the other. Now, the honorable gentleman listened to these things being put into English by the interpreter: why not challenge them then? I hold in my hand a copy of Hansard, which I undertake to say has been distinctly altered and garbled, but which yet contains one most important statement. It is this:—

"I said to Mr. Hall, 'If your side gets into power, will you have a Native Minister?' He said, 'Yes.' 'Will you give to the Native Minister—to the Maori Minister—the sole power of managing Native affairs?' He said, 'Yes.'"

Mr. HALL.—I would venture to suggest that the only point as to which I impugned the honorable gentleman's statement was his assertion that Mr. Tomoana had said that I promised to stop the sales and leases of land. There, I say, the honorable gentleman is incorrect; and that is the only point at issue between us. The rest is not a matter between myself and the honorable gentleman, but between myself and my honorable colleague. Therefore I do not think any statement the honorable gentleman may make beyond that point is a personal explanation. He is initiating a discussion in which I ought to be allowed to take part.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I am simply quoting from Hansard, which, to my mind, even now, in its present state, altered as it has been very materially, confirms what I said at the time. The honorable member continued,—

"I explained to him that I was not speaking about those lands which have been operated on by the law—Crown-granted lands—but purely Native lands."

Well, if he is to have the whole control of Maori affairs, he must necessarily have the management of these lands. I say I accept the honorable gentleman's denial at once, as I am bound to do in honor, and which I would do irrespective of the obligation imposed by the rules of the House. But, as a matter of fact, the Native member did say these things in the House. They were heard by myself and four or five other members who speak Maori. They were interpreted into English; the honorable gentleman did not get up and deny them; and I think I was fairly warranted in concluding that there was some truth in them. I beg to draw your attention, Sir, to the fact that the report of the speech of the Native member as printed is utterly incorrect, entirely apart from the question between the honorable gentleman and myself.

Mr. SEDDON.—In reference to this matter, Sir, I wish to say that a gentleman has been accused of misinterpreting what has been said by a Maori member, and, as that gentleman's mouth is closed, he being an interpreter in the House, I think it is only fair that the matter should be thoroughly gone into; and, for that reason, I call your attention to the statement made by the Premier. I think it is only right to young members like myself and others that, where an aspersion of this character has been cast upon the interpreter, it should be probed to the bottom.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I wish to notify to the House that I have appointed Mr. Henry Hadfield as an extra Maori interpreter, and that he sits on the Government bench next to Mr. Tomoana.

Mr. HALL.—I now ask the House to bear with me for a few moments while I complete the statement which I commenced on Friday last. I then stated the intention of the Government with regard to the subject of electoral reform. The Bills which embody the views of the Government have, thanks to the great exertions of the Attorney-General, been prepared. Some of them have been already circulated, and the rest, I hope, will be in the hands of members shortly. They will be seen to differ considerably from the proposals of the late Government, their machinery being more in conformity with that which was proposed by the present Attorney-General in 1878. I propose to ask the House to give me leave to introduce three Bills to-day, and I shall give notice to ask for leave to introduce the remainder to-morrow, so that they may be at once before the country. I think the House will admit that we have lost no time whatever in bringing down our measures. We are ready to put them before the country at the earliest possible moment. With regard to the land legislation, we propose to go on with the Bill introduced by the late Government, introducing into it sundry alterations which appear to us desirable for the promotion of settlement. Those alterations are not ready, but they will be, I hope, by to-morrow or Thursday. With regard to finance I will not trouble the House at any length now, because it is the intention of my honorable colleague the Colonial Treasurer, upon asking for leave to introduce a Bill to amend "The Public Revenues Act, 1878," to make a statement of the financial position of the colony. It will perhaps be convenient to honorable members generally, and it will be an act of consideration towards myself, if he is allowed to make his statement at half-past seven o'clock this evening. I think the House will agree to that. With regard to Native affairs, my honorable friend the Native Minister hopes to make a full statement upon that subject on Thursday next, or, at the latest, on Friday. He has exerted himself to the utmost to be ready with that statement at as early a date as possible, but it is not possible for him to make it before Thursday or Friday. I will state, briefly and generally, what our views are on some of the principal features of this question. As was stated at the interview to which I have just referred, we believe, with regard to the Maori members of the Executive Council, that they have not yet been made as useful to the country as they might be. They have not had given to them such a defined position as it is desirable they should have. They have been—not to use too strong a term—mere nonentities, or, at any rate, comparative nonentities. We propose to introduce a Bill giving them a definite title, and, if not defining, at any rate indicating, the duties which they shall be called upon to perform. We believe this will be acceptable to themselves, and will very much assist the European Native Minister in the administration of affairs. With regard to the west coast of this Island, we regret to find that—as no doubt the House is well aware—a very large expenditure is going on, consequent on preparations for defence, which are no doubt necessary. We do not deny the necessity of them—that they are necessary for the safety of a considerable part of that district. We are suffering not only from that expense, but more largely still from the loss inflicted upon the settlers by the comparative suspension of their industrial occupations—the operations of the settlers of a large portion of the colony having become almost paralyzed. We feel bound to exert ourselves to put an end to this state of things, both by our duty to the colony and by the admiration which we feel, not only for the public spirit which has been evinced by the settlers throughout this trying crisis, but also because of the remarkable forbearance which they have shown under circumstances of considerable provocation. The Government is aware that allegations have been made to the effect that these difficulties arise to a very considerable extent from unfulfilled promises made for some time past by Government agents, and that the Natives themselves have just cause for complaint under that head. The Government are of opinion that it is desirable that this subject should be inquired into by a Royal Commission composed not of subordinate officers of the Government, but of gentlemen whose character and reputation will give weight to their decisions and opinions with the people of both races. So far as we have been able to ascertain, these complaints as to unfulfilled promises do not extend to that part of the district which is called the Waitemate Plains—they really refer to other parts of the district; but the whole subject will be fully inquired into. The Government have a confident hope, based upon the best information, that they will be able, at an early date, to put an end to this serious state of things, without running any risk of actual disturbance. The Native Minister, as I have already said, will make a full statement upon this and other subjects at an early date. The Native land question is divided into two branches—the question of the Native Land Court, for ascertaining the title, and the question of the terms upon which Native lands shall be allowed to be alienated. With regard to the Court, we believe that its machinery is cumbersome and complicated: the law is spread over a great many Acts, and is generally in an unsatisfactory state. Even if we cannot deal with the second branch of the question during the present session, we propose to put the ascertainment of title to Native lands upon a better footing. With regard to the alienation of Native land, that question is in a very unsatisfactory condition. Honorable members who have taken part in the public affairs of this colony will remember that three or four years ago the result of the operations of the Government, purchasing Native land, had proved so unsatisfactory, that it was almost unanimously determined to put an end to the system. The honorable member for the Thames made that announcement in his first Statement as Native Minister. That resolution seems practically to have been revoked, and, instead of the Government retiring from the purchase of Native land, their preemptive right has been practically resumed. It is not formally resumed, it is true, but it has been resumed in a way which enables the Government to take the land in some cases and to waive the right to purchase in others. When we are placed in possession of full information as to the result of the Government land-purchase operations, and time has been given to let it become thoroughly known outside, the public will be very much dissatisfied with the result —as dissatisfied as they have been on former occasions — and the Government will be requested to retire as speedily as possible from the position it has lately taken up. A proposal was mentioned, in the Speech of His Excellency the Governor, to create a provision by which the Government should sell the land on behalf of the Maoris. That proposal originated with Sir William Martin, and was adopted by Sir Julius Vogel. It is by no means the first time it has been heard of. The Government look very favourably indeed upon that proposal, believing that it may be productive of much good, if carefully carried out, not only to the Maori, but to the European settler: I cannot say at the present moment whether we shall be able, during the present session, to complete a scheme to give effect to the suggestion. There are only two other points upon which I wish to trouble the House. We propose at once to give instructions by which what we believe to be a great mistake, to say the least of it, will be put an end to. Without incurring any additional expense, we propose that the Government advertisements shall be given to the newspapers in such a manner as to insure fair and ample publicity, and shall be distributed without any reference to the political opinions of those papers. I have reason to believe that, whatever Government is in office, that must be done. The only other point to which I wish to refer is as to the “Hinemoa,” and the large expense which has been incurred of late in keeping up that vessel. While the present state of affairs on the West Coast continues, we do not propose to take any decided measures in the matter; but, as soon as the time arrives when there will be no reasonable probability that the steamer will be required for the conveyance of troops, we shall lay up one of the two steamers. We reserve for consideration whether it is advisable to dispose of one of them; but, in the meantime, one will be kept for all the purposes for which a Government steamer should properly be employed; and for other duties, should it be necessary, we can provide at a much less expense than the “Hinemoa” has cost of late. I will only add that we are anxious to go on with the business with the least possible delay, and to put our views fairly before the country.

QUALIFICATION OF ELECTORS BILL.

Mr. HALL.—I now ask leave to introduce a Bill to amend the law relating to electors qualified to vote at elections of members of the House of Representatives. The manner in which the Government propose to deal with this question is to divide the subject into five or six parts, as was done in 1868—not to put into one Bill the whole question of the qualification and registration of electors, the conduct of elections, and so on; but to deal with the franchise in one Bill, which will be comparatively short, to put into a second the provision to be made for the Maori representation, and into a third the provision to be made for the registration of electors. The subject of the regulation of elections will be put into a fourth Bill, the prevention of corrupt practices at elections into a fifth, and the manner of dealing with election petitions into a sixth. We believe that that will be a more convenient method of dealing with the whole question, and it will be safer: because, when the whole subject is included in one large Bill, one honorable member objects to one part of the Bill, another to another, and in the aggregation of these objections the Bill itself runs increased risk; whereas, if it is divided into parts, there is a fairer chance of each Bill becoming law. The measures we propose to introduce are those introduced last session by the present Attorney-General. With regard to the franchise, as mentioned by the honorable member for Christchurch City in moving the Address in Reply, it cannot fairly be stated that the present franchise is not a liberal one. Under the Constitution Act a vote is given to every person possessed of freehold property of the value of £50. Every leaseholder and every householder has the right to vote, and to that has been added a lodgers' franchise, a miners' franchise, and a measure which gives a vote to every person who pays rates, however small. Practically at the present time we have not an illiberal franchise. I do not think that can fairly be denied; and the proof of it is this: that a larger proportion of the male population of this colony is on the electoral roll than is the case in any of the Australian Colonies, where the franchise is said to be more liberal. We believe, however, that it is desirable to make an alteration. One of the main reasons for dissatisfaction with the present system has arisen not from the franchise itself, but from the difficulty in the way of exercising it, and the difficulty of registration. I am bound to say that I do not think the people themselves have taken as much trouble in the matter as it was desirable they should have done; and I also think the Government might, from time to time, have provided greater facilities for registration. Before I go further, perhaps the House will allow me to allude to statements that have been made as to my opinions on this question. Scraps have been quoted from my speeches in this regard, which were very imperfect and very unfair. The view I have always taken of the matter is this: How can we get the best government? Whatever system tends to that end, it is our duty to adopt it. I arrive at exactly the same result as honorable members who like, perhaps, a more popular view of this question; but I have never been willing to pretend that my reasons are what they are not. I have never shrunk from expressing my opinions because I was at all afraid that it would make me unpopular, and I have no reason whatever to regret the result. I thank the House for allowing me to make these few remarks, because I scarcely think justice was done me when the extracts were read on a recent occasion. Sir, we propose to extend the franchise, and to give increased facilities for registration. We propose that every man shall have the right to vote who has lived one year in the colony and six months in the electoral district for which he wishes to register. We propose that there shall thus be a recognition of the principle of manhood suffrage; and, in order that there may be a reasonable recognition of the claims of property, we propose that every man who owns a freehold of the value of £25 shall have the right to vote. That, we believe, is not only a reasonable recognition of property, but a concession to a class of small freeholders who, in any country, are a valuable part of the population. We propose that this shall be confined to the European population. The manner in which we intend to provide for the Maori population will be stated hereafter. We also propose that the task of registering shall not be thrown on the electors themselves, but that Government officers shall be appointed in each electoral district whose duty it shall be to see that every man who has a right to vote shall have his name placed on the roll. I shall refer to the question more at length when I come to deal with the Registration of Electors Bill. My statement to-day must be of a more general character. We propose, as I say, that there shall be a Government officer in each electoral district, whose duty it shall be to see that every man who has a right to be on the electoral roll shall have his name placed there; who shall also see that the rolls are corrected from time to time; that every opportunity shall be given to the public to examine the rolls; and, if there is any objection to names on the roll, or any improper insertion of names, the case may be tried at once in the Resident Magistrate's Court. We think that this provision will meet the case of miners, most of whom will be residents in districts, and therefore on the roll. It will also get out of the difficulty with regard to ratepayers. Although that is theoretically a very good means of getting names placed on the electoral roll, still, when put into practice, there are considerable difficulties in the way. For instance, the boundaries of road districts for which the ratepayers' roll is made up are in very many cases not coterminous with the electoral district, and there are other difficulties, so that practically it is exceedingly difficult to use the ratepayers' rolls for putting names on the electoral rolls for this House. Under the system we propose, which is very simple, all that difficulty will be avoided. We do not think it will lead the country into any further expense than attends the present system, because it will relieve us from the large cost of advertising, which is very heavy. We believe that the amount saved in this respect will very nearly cover the cost of a much more perfect system. That is the substance of the Bill which I now ask leave to introduce—the Qualification of Electors Bill.

Mr. MACANDREW.—Sir, before you put that question, I desire to ask your ruling as to whether I shall be in order in moving an amendment. Perhaps I had better read that amendment. It is as follows: "That this House, while determined to pass, during the present session, a measure to amend the electoral laws of the colony, declines to allow leave to introduce this Bill until it has been shown that the present Ministry possesses the confidence of the House."

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think that amendment would be in order. It is stated in May, "Amendments have occasionally been made to a question for leave to bring in a Bill, by which its proposed title has been altered." An amendment cannot go beyond that, at the present stage of the proceedings.

Mr. MACANDREW.—If it is not competent for me to move that amendment, I can see nothing else for it but to negative every Government motion. Not that we object to the measures themselves on their merits, but we think they should be negated until such time as it is determined whether the Government possess the confidence of the House or not. It will be recollected that on Friday last this House by a majority decided not to proceed with the second reading of the Triennial Parliaments Bill, with a view of enabling the position of the Government to be determined before any important business was proceeded with. I had hoped the Government would have seen their way to give an opportunity to-day for bringing forward the motion of which I gave notice, so as to bring the question to an issue at once. I may say that this side of the House is exceedingly anxious to proceed with the business of the country at once, and the best evidence of the determination of this side that talk shall give place to work is the selection of myself—one of the non-talkers—to move the motion of no-confidence. I may say, however, that there is one measure of the Government which I am prepared to accept—the Public Revenues Bill. I should not be prepared, nor would other honorable members on this side of the House be prepared, to negative that Bill, because I understand it is a matter of urgency, and possibly the public credit may be affected by it. We are, therefore, prepared at once to go into that question, if necessary; but, with regard to all the others, I see nothing for it but to negative every one, until such time as the House has determined whether the Government possess its confidence or not.

Mr. PITT.—I should like to ask whether, if the measure now proposed to be introduced by the Government is negated by the Opposition, a motion for the introduction of a similar Bill can be brought forward this session.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the House refuse leave to introduce this Bill now, it cannot be introduced again this session.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I find in the latest edition of May,—

"It is to be observed that, when the question for the first reading of a Bill is negated, the House merely determines that the Bill shall not now be read; and the question may therefore be repeated on a future day, as in the case of the County Elections Bill, 1852, where it was twice negated. After the first vote of the House, the Bill was no longer among the Orders of the day; but notice was given, and a motion made, to read the Bill a first time."

I apprehend the same rule will apply to the introduction of a Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am quite aware of the rule with regard to the first, second, or third reading of a Bill; but that is not the question at present before the House. In the case of the first, second, or third reading of a Bill the question put is, That the Bill be now read a first, second, or third time; and the House will, if it thinks fit, decide that it shall not be now read a first, second, or third time, which does not prevent the question being put again at some future time. In the present case the Premier has asked leave to introduce a Bill, and the word now does not come into the question, so that, if leave be refused, the motion cannot be again brought forward this session.

Mr. GISBORNE.—Might I call your attention to this point, Sir: Leave is asked to introduce a Bill of which we have no copy. If we negative that motion, surely it does not prevent some Bill different from that now sought to be introduced being brought in afterwards. It does not prevent another Bill relating to the qualification of electors being introduced.

Mr. HALL.—Speaking to the point of order, Sir, my motion is for leave to introduce a Bill defining the qualifications of electors for members of the House of Representatives. That is a definite motion. There is no Bill before the House, and the question is whether, if the House now refuses leave to introduce such a Bill, that motion can be brought on again this session. On that point, I submit myself entirely to your ruling, Sir.

Mr. PYKE.—I should like to know whether, if the calamity should occur which is so much feared by the present leader of the Government, there is not already on the Order Paper a Bill relating to this subject with which the House can proceed.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is my duty not to allow a resolution to be introduced which is substantially the same as a resolution which has already been negatived during the same session. Therefore I do not think that another resolution substantially the same as that now before the House can be introduced this session, if the present one be negatived.

Sir G. GREY.—Upon the first point referred to you, Sir, I would submit that we are an independent Legislature, that we are acting under a Constitution not similar to the Constitution of Great Britain, and that we have a right to establish precedents for ourselves. We are quite capable of doing so; and I think we ought to bear in mind the great crisis in which the colony is at present, with a Government sitting on those benches in defiance of the wishes of Parliament—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I understand the honorable member to rise to a point of order. That being so, he cannot proceed to criticise the position of the Government. I would also point out to the honorable member that we have a Standing Order which says,—

“In all cases not hereinbefore provided for, Mr. Speaker shall decide, taking for his guide the rules, forms, and usages of the House of Commons, so far as the same can be applied to the proceedings of this House.”

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, that is the very point. I deny the application of that rule—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am bound to follow the usages of the House of Commons, in the absence of rules of this House on specific points.

Sir G. GREY.—In so far as applicable to the circumstances of this country. I say a question like the present has never arisen in the House of Commons or here, and I think I have a right to bring that point forward. We have never before had an Address sent to the Governor in which the House declared that it had no confidence in the Government as constituted—

Mr. SPEAKER.—That is not a point of order.

Sir G. GREY.—The real question before us is, that the liberties of the colony for all future time are to depend upon a technical point of order. I apprehend there must be some way in which I can raise the discussion. I am perfectly independent myself. I am in no way interested in the change of Government. I am to gain nothing by it myself: that is very well understood. But where I feel a wrong is being done to the whole community—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must say the honorable member is out of order in addressing these remarks to the House. There was only a point of order before me just now. Having decided that point of order, it would not be becoming in me to allow my ruling to be further questioned.

Sir G. GREY.—I will move the adjournment of the House, for the purpose of putting myself in order, and then I can speak to anything.

Mr. SPEAKER.—No. In moving the adjournment of the House, a member is not at liberty to speak on any subject set down for discussion on the Paper. There is that restriction on speaking to a motion for adjournment. The honorable gentleman is at liberty to move the adjournment of the House; but it will not be competent for him, under cover of the motion for adjournment, to discuss any Order of the day or notice of motion that stands upon the Order Paper, as the House has appointed another time for their consideration.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Would it be competent for me to move that leave be not now given to introduce the Bill?

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is competent to move an adjournment until this evening.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Quite so; but I move that leave be not now given, just as might be done in the case of refusing to now read the Bill a first time. We do not deny the naked proposition, but simply say, “Wait.”

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the proper course would be to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Then I move the adjournment of the debate until half-past seven o'clock, for the express purpose of giving the honorable gentleman an opportunity of making his Financial Statement. We want to have those figures before us, and, in fact, the country wants to have them. For my part, I will not take any action which will shut him out from that chance. I desire to move that this debate be adjourned until half-past seven o'clock; and I do so on the express condition that, after meeting at half-past seven, and giving the honorable gentleman an opportunity of making his Financial Statement, this debate shall be resumed.

Mr. HALL.—Will the honorable gentleman move that the debate be now adjourned, with the view of the Financial Statement of my honorable friend being taken at half-past seven o'clock?

Mr. SHEEHAN.—No. I move the adjournment of the debate until half-past seven, undertaking to move, then, a further adjournment until the Statement is given.

Mr. HALL.—On the understanding that the Statement is given at half-past seven o'clock?

Mr. SHEEHAN.—So long as we take this debate afterwards.

Mr. HALL.—I quite agree to that.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I understand, in that case, that we adjourn this debate until half-past seven.

Mr. HALL.—It is simply this: The honorable gentleman moves that this debate be now adjourned, and he will then move the adjournment until half-past seven, it being understood that at half-past seven we proceed to the twelfth notice of motion, in order to have the Financial Statement made.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—It being also understood that, after that is done, we can bring on this debate. That is quite sufficient for us.

Mr. HALL.—Leaving it to the House to decide it then.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I am quite prepared to move that the House adjourn until half-past seven. Of course I cannot make that addition to it; but, if honorable gentlemen on that side will not agree to accept these terms, I will alter the terms of my proposition, and compel them to accept it. I do not want to do that. I want to act fairly. If the other side will agree to accept the proposal to adjourn until half-past seven, on condition that we adjourn further until No. 12 comes up and the Financial Statement is made, then I will support that, and move it myself if necessary. If it is opposed by any member on our side, I will vote along with them, if they will agree to that, and allow No. 12 to come up, in order to have the Financial Statement, and then go back to this debate.

Major ATKINSON.—That is, the honorable gentleman proposes we should intercept this debate at half-past seven, with the view of taking the Financial Statement.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Yes; on condition that we go on with this debate afterwards.

Major ATKINSON.—We could not prevent it. The debate will be simply intercepted. The House might order me to make the Financial Statement at the present moment, and then the debate would be intercepted. I presume the debate would be immediately afterwards called on, being next on the Paper.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I understand the honorable gentleman wishes to adjourn the debate until half-past seven, and, when the time comes to resume the debate, then that he will move a further adjournment until No. 12 is disposed of.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—On that ground, I move the adjournment of the debate until half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. HALL.—If this debate is adjourned, the House will adjourn until half-past seven. I accept that.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—As it seems likely we are to adjourn until half-past seven o'clock, I wish to call attention to another matter, in order that Mr. Speaker may use his judgment whether or not it is worth consideration before the House meets again. I understand it is a well-established rule that, when business has been brought forward and put upon the Order Paper, the same business cannot be again put on the Order Paper until the original matter has been discharged therefrom. Now, leave has already been given to introduce a Bill to amend the qualification of electors in this colony. It is a Bill on the Paper making provision for the representation of the people in the General Assembly. That Bill embraces the whole purport and tenor of the Bill leave to introduce which is now asked for. That being so, I hold that the first Order asked for from the Ministerial benches, for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the law relating to electors, cannot be gone on with until the other one is called up for judgment, and is executed. The course for Ministers to take would have been to put up the late Government Bill on the Order Paper, dispose of, and ask the House to slaughter it. But, not having done so, they cannot bring in another Bill for the same object. I do not now ask you, Sir, to give your ruling, but wish to give you an opportunity of looking at the Bills, as I intend to call your attention to the same matter at half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. HALL.—The contention of the honorable member for Mount Ida amounts to this: that, when once a Bill on a particular subject has been introduced and put on the Order Paper, no other member can introduce a Bill on the same subject. That is opposed to all parliamentary practice. I have known cases where three or four Bills on the same subject have been before the House at the same time. Therefore, even if the Representation Bill were the Bill that the honorable gentleman supposes, which it is not, I contend that there is nothing to prevent every member of the House also introducing such a Bill on the same subject.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I will look into the matter, and give my opinion.

Mr. SEDDON.—Sir, I would like to understand distinctly your ruling on the point as regards the introduction of this Bill. Do I rightly understand your ruling to be that, if leave is refused to introduce this Bill, it cannot be again introduced this session?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Yes.

Mr. SEDDON.—But, on the other hand, that, if the first reading was asked for by the Government after it had been introduced, then it could be negatived by the House and reintroduced by the Government?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Yes.

Mr. PYKE.—Sir, I think honorable members should understand clearly—especially as there are so many new members—what the effect of that decision will be. Following up the remark of the honorable member for Hokitika (Mr. Seddon), I must also ask whether, if leave be not given to introduce the Bill of the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government, we cannot still proceed with the Bill already before the House, and set down for second reading.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I cannot give a decision on that point until I look at the other Bill.

Mr. SHEPHARD.—Even if leave to introduce a Bill were refused, could we not at a subsequent period of the session suspend the Standing Orders, so that leave might be given to introduce the same Bill?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Yes, I think so.

Debate adjourned.

The House adjourned until half-past seven o'clock p.m.

HOUSE RESUMED.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—It was on my motion that the debate on the first notice of motion was postponed this afternoon, to enable the Colonial Treasurer to make his Financial Statement to the House at half-past seven o'clock. I propose, with the approval of the House, that the debate stand adjourned until after Notice of Motion No. 12 has been dealt with, so as to enable the Statement of the Colonial Treasurer to be made. When that Statement is made I presume that the House will go back to the consideration of the first notice of motion.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC REVENUES BILL.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, the circumstances under which I am addressing you this evening are of so exceptional a character, and the demands of my honorable friends opposite so very imperious, that I have been obliged to disregard what I, for one, deem a very wise rule of this House—that the Financial Statement, or rather the statement of the finances of the year, should be submitted by the Government to this House in a carefully-prepared document. I do not at all believe in the plan of the Treasurer coming down and making what is called an ordinary speech on finance. To my mind, the plan that we have adopted—in common, I think, with the other Australian Colonies—of submitting to the House a Financial Statement in such a form that honorable gentlemen can readily understand our finances—is a far preferable mode of dealing with the question to speaking upon it as I am obliged under the present circumstances to speak to-night. Sir, our financial position has not been dealt with at all for some fifteen months. The colony is, I venture to say, in a state of complete darkness as to our real financial position. It is not my business upon the present occasion to ask why the colony is in this position; but I take it that what the House desires now is that I should give to it a broad outline of the finances, so that honorable gentlemen may be enabled easily to comprehend what are its main features, and so determine in their minds the mode in which they will deal with the difficulties I shall present to them. As, Sir, we have had no statement of the finances for some fifteen months, I must ask you to bear with me while I take you back to the beginning of the financial year 1878-79. The then Colonial Treasurer, Mr. Ballance, estimated that he would begin that year with a surplus of £120,468. I may say here that I shall quote round numbers

all through in my address to-night, in order that honorable members may catch them the more easily; and in the report of my speech I shall insert the correct figures. The honorable gentleman estimated the balance with which he would begin the year at £120,468. The assets realized were rather less than was anticipated, and the liabilities proved to be somewhat more. The actual amount realized was £116,844. The estimate was very accurate, the difference being a mere trifle in comparison with the large sums that we have to deal with. The expenditure proposed by the late Government for the year 1878-79 was £4,210,436. It will be in the recollection of honorable gentlemen who were in the last Parliament that a table was presented by the last Colonial Treasurer, Sir George Grey, at the end of the last session, indicating the savings which had been effected upon the votes. The total expenditure, as given in the table, was £3,652,048, showing an apparent saving of £558,387. But this table is entirely misleading without proper explanation, the truth being that there was no saving at all in the ordinary sense during the year. In the first place, we must take off from the apparent saving of £558,387 the outstanding liabilities, almost the whole of which have been since paid. Some of them are still outstanding; but, practically, all the outstanding liabilities have been paid. The first thing we must do is to take off the outstanding liabilities, amounting to £348,219. Having taken these off, honorable gentlemen will find that the balance of the savings is made up of such items as these—I will not enumerate them all: Of such items as £100,000 voted out of the surplus balance of the year before last in aid of the Public Works Fund. Honorable members will recollect that it was proposed to transfer a sum of £100,000 from the consolidated revenue to the Public Works Fund, and a great flourish was made of that proposal; but unfortunately it was never accomplished—the £100,000 was never paid over, and it appeared in that table as a saving. There is also another item of £74,031, which was put down as the amount required to pay the 20 per cent. of Land Fund, the Land Fund having fallen much short of the estimate. That sum of £74,031 was not required to be paid. Another item of £46,188 was an over-estimate of the interest required, and therefore was not used. I say that honorable members, upon reference to the table I shall place upon the table of this House, will see that nearly the whole of the supposed balance is made up of items similar to those which I have named. Now, the total payments within and on account of the year amount to £4,000,268. I will presently refer to one or two classes of expenditure to which I think the attention of the House should be especially called. I now come to the revenue for the year. Honorable gentlemen will recollect that it was estimated to amount to £4,045,537, and that it actually did realize £3,751,598. The decrease arose almost entirely from a decrease in the land revenue, amounting to the sum of £359,947. Receipts specially applicable also fell off by £30,430.

There was, however, a net increase in the ordinary revenue of £96,439, derived chiefly from Customs, stamps, and railway receipts. The total receipts of the year, instead of being £4,045,437, amounted only to £3,751,598, through, as I have just said, the great falling-off in the land revenue. Now, taking the revenue of the year, including the balance of £116,844 brought forward from the previous year, and subtracting it from the expenditure, honorable members will find that at the end of the year we had a deficit of £131,824; and this sum we shall have to provide for during this year. Looked at in another way, we began the year with £116,844 to our credit, and we ended it with £131,824 to our debit. So that, looking upon the year as something complete in itself, our receipts did not come up to our expenditure by £248,668. I hope honorable gentlemen will bear these facts in mind, because they will then be able better to understand the figures I am going to submit for this year. I should point out here that this deficit of £131,824 may be said to be fairly reducible by £50,000 of land-tax, which the late Colonial Treasurer estimated to obtain during the last year, but which was not collected; but, of course, if I were to take it off there, I should then not be able to count it as revenue for the present year, and, as it is revenue for the present year, I have treated it in that way. But I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact, because, when these estimates were made, it was calculated that this £50,000 from the land-tax would come in as revenue, and therefore would reduce the deficit. I should like now, Sir, to call the attention of the House to one or two questions of general expenditure, and my object in doing so is to show that we are not exercising any economy whatever in our public service. By that I mean that, although we have in this House made a great deal of talk about it—although Governments have been turned out because they were supposed to be extravagant, and others have come in pledging themselves to effect great reductions—the fact is, that we have not retrenched in any one respect that I can find out; and I am going to read these tables to the House, in order that honorable members may see that what I say is accurate. I do it because before I have sat down honorable members will see that we shall have to take some very vigorous steps in order to place our finance in that position which the finance of the colony ought to be in. Taking what I may call the nine large departments—omitting such departments as Education, Railways, and Surveys, which could not be very well taken in, for obvious reasons, but including all the other departments—Law and Justice, Postal, Telegraph, Customs, Marine, Native, Militia and Volunteers, Constabulary, and Public Domains and Buildings—taking these nine departments, I find that the amount voted by this House for those services for 1877-78 was £866,216. I find that the expenditure of that year was about £10,000 more on those departments than this House had voted: in other words, it was £876,397. The estimates for the same departments for 1878-79, as passed by this House, amounted to £903,857

—a gradual increase, honorable gentlemen will observe, notwithstanding all our professions of economy; and they will not be gratified when I further tell them that the actual expenditure on those departments, instead of being £903,857, was, as a matter of fact, £953,671 for the last year. So much, then, for economy in those branches of the service where, if it was to be effected at all, it ought to have been effected. In other words, the expenditure on these nine departments has risen from £866,216, in 1877-78, to £953,671 for the year which has just passed. And now, Sir, let us look at the Native Department. We shall find that this department in 1876-77 cost, including the Civil list, £34,124; in 1877-78 it cost £43,047; in 1878-79 it cost £58,336. So that all through the departments the increase has been—I can hardly say gradual, but, rather, very considerable. In the second year the increase in the Native Department was apparently almost entirely for Native schools; and that, so far, is satisfactory: no one will begrudge that expenditure supposing the schools have been conducted properly, as to which it is not now my business to inquire. But there is also this significant fact, with regard to the Native Department: that, whereas the salaries the year before last were £19,014, last year they were £15,321; while the contingencies had risen from £4,893, in 1876-77, to £16,741 last year; that is to say, the control is being gradually taken out of the hands of this House—the habit is growing up of expending all this money upon contingencies, instead of submitting each item to the vote of this House. This is a question which I hope the House will take into its serious consideration. I hope it will carefully examine into this matter, and see how far the expenditure can be properly checked. For myself, I have not the slightest doubt it can be largely reduced with great public advantage. I might here incidentally remark that such expenditure as took place at the Kopua meeting is not, in my opinion, advisable at all. That meeting, the House might like to know, cost the country some £4,500, and the Waitara meeting cost over £1,000. Such then, Sir, is the general result of the last year—an actual deficit to be provided for of £131,824; an actual deficit on the transactions of the year—if the year were taken by itself—of £248,668. There were issued during the year, and paid off at the end of the year, deficiency bills to the amount of £184,000. I merely mention this as a transaction which has occurred: it does not affect the balance one way or the other. I now come to the present year 1879-80. The estimated expenditure, as left by the late Government, deducting from it a sum of £140,000 for contingent advances, which it is proposed to place upon loan, amounts to £3,974,034. This is exclusive, also, of a sum of about £125,000, which the Government merely collects and pays over to local bodies. I have omitted that from both sides of the account, in order to obtain greater simplicity. In quoting the estimate of expenditure as left by the late Government, I do not in any way wish to commit them to that expenditure. I am merely stating what I found in the office. Nor do I wish to commit the present Government to it; because honorable members will quite understand that t is impossible that I could have satisfactorily examined it or gone through it, so as to be able to speak with sufficient certainty to be committed to it. But I have given it what attention I could, and I say at once that, as far as I can see, there is nothing unreasonable in it, and that, if we are to continue the present system, I do not think we shall be able to reduce it to any great extent. This expenditure includes £1,325,373 for sinking fund and interest, £279,257 payable as subsidies, and £63,540 being 20 per cent. on the Land Fund. I might perhaps be permitted to remark here, with regard to this amount payable for sinking fund and interest, that it is to me a matter of very great regret that the late Government did not see their way to bring into operation the Consolidated Stock Act. I believe that, had that Act been brought into force at the time when the Government of which I had the honor to be a member was turned out of office, we should already have been deriving very considerable advantages from it. But, unfortunately, the one man who had taken the deepest interest in it throughout was not appointed agent until lately, and then only in such a way that it was impossible for him to go heartily into the work, being not at all assured of his position in the matter, or of receiving any co-operation from the Government here. The estimate of revenue, as prepared by the late Government—and this was laid on the table of the House—amounts to £3,442,000. This is made up as follows, taking the classification adopted by the late Treasurer: From taxation, £1,580,000; services rendered, £1,362,000; Land Fund, £500,000. The estimated expenditure, exclusive of the £140,000 for contingent defence, which it is proposed to take out of loan, amounts to £3,974,034; and, if from this we deduct our estimated revenue, we arrive at a deficit for the year of £532,034. If to this we add the deficit with which we began the year, £131,824, we have a total deficit of £663,858 for the present year. I wish I could stop there; but I should not be doing my duty to the House if I were to say that I thought the estimates of revenue prepared by the late Government would be realized. Of course we have the advantage of three months' experience of the year, and are therefore better able to estimate what the revenue will be. I have gone as carefully as I could into the matter, considering the time at my disposal, and I fear the estimate I am about to submit will not be exceeded. We may hope it will be, but, as prudent men of business, I do not think it will be wise to calculate upon receiving more than the estimate I am about to give from our present sources of revenue. I estimate that from taxation we shall receive £1,512,300; for services rendered, £1,301,600; and for land, £380,000, instead of £500,000. I have estimated the Customs revenue at £1,200,000, and the other departments I have reduced a very small amount, leaving the railways as estimated by the department itself. Now, if we take this revenue from the proposed expenditure, and add to it the deficit of £131,824 with which we began the year, and which has to be provided for, we shall find that there is a total deficit on the year of £911,958, which must be provided for either by a reduction of expenditure, by increased taxation, or by any other mode which the House may decide upon. The amount is so large that I have no doubt it will take honorable members some time to realize what it means. It means that this House must immediately turn its attention to the finances of the country—it means that not a moment is to be lost in deciding how we are to face our present difficulty. It is not my business now to make any remarks upon the manner in which the deficiency has arisen, or how it should be met: that question will have to be considered when we have finished the unfortunate struggles in which we are now engaged. I conceived that it was my simple duty to submit these facts to the House. And this brings me to the reason for asking that I may be permitted to pass the Bill upon which I am now addressing the House through all stages at one sitting. I may tell the House that when I took possession of the Treasury I found the Public Account in this state: that the receipts for the quarter then just ended did not come up to the payments that had then been made by a sum of £330,000; that the late Government had issued £400,000 of deficiency bills, and had used the whole of the proceeds; that no provision had been made for paying the subsidies which are now due, or for meeting other payments which it is absolutely necessary to make. So soon as I found that this was the position of affairs, I at once, as I was in duty bound, came down to this House to tell it what further relief we wanted, and this Bill is the mode in which the Government think it best to deal with the question. We propose to take power to issue £200,000 deficiency bills temporarily,—for the Act is a temporary Act, as honorable gentlemen will see, if they read it. We propose to issue these bills in order to enable us to carry on the necessary payments during the months of October and November. That is all that amount is calculated to meet. By that time I hope the House will have determined how the deficiency is to be dealt with. It seemed to the Government that it would have been improper to do more in the present state of matters than to submit a temporary remedy, merely to provide the cash to go on with, until the House had determined how the matter should be finally disposed of. That was my reason for asking the House to pass this Bill. I find that during these two months the probable receipts will not equal the certain expenditure by the sum of £150,000 or £200,000. And now we come to the position of the Public Works Account. We had a short and, as I think the House considers, a satisfactory statement of the general position of this account from the Minister for Public Works last session; but I propose to mention the transactions of last year, in order that honorable members may get the matter thoroughly into their minds. Well, Sir, we began the year 1878-79 with a credit to the Public Works Account of £2,056,000. Some of us then hoped that that Fund was going to be augmented by some £700,000 which it was proposed to get from the Land Fund, and by £100,000 which it was proposed to take from the Consolidated Fund—from the surplus of the year before last. I need hardly tell the House that no relief was received from the Land Fund, and that the £100,000 was not paid over, so that we only have the £2,056,000 at the disposal of the Public Works Department. We began this year with a credit in the Public Works Fund of £506,205 nominally; but, of this, £298,543 was advances outstanding, which, as honorable gentlemen are aware, is really money paid away and not accounted for; so that we really only began with £207,662 to the good. We actually spent during the last year £1,601,207. Now, Sir, the expenditure for the last quarter—and I wish particularly to call the attention of honorable members to this point, because we are now spending the new five-million loan—the expenditure for the September quarter, including advances outstanding at that date, which is money spent, is £712,395; so that we had actually spent, by the 30th September, £504,733 of the five-million loan. I find, upon inquiry, that we have entered into engagements, from which there is no escape whatever, for which we must find £733,552 by the 31st of December next, and that there are further engagements upon which we shall have to pay £921,818 more by the 30th of next June. In other words, by the 30th of June, upon works and services to which we are already committed, and without including any new works or contracts, we shall have spent £2,160,103 of the new five-million loan.

Major ATKINSON.—Of course I speak subject to correction. The honorable gentleman says these figures are incorrect, but I can only go by the figures furnished to me from his own office by his Under Secretary and other officers; and I may add that these figures have been carefully gone through by myself and the Secretary to the Treasury. I myself asked the Under Secretary for Public Works whether these were all absolute engagements for contracts entered into, and was informed that such was the fact. That seemed to me sufficient authority for the statements I have made. I was, of course, very much startled when I found that the amount was so large, and I took a good deal of pains to see whether I could not fairly state it at a less amount; but I found, on questioning the officers in whose department the expenditure was to be made, that such an amount would be required if effect were given to present engagements. Included in this £2,160,103 is £200,000 for the purchase of Native lands. Of this we have already spent £36,561, and we are engaged to spend up to December next £84,500 more. That, the department assures me, is also necessary. And we have a further liability upon these lands—unless we are prepared to abandon them—and which we are apparently engaged to fulfil, amounting to £957,000, or, in round numbers, to nearly £1,000,000 more, to be provided for the purchase of Native lands. We have also, for contracts for public works now let, to provide after June next £128,815 more than I have stated. Of course it is not for me at the present time to say anything with regard to the policy of continuing to purchase these lands, or of completing the engagements already commenced. That will be for the House to discuss presently. It is only my duty now to lay before the House the facts which I have obtained from the department; and I have simply to say that nearly £1,000,000 more will be required after the end of next June to complete transactions now under negotiation. Our position then is this: we have actually spent up to the end of September half a million of the loan. We have engaged to spend by Christmas £700,000 more, and we have engaged to spend by June next £2,000,000 of that loan. And this, Sir, before we know whether it is possible to raise the loan—before we have the slightest news from Home as to whether it is likely we shall get the money. We have so conducted our finances that we have not considered it wrong or unadvisable to pledge the credit of the colony in this way without the slightest knowledge of whether we can meet our engagements. That, to my mind, is a most serious position for the colony to take up. It is beginning entirely at the wrong end. We are bound, if we are to maintain our credit, first of all to be sure that we have the money before we proceed to spend it. Of course it is not for me to say how far we may be successful in raising the whole loan. The credit of the colony, fortunately, has hitherto been very good; but I say nothing can justify us in spending money at this rate before we have got it. Such, then, Sir, is, shortly, the position of our finances at the present time. I will simply say, in conclusion, that I am very much obliged to the House for the patience with which it has heard me. I would the tale I have had to tell were of a more cheerful nature, and that I had been able, as it has been my lot before now to do, to speak of surpluses instead of deficits; but it is clearly my duty to trace in bold outline the present position of our finances, leaving to honorable gentlemen to fill in the picture with information which I shall place, in the shape of tables, in their hands in the course of a few days. The position is undoubtedly an exceedingly grave one. It will require, as I have already said, the serious and immediate attention of this House. If we are not to get into very great difficulties we shall have to give up many things now considered necessary, and turn our attention to providing a remedy for the state of things I have shown to exist. It seems to me that it is absolutely necessary we should, at the present time, have a Government not only capable, but sufficiently strong to govern in the interests of the colony, and not of a party. Whether we can hope by our present party conflicts, whichever way they may end, to get such a Government I leave to honorable gentlemen to decide; but I submit it is the business of all of us now to turn our immediate and serious attention to this great difficulty, and in some way devise some scheme which shall place our finances in a sounder and better position for the future. I beg to move that the Standing Orders be suspended, to enable me to pass the Public Revenues Act Amendment Bill through all its stages to-night.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, I trust the House will accede to the motion. It is a motion which must have proceeded from the late Government if we had been allowed to remain in office. In making these remarks I would wish further to make a few observations in reply to the statements of the honorable gentleman who has just sat down. Firstly, I would say that a statement has been made that for fifteen months the House has been left in total ignorance of the financial condition of the colony. Sir, that is an entire mistake. I would point this out: that during the last fifteen months quarterly accounts have been published in a much more simple form than they had ever previously been submitted to the public of New Zealand. At the close of every quarter these quarterly accounts have been published at an earlier period than ever before, and these quarterly accounts contained a complete financial exposition of the transactions of the colony, so that any single honorable gentleman who had chosen to sit down and add up the figures could have made precisely the Statement which the present Colonial Treasurer has made to the House this evening. Further than that, it is not our fault that a Financial Statement was not made to this House immediately the last Parliament met. Honorable gentlemen will recollect what took place on that occasion. Immediately the Governor's Speech had been made we were met by an amendment to the Address in Reply, and thus all possible opportunity of explanation was taken away from us. And then, when, on the representations of the Government of the day, a dissolution was allowed, this extraordinary and unconstitutional proceeding took place: The Governor of the colony, in granting a dissolution, made an arrangement that no contested motion whatever should be made in the House. The Crown in England has never made a stipulation of that kind. When such a stipulation has been made it has been made by the two parties in the House entering into a mutual agreement for that purpose. That stipulation having been entered into, it absolutely precluded us from making such a Financial Statement as is usually submitted to the House when a Government explain their policy. We could not have brought our policy forward under such circumstances. At that time—and subsequent additions were made to it—a full Financial Statement was prepared to be submitted to the House; but, again, honorable members are aware that, the moment we met this session, a precisely similar course was pursued, and it is not our fault that some week ago—I may say ten days ago—we did not lay a plain and full statement of the financial condition of the colony before the House. Certainly the blame for our not having done so rests with the honorable gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. They thought proper to pursue that course. I do not question their right—I do not even question the propriety of it—but I say no blame rests with us in that respect. Then, again, in support of the credit of the colony I would point to a very important fact. Undoubtedly a very large deficiency in the estimated revenue has taken place; but in what items of revenue did that deficiency occur? These extraordinary circumstances ought to be pointed out: that, in a period of very great depression, there has been no such falling-off of general revenue in the colony—that is, in the Customs, in the stamp duties, and other duties of that nature and kind—as might have been anticipated in the time of depression that came upon us. It may be said that, seeing the land revenue fell off so much, it was the duty of the Government instantly to have made some large reductions in the public expenditure; but I say that to have followed such a course would have been contrary to true policy. If we had, during the period of depression which has prevailed, suddenly made large reductions in the public expenditure in consequence of the failure of the land revenue, we should have ruined almost every inhabitant of New Zealand, we should have brought distress upon every part of the country, and we should have caused irreparable ruin to the credit of a colony which I believe is in as sound a financial position as any portion of Her Majesty's dominions. Now, Sir, the falling-off in land revenue is to my mind no falling-off whatever in the revenue of the country. Land is a commodity which must ultimately be purchased, and in it we hold a stock of the greatest possible value—a stock for which there must ultimately be very great competition. All men desire to purchase that commodity which we hold. It is a commodity which costs nothing for its storage; it is a commodity which is not injured by keeping, but, on the contrary, increases in value day by day. Therefore I say it is our duty, acting as a wise community, not to bring ruin upon the whole country in consequence of the sale of that commodity having momentarily fallen off. It is a good security for any money which it may be necessary to raise to meet the deficiency arising from a falling-off in the sale of that which must ultimately be of greater value than it is now. I can therefore see no reason whatever for gloomy anticipations. I think it is our duty to do that which the present Colonial Treasurer has asked us to do to-night. We must have followed the same course had we remained in office. We should have brought down a Bill of this nature several days ago; and I should myself have recommended the granting of power to raise money even to a larger amount than it is now proposed should be granted to the Government. I go a degree further, and say that if we had been allowed to conduct the affairs of this country—which we were not allowed to do because the dissolution was given, as I say, in such unconstitutional terms and in so unprecedented a manner that our hands were tied—my colleagues and myself, and the Colonial Treasurer who preceded me, would have been prepared in July last to submit measures which we believed would have provided for the prevailing deficiency. We believed that, if those measures had been passed in July last, funds would now be coming in from new taxes which would have been imposed—taxes which would have been of a just nature, which would not have weighed upon that portion of the community which ought not to contribute to them, and which would have fallen greatly upon persons living out of the country, and drawing large re-

nues from New Zealand. Through causes of which I have already spoken, we were unable then to impose those taxes; from causes known to all of you, we were unable to propose them during the short period of this session in which we held office; and it must be also manifest to all honorable gentlemen that, were we doing it now in this present month, we could not hope to obtain any amount of revenue from such taxes in such a time as would aid the deficiency of the present moment. Therefore the course proposed to be pursued by the present Government is, I believe, a wise one, and one which we intended to adopt. I see that they not only propose to follow our plans in this respect, but that they have already given notice of their intention to introduce to this House one of the very measures by which we proposed to increase the revenue, which was left in our offices prepared to their hands. I can only hope, further, that they will, if they continue in office, follow the course of taxation which we proposed to adopt. If the present Government do continue in office, and if they do adopt that course of taxation, they will receive our warmest support on this side of the House. If they do not, then of course they can look for no support at our hands. I have ventured to trouble the House with these few remarks because I think they are sufficient to explain what has taken place to-night. The details of the questions raised shall be gone into at a future time; but I would wish honorable gentlemen to observe further, in addition to what I have said, that they are told a large sum is to be paid for the purchase of Native lands. That is nothing but a mercantile stock. We are like a mercantile firm purchasing a commodity in which it deals—a commodity for which there is a large demand—a commodity which we ought to purchase to supply the wants of settlers—a commodity which will yield, I am satisfied, in many respects, especially in the revenue raised by taxation from those who are enriched by the occupation of that land, a very considerable profit. Therefore I think that, instead of there being any reason for gloom or for apprehension, the honorable gentleman may rely that, with a careful administration of the affairs of the country, and if wise laws be imposed to meet the deficiency which has taken place, everything will go smoothly on, and the colony will continue to advance in prosperity with that marvellous rapidity which has hitherto been the case.

Mr. JOHNSTON.—I would like to submit to the Treasurer and to the House whether it would not be wiser, in order to apply what the Treasurer calls a temporary remedy to a temporary deficit, to ask the House to authorize the issue of Treasury bills to the amount of £200,000, rather than to place an enormous permanent power in the hands of the Ministry of the day, whoever they may be, as I understand the proposed amending Act will do. I would draw the attention of the House, and more particularly that of new members, to the fact that, under the law as it now stands, the House has given Ministers the power to spend £100,000 a year without appropriation. In addition, Ministers in framing the estimates take a certain amount for contingencies in each department, amounting in all to £60,000 or £70,000. Further, in the Native Department and the Land Purchase Department the expenditure is very much at the discretion of the Government. Altogether they spend, without check or control by this House, something like £200,000 a year. The House, after giving the Government power to spend this large sum without special appropriation, recognized that the power of spending would not be of much service unless the money was also there. It has borne in mind that possibly the revenue might be insufficient, and has therefore given the Government of the day power to issue bills to an amount not exceeding £100,000 whenever the revenue shall be insufficient not only to make the payments which the House has authorized, but also to defray the discretionary expenditure which the Government may think fit to warrant. It seems to me that the effect of giving the Government power to obtain a large amount of money by merely signing promissory notes, and at the same time giving them power to expend the very large sum of £200,000 without appropriation by the House, is that it does away with all necessity for retrenchment. However short the revenue may be, the Government carries on its expenditure, knowing that behind the revenue which may come in there is always power to sign deficiency bills; and, in addition to doing away with any necessity for retrenchment, it also does away with any control by this House over the expenditure of the country. Now, if the statement of extravagant over-expenditure which we have just heard from the Treasurer suggests anything, it suggests that the House must resume that control; and to my mind the first and most effective step we can possibly take is to curtail very much—if we do not absolutely do away with—this discretionary power that the Ministry of the day now enjoys. Therefore, whilst I recognize that, inasmuch as the cash for requisite disbursements is not now coming in, we must supplement the revenue by signing bills, I submit to the House that it is better to authorize Treasury bills for £200,000—if that is the amount the Treasurer thinks requisite—and be done with them, rather than amend the Public Revenues Act in the way suggested by the Treasurer—rather than increase in that way the present power Ministers of the day have of enlarging the revenue from £400,000 to £600,000, because that is a permanent Act.

Mr. GISBORNE.—No; only until the end of the session.

Mr. JOHNSTON.—It is a permanent Act. The Public Revenues Act, under which deficiency bills are now issued, is a permanent Act. Therefore, thinking as I do that one of the first steps the House should take is to limit this power possessed by the Government of the day, I submit that it is far better to issue Treasury bills, and have done with the matter, than give additional powers. If the Treasurer agrees with me, he can easily amend his motion by moving the suspension of Standing Orders, for the purpose of authorizing the issue of certain Treasury bills.

Major ATKINSON.—If the House will permit me, I could explain that I entirely agree with what has fallen from the honorable member for Manawatu. But he has mistaken the purport of the Bill, which is this: As the House has not considered the question how the deficiency is to be met, it seemed to the Government that it was their duty only to provide temporarily for making the necessary payments. This Bill expires at the end of the present session, and will not affect the general powers of the Government at all. One issue only can take place, and that will be entirely used and disappear before the end of November. Otherwise I entirely agree with the honorable gentleman.

Mr. HALL.—I should not have troubled the House on the present occasion, if it had not been that the remarks which fell from the honorable member for Christchurch City would, if unnoticed, leave an exceedingly wrong and mischievous impression on the House and the country. I would first refer to his denial of the statement made by my honorable friend the Colonial Treasurer that the country has been left practically in ignorance of the state of the finances for the last fifteen months. The honorable gentleman said we had had accounts published in the Gazette from time to time. That is perfectly true; but how many men are there in the country, how many men are there in this House, who, without the full explanations which are from time to time afforded in Financial Statements, can from those figures learn the actual financial position of the colony? Are there half a dozen men in this House who, whatever attention they may have paid to those figures, had any idea that the financial position of the colony was such as has been disclosed to-night by my honorable friend the Colonial Treasurer? The honorable gentleman states that it is no fault of his that last session he did not come down with a Financial Statement—that he was precluded from doing so by an act on the part of His Excellency which he called, I think very wrongly, an unconstitutional act. Sir, the act was not, in my humble opinion, by any means unconstitutional. It was a proper constitutional condition, which it was open to His Excellency to attach to the granting of a dissolution. It was a reasonable condition, and such as I believe any prudent man in His Excellency's position ought to attach to it. But, Sir, did that condition really prevent my honorable friend from coming down with a Financial Statement? Was there any condition to that effect? The only complaint on this side of the House was, that he did not make a Financial Statement. He merely laid before us a few tables, and said a few unintelligible words; but he conveyed to this House really no information, and left us practically in that state of darkness from which the Colonial Treasurer has just now relieved us. Sir, the honorable gentleman's remarks, to which I refer as being calculated to be mischievous unless they are noticed, are those by which he tries to make us believe that the country is in a sound financial position. Those remarks, coming from a gentleman who has just left the position of Colonial Treasurer, and of his general standing and reputation, would be certain to carry great weight, if unnoticed. He says the colony is not in an unsound position, although the deficit amounts to not less than £912,000. He says that a part of that is owing to the failure in the land revenue, and he tells the House that the rest would have been made up by the measures which his Government were prepared to lay before the House. Now, the principal of these proposals was a Bill to levy an income-tax. I may mention that the late Government took the idea of an income-tax from members of this side of the House. It is the very thing which we have advocated for the last two years—that we should not put a tax on one description of property only and none upon other property and income. I was exceedingly glad to find, on entering office, that the late Government had made some progress towards carrying out our policy; and honorable gentlemen need not be the least afraid, if we continue in office, that we shall drop that Bill. But how far would that relieve us from our difficulty? The amount estimated to be raised by that tax is about £200,000, and our deficit is £900,000; and yet the honorable gentleman would have us go on in a fool's paradise, and believe that the measures which his Government intended to introduce would have relieved us from this alarming—I may say unparalleled—financial condition. The next thing he suggests is, that the enormous expenditure which has been going on for the purpose of acquiring Native land will be a profitable commercial transaction. Now, I hope, before the session closes, that we shall have full figures laid before us showing what has been spent in this colony in the purchase by Government of Native lands on the one side, and what has been recovered by the sale of those lands on the other side; and, from my personal observation of colonial finance, extending over a series of years, I believe that, so far from the purchase of Native lands being a source of profit, it will be found to be a heavy loss. I should have been exceedingly glad to have been able to treat the matter in a more cheerful light; I should have been glad to have been able to take the same cheerful view of things which the honorable member for Christchurch City has done; but I feel bound not to let his remarks pass without saying that I believe we should be misled by the honorable gentleman if we took the same view he has taken; and I cannot sit down without adding that the most gloomy feature of this gloomy prospect appears to me to be the utter inability of the gentlemen opposite to realize the very serious financial position in which we are really placed.

Mr. BALLANCE.—Sir, I quite agree with the honorable member who has just sat down, that the position is a grave one; but I think the honorable member himself was in a position to have realized that when the House met at the beginning of last session. However, instead of asking for a full and complete statement of the finances of the colony, and at the same time some remedy by which they could be placed in a proper position, he gave the Government no opportunity whatever, but at once moved a vote of want of confidence, based on the fact that there was a majority prepared to support his motion. Now, Sir, I have always thought that these honorable gentlemen, instead of using that majority to prevent the Government from coming down with a proper system of finance, should have waited until the Government had submitted the Financial Statement, and the House had seen the position of the colony. There is no doubt that, if the colony has been kept in darkness for fifteen months, the fault is largely due to those honorable gentlemen. It is nonsense to say that a full and satisfactory statement can be brought down and submitted to the House while a vote of want of confidence is hanging over the heads of Ministers. We know very well that, while their fate is undecided, there is no opportunity given to them or to the Treasurer to go exhaustively into the finances of the colony; and, Sir, this is the cause, this the reason, why the financial position of the colony has not been placed before this House at an earlier date. Now, I was not surprised to hear what the Premier said with regard to the purchase of Native lands. I think the honorable member's (Mr. Hall's) theory is free-trade—free-trade in Native lands—and the honorable gentleman has placed it upon that ground, because he has said his impression is that there will be a dead loss on Native land transactions. What does he mean by that? Does he mean that we shall not realize in cash at the Treasury the amount that we expend in the purchase of Native lands? If that is what he means by "a dead loss," I am perfectly willing to agree with the honorable member; but that is not the sole reason for the acquisition of a landed estate in this Island. The gain which we hope to derive from the purchase of Native lands is not merely a Treasury gain, but a gain in actual bond fide settlement spread over this Island. Now, I think the honorable gentleman misrepresented the honorable member for Christchurch City when he told this House that that honorable member intended to adjust the finances by an Income-Tax Bill. The honorable member for Christchurch City said nothing of the kind. The honorable member meant, no doubt, that an Income-Tax Bill would be brought down; but that was not the whole scheme, I presume, of the late Government. They had a very much more extended scheme of finance to submit to the House; and, Sir, what is the position in which these gentlemen were placed by the vote of want of confidence? If the Financial Statement had been brought down towards the end of July, as it would have been, we should have had three months' more Customs revenue upon those items which the Government intended to deal with; and I believe I may state with some confidence that it was the purpose of the Government to increase the duties on some items of Customs; so that actually we have lost some three months' revenue by what I may call the unpatriotic conduct of those gentlemen. I think, so far from the honorable member for Christchurch City having created a mischievous impression over the country, the statement made to-night by the honorable member for Egmont, coloured as it is in the highest degree, is far more likely to create a mischievous impression, not only in this colony, but in the mother-country. The honorable member has made a misstatement upon the assurance given to him by certain officers in the Treasury and Public Works Department; and I only say that the amount which the honorable gentleman estimates will have to be paid on public works before June next year is nearly double the amount which will be required. I think I can state, upon the assurance of the honorable member for Port Chalmers, that the total amount of payments upon public works—contracts entered into—will not exceed £100,000 a month. Now, if that is so, the honorable gentleman opposite has received from those gentlemen in the department a totally erroneous statement of the liabilities against the loan we are about to raise; but I would like to ask the honorable member for Egmont, has he never drawn against loan? What was the position of the colony before the three-and-a-half-million loan was raised? To meet contracts for public works, the late Government had to draw upon that loan before it was raised. That was a legacy entailed upon the Government which took office in 1877. I will say this, Sir: I believe it has been a common practice to anticipate the raising of loans, and to a certain extent to discount a loan before it has been raised. Now, the honorable member for Manawatu has stated that he is in favour of Treasury bills being issued; and the honorable member for Egmont says that he proposes to raise £200,000 by deficiency bills for two months, and that before the end of that time the whole thing would be reconsidered. It does not make much matter whether the money is raised on Treasury bills or deficiency bills, with this exception: that, if raised on Treasury bills, they could be made negotiable securities, and that less evil would result to the colony than would be the case if the money were raised here on deficiency bills. It is, however, a matter of very slight consequence. My own impression is, that the power contained in the Public Revenues Act of 1870, limiting the amount to £400,000, should be increased. Since that Act was passed the public works system has been extended, and the time has come for increasing that power which the Government should, in my opinion, have in its hands. Now, the honorable member for Egmont, with regard to the expenditure of last year, appears to me to have taken a most unfair view of the financial position of the colony. He does what he did on a previous occasion: he takes certain public departments, and he says that upon these departments there is a large increase of expenditure during the year; therefore the Government was extravagant. What are the departments which the honorable gentleman took? Two of the departments were Electric Telegraph and Post Office, and another was Public Domains and Buildings. I submit to the House that that is not a fair statement. Every honorable member knows full well that in the Electric Telegraph and Post Office Departments there are extensions made every year. New offices are built, new men appointed; and, of necessity, in consequence of the progress the colony is making, there must be a large addition made to the expenditure every year. Again, with regard to Public Domains and Buildings: we know very well that the late Government had been pushing on public buildings in the colony; and I think honorable members will admit that in some parts of the colony the public buildings are in a very wretched and dilapidated condition; and in proportion to the zeal of the Government in this direction, so will the expenditure be regulated. Can any honorable gentleman call that extravagant? If the Treasurer had been fair, if he had been candid, he would have excluded the Post Office, the Telegraphs, and Public Domains and Buildings. He would have taken the purely administrative departments, and would have shown whether upon those departments there was a large excess of expenditure. But he does nothing of the kind, and I would venture to say that, if the purely administrative departments had been taken, he would have found that, so far from increases, there have been large reductions, and that the Government had effected retrenchment. Speaking for one department, I can say that when I left the Treasury the expenses were less than they were when I took charge eighteen months before; and I believe he will find that it was so with several other departments. The Treasurer has said that the £100,000 which it was proposed to transfer for revenue to the Public Works Department was not transferred. Well, that is so: but what was the position? We found that the amount of land revenue which was estimated was not likely to be realized, and, as a matter of fact, it was not realized by £350,000. What was the Government to do in a difficulty like that? The emergency was great. Would it have been justifiable on the part of the Government to deal with this money as they at first proposed to deal with it? I say it would not. The £100,000, which really was revenue, we still devoted to revenue purposes, and allowed that clause of the Appropriation Act to lapse which required it to be transferred to the Public Works Account. We did no more than what the honorable gentleman did before us. What became of his £148,000 of surplus with which he commenced the previous year? Was it not dealt with in precisely the same way? He brought it forward as revenue in the succeeding year. I was much amused at the view the honorable gentleman took, that the balance at the beginning of the year and the deficiency at the end of the year should be added together in order to show the whole deficiency of the year. I remarked that in 1877 some honorable member sitting on this side of the House said the same thing, when the present Treasurer replied, "Oh, you must not deal with it in that way; you must include the surplus of the previous year in the revenue, and compare it with the expenditure of the year." I say the argument he applied then is good now. I agreed with him in 1877, though I cannot agree with him to-night. So that we see the deficit for the past year was £131,000, but, if we take from that £50,000, which will be got from the land-tax, we have a net deficit of only £80,000; and, considering the extraordinary falling-off in the land revenue, which was due to circumstances over which we had no control whatever, the principal one being the failure of a bank in Glasgow, and consequent suspicion as to the soundness of credit not only of this but of other colonies—private credit, I mean, not public credit—if we take that circumstance into account, I think it will be admitted the financial results of the year are satisfactory, and that the honorable gentleman has not shown the contrary. We have virtually a deficit of only £80,000, and it cannot be said that this is not a satisfactory result, taking into account the extraordinary circumstances to which I have referred. The honorable gentleman has gone into the expenditure of the Native Department, and has pointed out that the expenditure in that department has increased during several years. I entirely concur with him when he says the expenditure of that department is more than it ought to be; but the circumstances were extraordinary. The £4,000 to which he referred as having been expended at the Kopua meeting, was an expenditure as justifiable as any expenditure ever was in the history of the colony, and the results in themselves are satisfactory. In securing an alliance with Rewi, one of the most powerful chiefs in the colony, and a man whose friendship for the colony will, in my opinion, save a large expenditure in the future, and insure peace and confidence in the Waikato, that expenditure should not be regretted by this House. On the West Coast the expenditure on Armed Constabulary showed an increase in consequence of the action of a fanatic, and that was a matter entirely beyond the control of the Government. I will just bring before the House the facts of the matter. This man, Te Whiti, has not been, as it were, the creation of the present day—it was not during the reign of the late Government that he assumed the position he has taken up. The fact is, that for six or seven years—all through the term of office of the previous Government—Te Whiti was increasing in power, and increasing in power for mischief, pursuing the same course that he has pursued during the last eighteen months; and I believe the time to have nipped his power in the bud was seven or eight years ago, when Te Whiti assumed possession at Parihaka. To these circumstances, entirely beyond the control of the Government, is due the fact that expenditure was increased, and the money anticipated from the sale of land on the Waimate Plains was not realized. Had that sale taken place, I believe that, notwithstanding the extraordinary commercial depression, the full amount of money anticipated from the land revenue would have been obtained. The honorable gentleman might have pointed out that all anticipations with regard to ordinary revenue during the last financial year were far more than realized. The fact is shown that the anticipations were exceedingly moderate, and the returns on all the important items of ordinary revenue have justified those anticipations.

Major ATKINSON.—I did.

Mr. BALLANCE.—Well, the honorable gentleman passed over it very lightly. I did not hear him dwell upon that fact, or even refer to it. I agree with him that there is a great difficulty which the House must look in the face, and it is quite right to place before the House in distinct terms the position the House will have to take up. There is a deficit in the revenue, but not such a deficit as the honorable gentleman anticipates. My own impression is, that it is not right to make such statements as have been made as to the prospects. The deficiency, at the end of this year, if we leave out of account the deficiency at the beginning of the year, will not exceed £500,000 or £600,000. We have a right to say that the falling-off in the land revenue occurring in one year should not be dealt with in the way of imposing fresh taxation to the whole amount. I think that would be a mistake, and, if we did impose fresh taxation suddenly at this time of year, hoping to recover that amount, it would impose hardship upon the colony which the people are not prepared for. If the honorable gentleman brings down another Financial Statement, I hope he will go over these figures again, and he will find that he has greatly exaggerated on the one hand and under-estimated on the other, and that the position is not nearly so alarming and gloomy as he has made it out to be in his Statement.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable gentleman who has last spoken in defence of the late Government has every right to do so, for we may attribute a great many of the evils under which we are now suffering to him. At the time he made his Financial Statement, he will recollect that the estimate of land revenue which he put before the House was spoken of as altogether absurd. I went to him privately, and urged that he could never realize that amount of land revenue. Does any member of this House suppose that we could realize £1,230,000 for land revenue in this colony in any one year? Yet this is what that honorable gentleman estimated to get, knowing that the Minister for Public Works said we were to get another £750,000 from the land revenue—in all, £2,000,000 of money. Did any member of the House suppose that estimate could be realized? But how could such an estimate be reconciled with the profession of the Grey Government, that they were desirous of encouraging settlement? How could any honorable gentlemen stand up, and say they were hoping to receive a large amount of revenue from the land, and at the same time were desirous of settling the country? The money could only be raised in one way, by playing into the hands of the monopolists. Yet the Hon. the Premier, on his stumping tour, said he wanted to settle on these Waimate Plains a number of families, and that the Opposition prevented him. What Opposition has prevented him from settling these people on the land? Why, they wanted to sell the Waimate Plains for cash; and yet the Premier, in his stumping tour, tells the people that the Opposition prevented him from settling the people on the land. The Opposition could never have prevented him, because he had the administration of the lands in his own hands, and had not even to ask for permission to do what he says he wanted to do in this respect. The honorable member for Wanganui says that, had we got £360,000 from land revenue last year out of the Waimate Plains, the estimate would have been right. How was it possible that we could have got £360,000 in cash out of those few thousand acres on the Waimate Plains? But, even so, that at once shows there was no intention to settle these lands, but to realize cash for them. The honorable gentleman has now come to the rescue of the late Government; but had he done his duty he would have been on those benches to bring forward a Financial Statement. Had he not believed to the late Premier in the character of the gentleman who sold his Master for thirty pieces of silver, we should have had a Financial Statement. But when the honorable gentleman took to writing articles in the newspapers, calling the Premier, of whose Government he was at the time a member, a coward, what could we expect?

Mr. BALLANCE.—Sir, I rise to a point of order, or, rather, to a personal explanation. I give the statement of the honorable gentleman an emphatic denial. There is not one word of truth in it. It is absolutely false.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is not parliamentary for the honorable member to characterize the statement made by the honorable gentleman as being absolutely false.

Mr. BALLANCE.—I submit to your ruling, Sir, and will withdraw the expression which you say is unparliamentary. I give the statement the strongest contradiction in my power. The language is entirely untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Such language as that cannot be used in this House.

Mr. BALLANCE.—I will say that there is no foundation for the statement made by the honorable gentleman.

Mr. McLEAN.—I was probably wrong in saying that he wrote the article. I give in so far as that. My information was, that he only dictated the article.

Mr. BALLANCE.—I assert that the honorable gentleman is making statements which have no foundation in fact; they are entirely opposed to fact.

Mr. SPEAKER.—After the denial given by the honorable member for Wanganui (Mr. Ballance), the honorable gentleman, the member for Waikouaiti, should not repeat the statement made.

Mr. McLEAN.—I accept the denial. I will put the statement in a different way. It is well known that the honorable gentleman has considerable control over a newspaper which called the Hon. the late Premier a coward. I put it in that way.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think that has any bearing on the subject before the House.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable gentleman is not here, as Colonial Treasurer, to do what he ought to have done. He should not have left the Government on the eve of the meeting of Parliament; he ought to have been in his place in order to inform the House what the state of the finances of the colony was. That is the reason why I have thus referred to that honorable gentleman. Notwithstanding that he was turned out, I do not think the position he took up was at all to his credit. The honorable gentleman said that the Opposition never gave the Government the opportunity of showing the finance last year.

Did not the late Colonial Treasurer last session keep us waiting for a fortnight, telling us that he was going to give us a Financial Statement? Did he not keep us from day to day in expectation of this, and, to our surprise, did he not come down to the table of this House and mumble a few words and read a clause of the Appropriation Bill? Sir, that was all the Statement we got. He calls that a Financial Statement, and says he is not responsible for a Statement not having appeared in Hansard. It would be very hard for a Statement to appear in Hansard that was never delivered. They might as well have taken a piece out of the Appropriation Bill and put it in Hansard, and that would be the speech of the Hon. the late Colonial Treasurer at the last meeting of Parliament; and this was the complete Statement for which he was pleased to keep us waiting a fortnight—this was the complete statement of the finances of the colony. Now, the honorable gentleman (Mr. Ballance) confessed that the situation was a grave one, but he said it was not nearly so bad as my honorable friend the member for Egmont stated it to be. Honorable gentlemen can judge for themselves. They can take the estimated revenue for different years. They know the condition of the colony. Each member of this House knows the condition of the colony, and what prospect there is of a revenue coming in. Honorable members know that the state of the country at the present moment is such that we must expect a large deficiency in the revenue. Why, the last quarter shows a decrease in the Customs revenue. We all know that the state of trade in the country at present will prevent people from travelling on the railways, and will prevent the estimates from the railways being realized. People will economize, and there will be less Customs duties obtained. All these things have to be taken into consideration. The pressure for money is great, and so long as that pressure continues, so long will the revenue of the colony keep decreasing. The honorable gentleman says, "Are you to take into consideration the deficiency in the land revenue for one year, and increase the taxation to make up that deficiency?" Sir, when we talked of the land revenue falling off, that honorable gentleman persisted in telling the people of this colony that they were in such a flourishing condition that he could take the duties off the necessities of life. We on this side of the House told him he could do no such thing—that he must put on other duties—that he must increase taxation, so that we might not have a very large deficiency, such as now exists. He took no heed of what was said, but went on his way in defiance of any such consideration. He says, "We must keep faith with the country with regard to the duty on tea and sugar." They have broken every promise made to the country with the exception of that one, and it would be a very small sin to break that one. If they have committed such a great sin as breaking every other promise made to the country, surely it would not be so much worse to break the promise to take so much duty off tea and sugar. We take the deficiency at £600,000; and if he were to put on taxation to meet that de-fiency, would he not paralyze trade?—would he not throw this country into such a condition as I am sure few people would care to see it placed in? It is bad enough at present, but I do not know what state it would be in supposing he should increase taxation so as to meet this deficiency. We come now to the Native land question. The honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey) stated that the land was a mercantile commodity. Ever since I have taken a seat in this House I have steadily opposed the purchase of Native land. I have done so in the Government and I have done so out of the Government, and I intend to follow that course. I say these purchases of Native lands are bringing this colony into great liabilities. The system of Native land purchases enables the Native Minister to sign vouchers on which is stated, Pay to the Hon. So-and-so, for a gratuity to this Native, £50—for a gratuity to that Native, £100. Who knows how much money is squandered in that way—whether it is put to a right purpose or whether it is not? We must put a stop to such a system. So long as you continue that system, so long will you have these abuses. The Native Minister has full control over these funds; he may pay what sums he pleases, and we know not where the money is going. I am sure that the Committee for the appointment of which the honorable member for Clive has given notice has been the means of inducing honorable members opposite to endeavour to stop the Statement made by the Colonial Treasurer. When they saw this afternoon that they could not stop it, the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) stood up and graciously said, "We are quite willing that the Colonial Treasurer should make that Statement to the country." That was said when they could not avoid it—when they could not help themselves. We do not know now who has taken up the position of leader. The honorable member for Port Chalmers takes up one position, and the honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey) takes up a different position, and we do not know who is leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MACANDREW.—It is very sad.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member says, "It is very sad." The honorable member is in a very sad position. Then the honorable gentleman opposite (Mr. Ballance) referred to the power of Te Whiti as having been a growing power for several years. If such is the case, why did his Government, after they had been a short time in office, and after the Waitara meeting—why did they come down to this House and state that our relations with the Natives were satisfactory? I presume, when they stated that to the House, they stated what was the case; so that we must date the growth of Te Whiti's power from that time. I believe that the Native troubles have been caused by the fact that the Government simply did nothing in the way of administering Native affairs, but allowed everything to drift. I do not believe that you could have found half-a-dozen gentlemen in the House who could have brought the affairs of this colony to a more deplorable mess in such a short space of time. The honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey)—the honorable member for the whole of New Zealand—for the human race—has, as usual, smoothed everything over; he would have us believe that the colony is in no difficult position whatever. Well, the honorable gentleman as Treasurer has done a great deal to precipitate the crisis in the colony. Instead of bringing this House together and devising means for raising money, he draws upon the local institutions. It was unfair to bring pressure on such institutions, during a monetary crisis such as has not been known for years. It was rather the duty of the Government to relieve the local institutions in a time of trouble, instead of pressing upon them at a time when the monetary institutions were in disrepute owing to the failures that had taken place in the Home-country. It is true that no loss has accrued to any of the local monetary institutions from such failures, and that there has been no cause for anxiety respecting them. The honorable gentleman, instead of calling this House together to devise means for raising money, took so much money out of those local institutions, and thus increased the financial crisis in the colony, and brought it to the state in which it is at present. That is one case of pure maladministration. Then the honorable gentleman went on to say that he was prevented by the dissolution from proposing means whereby to alleviate this crisis. I ask the honorable gentleman if finance was one of the questions included in "contested motions." He knows that it was not, and that he had full power and opportunity to come to this House and inform it of the state of the finances, and that he should have done so. When on the hustings, before the dissolution, I stated to my constituents what I estimated the deficiency would be. The honorable gentleman says it was only £60,000. Why, Sir, the difference between the actual and estimated revenue last year was £295,000. And how did the honorable gentleman make up his credit amount in 1877? He took items out of different loans and brought them into account as revenue. Then he said, "We will be magnanimous. We will hand over £100,000 to the Public Works Fund." The honorable gentleman had no right to that £100,000. He said he was going to hand it over to the Public Works Account, and he never did so; and now he takes it into revenue. I think he will need to take that amount and a great deal more into revenue. Then the honorable member for New Zealand—I do not know what place the honorable gentleman sits for, so I must regard him as representing New Zealand—said we prevented him from proposing taxes. He never told us there was a deficiency, and never proposed to bring forward any taxes; and I say that the honorable gentlemen on those benches will not have a very popular duty to perform when they bring down a taxation scheme to this House. Any one looking at the Gazettes, who understands them, could see what the deficiency was, and I myself was always able to take out the deficiencies and show them to my constituents. But how many members of this House study the Gazettes? How many members will even take the trouble to analyze a Financial Statement made in this House? The task requires a deal of labour, and I do not suppose that it is undertaken by more than half-a-dozen members, who take an interest in the question of finance; and it is left to those half-dozen members to show to this House in what condition the finances are; and this they generally have to do at the end of the session, when it is difficult to get members to listen to them. The late Colonial Treasurer said it was no harm to anticipate the five-million loan by drawing against it to the extent of two millions. We know those honorable gentlemen have been in great straits for money; we know that they have had to raise money in London on short-dated debentures and in anticipation of this loan. I may tell the House that if half-a-dozen men in London cared to make the loan a failure they could do so. Why, it is not long since this colony put up one and a half millions for tender. And what was the amount tendered for? Only £200,000. And how is it possible to say that the same thing may not occur again, or that a crisis may not take place just as we are about to place the loan upon the market, and it may become a failure? I do not say that at such a crisis it would have been wise to reduce the expenditure on public works too heavily; but when the preceding Government had pulled the finances together, and had become very unpopular in consequence, the late Government came into power and launched out at a rate which no reasonable men, and no men having any regard for the interests of the country, would have done. And now another cautious Government has come into office; and, after performing the unpopular task of pulling the finances together, they will be turned out, while their successors are again to let the strings of the purse loose; and this is to go on till we get to the end of our borrowing, which, I am afraid, is not very far off. The late Government, until they got into office, talked loudly of economy; but after they got into power they did nothing but squander money, and increase the Civil Service—which they did to the extent that has been shown. This brings me to a point referred to by the honorable member for Wanganui (Mr. Ballance), when he said that the Civil Service expenditure, as stated to the House, included the Post Office and Telegraph buildings. Why, the honorable gentleman knows that most of these buildings—the important ones, at any rate—were built out of loan, and that their cost was not included in the estimates of departmental expenditure. The honorable gentleman is perfectly aware of that, and yet he wished to mislead the House by saying the expenditure stated was not the actual expenditure. In increasing the Civil Service as they have done, the late Government have created a difficulty for their successors which those gentlemen will have some trouble in coping with. They have also done an injury to the Civil Service of this colony that it will take a long time to recover from. They have established a sort of terrorism in the Civil Service. They have taken away those valuable positions which have become vacant, and which are few and far between, and they have demoralized the Service by not allowing their places to be filled by those who entered the Service as young men, and are working their way up to higher positions.

Mr. MACANDREW.—Name.

Mr. McLEAN.—There are several cases. There is Mr. Luckie's appointment. I am not going to say anything regarding these gentlemen themselves.

An Hon. MEMBER.—There is only one.

Mr. McLEAN.—I might also mention Mr. McCullagh Reed, who received a most lucrative appointment as a reward for concocting untruthful telegrams about the Native meetings of the late Government, and publishing reports which were so glaringly-coloured that those honorable gentlemen were ashamed to include them with the extracts from other newspapers which they embodied in the papers laid before the House, and which they called State papers. They were ashamed to take their own friend's telegrams, because they were so highly-coloured.

Mr. MACANDREW.—He is not in the Civil Service.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable gentleman says he is not in the Civil Service. When you appoint a gentleman at £600 a year to go Home and lecture in England—

An Hon. MEMBER.—Ireland.

Mr. McLEAN.—Well, Ireland. I suppose he was to help to send out the six thousand paupers whom the Government were going to flood this colony with—whom the late Premier, in his telegram of the 15th February last, sent for, so that they might be an addition to the immigrants whom the late Government were pouring into this colony in the dead of winter. They wanted to introduce six thousand paupers into New Zealand, in order that the colony might be flooded with a class of people who could not work, even if there were employment for them. And this is done by the great protector of the working-man. I wonder how the honorable gentleman can reconcile his conduct in this matter with his speeches to the working-men delivered in Wellington, Dunedin, and Christchurch! The honorable member misled this House by omitting from the papers on immigration which he laid on the table this celebrated telegram to which I have alluded, and the reply thereto. Why did he keep the House in ignorance of that telegram? And why did he go about the colony telling the working-men he was opposed to further immigration, while, almost at the same moment, he was endeavouring to flood the colony with six thousand paupers? To revert, Sir, to the subject of Mr. Reed, who, the honorable member for Port Chalmers said, was not in the Civil Service. The late Government appointed him as Immigration Agent at Home at a salary of £600 a year for two years, and allowed him £250 for travelling expenses each way. And this was done because he wrote coloured telegrams relative to the Native meetings, on the strength of which the late Government declared that peaceful relations had been at last established with the Native race. There are a multitude of other appointments in the Native Department especially. Sir, I am truly glad that we have seen the end of their mismanagement. I attach great importance to the motion of the honorable member for Clive—which the honorable gentlemen opposite are endeavouring to evade—for a Committee to inquire into the expenditure of the Native Department; and I believe that the result of this investigation, in conjunction with the disclosures as to the state of our finances, will be that the country will not back those honorable gentlemen up, and that they will never see those benches again.

Mr. MOSS.—I think, Sir, it will be admitted that it is a most inconvenient method of taking the Financial Statement that we are having recourse to to-night—discussing it bit by bit, sinking down to a mere investigation of figures as figures, and not in the slightest degree touching the policy which ought to form part of a Financial Statement, but which is absent altogether from the one now before us. I can assure the Treasurer and the Premier that they are both under a very great delusion in supposing that what has been said to-night, so far at all events as it relates to the accounts up to the 30th June last, has not been before the public, thoroughly understood by the public, and, I believe, thoroughly understood by not the least intelligent portion of the public—the honorable members who are sitting in this House. It has been published, not in Gazettes, but in the form of regular statements of receipts and expenditure, and has been commented upon by newspapers in all directions. We all knew that there was a deficiency; and I think the honorable members underrate the intelligence of those who conduct the newspapers of this colony, and the intelligence of honorable members also who have had before them all the data upon which the Statement now made—so far as the 30th June is concerned—is based. I have myself looked through them very carefully more than once, and I was quite prepared to hear that there was a deficit—in fact, I knew there was a deficit up to the 30th June, 1879. But, when the Colonial Treasurer told us that the deficit would be £912,000 at the end of this year, then I ventured to think, and I still think, that he is labouring under a very great delusion himself. It is utterly impossible, to my mind, that there can be such a deficit. The honorable gentleman must have been in a very gloomy frame of mind when he made the calculations upon which this Statement is based. He has been threatened with an attack of opposition, which has given him a very gloomy view of the future. Why, Sir, the ordinary revenue has not fallen off in any way for some time past. It is the land revenue which has fallen off. The ordinary revenue has increased; and why should he think it will decrease now?

Major ATKINSON.—We do not.

Mr. MOSS.—The honorable gentleman distinctly stated that we must expect the ordinary revenue to fall off during the year.

Major ATKINSON.—No.

Mr. MOSS.—I am happy to hear it. Then it must have been the honorable member for Wai-kouaiti who made the statement. Now, as a matter of fact, any one who has studied these matters must know that, even when countries are in periods of financial distress, the public revenue does not necessarily fall off. That is the case in England at the present time. The most remarkable instance of the truth of this statement was the year 1847. It was noted at the time, and has been frequently quoted since, that, in the midst of the Irish famine, and when the greatest distress was being experienced in all the surrounding nations, England was able, for the first time, to do without deficiency bills. I do not think there is the slightest reason to apprehend any serious falling-off in the ordinary revenue in the approaching year. Then where is the deficit? Entirely in the land revenue; and I believe we shall continue to see a deficiency in that direction. But, admitting all these facts, it seemed to me that the Colonial Treasurer stopped just where we should have liked him to go on. How is the deficiency to be met? That is the point where the two sides of the House are more likely to be found at issue. That is exactly the point where the honorable gentleman's policy will come in. His Financial Statement, without that, is like "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out. I think we ought to have that information, because we shall otherwise go on debating a matter which could be settled by two or three ordinary accountants quite as readily as by the members of this House. Without that information we are simply beating the wind. We heard of the purchases of Native land, and reference was made to that as one direction in which much money had been wasted. That is not a secret discovered by the present Government. Nor does it affect the Government that last occupied those benches. We all know that, if money has been unprofitably spent in that way, it has been unprofitably spent by previous Governments. Notoriously so. We know of cases in which huge bushes have been leased one day to private individuals, and sold to the Government the next, subject to these leases of ninety-nine years. No revenue was likely to arise from such purchases as that. But will any one say that similar things have happened within the last two or three years? Whatever fault may be found with the late Government, it will be found that their land purchases are not unprofitable purchases: on the contrary, I think the colony may expect a considerable return from the land which those purchases represent. I was very glad to hear reference made to the meeting at Kopua, and to the cost of that meeting, because I venture to say that it was one of the cheapest operations, either from a military or civil point of view, which the colony has ever undertaken. If it had not been for the expenditure of that £4,000, we should have been compelled to maintain a large force on the Waikato frontier during the late excitement on the West Coast. I will not trouble the House at any length, because I feel that we have nothing to debate. It is no use going into petty matters of account; and there is no policy in the Financial Statement we have listened to to-night. There is nothing to lay hold of. It appears to me that the honorable gentleman has missed-fire. I cannot but regret the whole character of the Statement, if it was intended as a Financial Statement. The air has been full of rumours of the fearful disclosures that were to be made, and of the fearful acts of corruption of the last Government. A mountain was raised before us, and at last it has produced this ridiculous mouse. The whole Statement can serve no useful purpose, except to draw a red-herring across the want-of-confidence motion. It seems to me that we are wasting time in discussing it.

Mr. READER WOOD.—I cannot lose this opportunity of congratulating the Colonial Treasurer upon being what I may call a very lucky—a very fortunate man. Sir, he has administered the finances of this country for many years. He has had large revenues at his disposal; he has had large loan funds at his disposal; he has managed the accounts just exactly as he pleased. He has always had a large majority at his back, although there have been a few members on this side of the House who declared that the course he was taking would lead to bankruptcy and ruin. He leaves those benches for a few months, other gentlemen take his place, and he is enabled to come down here to-night and say that all that has gone wrong in his own financing is the fault of the honorable gentlemen who have lately occupied those benches. That is precisely the position of affairs as they stand to-night. The honorable gentleman's plan was simply this: So long as figures were placed before the country which were, on the face of them, in the slightest degree plausible, and so long as money could be got, nobody ever troubled himself about the accounts, or cared whence the money came or where it went. The whole country was demoralized; everybody was crying out for expenditure; and the honorable gentleman, like the Roman emperors, fed the populace. The result is now tolerably plain. His system of finance was this: He had a variety of funds, and, when there was a deficiency in one, he compensated that deficiency by a balance from another, and so on; and, when it came to the last deficiency, he always pushed that on to what was considered to be a Fortunatus's purse—namely, the Land Fund. For a long time the Land Fund did act as the Fortunatus's purse. However largely honorable members estimated that Land Fund, somehow or other it always exceeded the estimate—it always supplied us with funds; but at last that Land Fund failed, and now we have this deficit of £600,000 or £700,000 sticking out, because there is no Land Fund upon which to put it. This is the simple solution of the financial difficulty we have got into. As long as the Land Fund lasted there was no chance of financial difficulty; but the moment it ceases financial difficulties crop up. And is it fair that all this should be laid on the backs of the honorable gentlemen who lately occupied those benches? I feel perfectly satisfied that the sense of fair-play and good feeling of this House and of the country will place the blame where it ought to lie—namely, upon that speculative finance that was begun by Sir Julius Vogel, and continued by the honorable gentleman who now denounces the finance of the late Government, which is simply a continuation of the finance of the former Government. Now, Sir, one of the great charges made against the honorable member for the Thames and the late Government was this—the Hon. the Colonial Treasurer commenced his speech with it, and the Premier commenced his speech with almost precisely the same words: We were told that the finances had not been dealt with for the last fifteen months—that is to say, that the late Colonial Treasurer had made no Financial Statement. Now, I should like to know whose fault that was. It was the fault of the majority in this House in not demanding and compelling a Financial Statement to be made; and the majority in this House last session was on the other side. They had a majority of fourteen, and that majority of fourteen were unable to compel that honorable gentleman to make a Financial Statement. Why, Sir, there was an edifying scene enacted on the floor of this House last session. I was not here to see it unfortunately; but it must have been magnificently grand. Sir, it ought to become historical; and, if at any period of our career we have parliamentary buildings suitable to the requirements of this colony, and if we should have a New Zealand Maclise able to decorate our walls with historical pictures, this ought to be one of them. After the majority of fourteen had declared itself, what said the leader, Sir William Fox? He said to the honorable gentleman who had just been beaten, “We have a majority of fourteen, and we will impose conditions upon you, or we will grant neither your supplies nor your loan.” And what was the reply of the honorable gentleman who was then at the head of the Government? Did he come forward and say, “We are a weak and beaten party, just defeated by your majority of fourteen; we agree to whatever conditions you may choose to impose upon us”? No, Sir. He said, “I defy you and your majority. I will agree to no conditions, and you shall grant supply and the loan.” And what did the majority of fourteen say to that? Did they say, “We’ll give you no supply and no loan, until you agree to these conditions”? No. They slunk back to their benches and never said a word. And why? Because they dared not refuse the supplies; because they dared not refuse the loan. Because they knew it was their own system of finance which necessitated that loan, and necessitated those supplies. Does anybody in this House with a grain of common sense suppose for a single moment that, with that majority of fourteen, they would ever have allowed the member for the Thames a loan of £5,000,000 if it was not that they knew perfectly well that they could not refuse it, because the necessities of the country required it—the necessities imposed upon the country by their own legislation? “Conscience doth make cowards of us all;” and it made cowards of them, and they dared not carry out their threat. The honorable gentleman told us, and I quite agree with him, that the state of the finances requires the serious and immediate attention of the House. Sir, I say, if the House will give the finances its serious consideration, it is cheap at this £600,000—dirt-cheap, if the House will really take this matter under its control; if the House will put its foot down at once and say there shall be no more extravagant expenditure; there shall be no more public demoralization; there shall be no more of this onerous taxation; there shall be no more expenditure on public works that have not been reproductive, and are not likely to be reproductive; there shall be no more votes bought with borrowed money. I say, if that is done, £600,000 will be cheap. It will be the cheapest article we have had yet out of the whole lot. The only thing I am afraid of is, that the House will not do anything of the sort. To enable it to do so, you want what we have not got, and what I do not see how we are going to get—a strong Government. You saw one Government put out a few days ago by a majority of two. You will see another put out in another day or two by a majority of about four or five; and what is to be the result after that is more than I or anybody else can say. But this I say: that, if we have—well, Sir, it is a word that fell on my ear, and I was astonished to hear it in this House; it was spoken by my honorable friend the member for Auckland City West (Mr. W. J. Hurst) when seconding the Address in reply to the Governor’s Speech—that word was “patriotism.” I do not think I ever heard it used in this House before. It came, however, from my honorable friend with a good ring; it was re-echoed also by my honorable friend the Premier, but it fell from his lips as if it were a word that had no meaning—as if it could not possibly be understood in this centre of self-seeking and intrigue. But, Sir, if there is any patriotism here—if we are really to be the representatives of the people—it is the bounden duty of this House to turn its attention to the question of finance; to settle the thing upon a sure and solid basis; to stop these scandalous and extravagant votes for public works, in which nobody believes and which everybody asks for. If we do that, we shall, for the first time for the last eight or nine years, be really the representatives of the people, and be doing something for the country. The honorable member for Waikouaiti has made a charge against the late Government which I certainly should not have thought would have come from him. He made a charge with reference to the demoralization of the Civil Service by the action of the late Government; and when asked to mention names, all he could mention were two persons who, during a period of two years, have, it appears, been, in a somewhat irregular way, launched into the Civil Service. Sir, the honorable gentleman was himself a member of the Government of which Sir Julius Vogel was the head. In 1869, in 1870, in 1871, and in 1872 the gentleman who was at the head of that Government used to import by shoals into the Civil Service members from this House. And so atrocious, so abominable was it, and such a public scandal did it become, that the House, in its own defence, had to pass a measure which absolutely prevented members of the House from holding any Civil office for twelve months after they had ceased to be members. And not only was that done, but afterwards there was a system of corruption established within the walls of the House itself among its members that rendered it necessary to pass a Bill of Indemnity, whitewashing every one who had done anything in that way. In vain the honorable member for the Thames begged, and prayed, and pleaded. He said, "If these offences have been committed, I am perfectly willing to grant a Bill of Indemnity; but let us have the names put in the Bill. Do not make it general. We have not all done these things. Surely there are some of us who have not done these things." But no. They would not have the names mentioned. There was to be a general Bill of Indemnity: and by the force of a majority it was passed. And yet, Sir, that honorable gentleman has the assurance to get up and tell us the late Government ought to be condemned—utterly condemned—because two persons in two years have been wrongly imported into the Civil Service. I do not excuse the late Government. They have no doubt "done a great many things that they ought not to have done, and left undone a great many things that they ought to have done;" but I do not think the honorable gentleman is the one to accuse them. On the contrary, I should have expected to have found the best supporters of the late Government amongst those who now oppose them, because they followed in their tracks very closely. They have been nearly as extravagant as those honorable gentlemen, and have done nearly everything that the honorable gentlemen did who succeeded in turning them out in consequence. I should have thought that, instead of turning round on the late Government and accusing them of these things, they might have said to them, "Try. Go on. If not equal to us, you are getting along very well. We will be your best supporters, and no doubt in time you will come to us." That is the course which, when I came down here, I thought that side would take, and that I should find myself once more forced to take up that almost solitary position which I have before been compelled to occupy in this House. But what do I find? I find that I am obliged to support the late Government, as being the lesser evil of the two.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—I must say I was surprised at the way in which the Statement made by the Colonial Treasurer was received to-night, and I quite agree with those who have pronounced the debate that has taken place as a somewhat unprofitable one. But, Sir, I do not consider that the Colonial Treasurer is in any way accountable for the tone which the debate has taken, nor do I think he can in any way be blamed for having merely brought before us to-night the state of the public finances, without taking that further step which was referred to by the honorable member for Farnell, and developing a policy by which the deficiency in the revenue was to be met. I do not suppose that any member of the House on either side expected for a moment that my honorable friend would bring down to-night any policy for the future, or do anything more than keep the promise he made on a previous occasion and lay before the House a clear outline of the exact position of our finances to-day. Running through the speeches that have been made on the other side of the House to-night, I find that the late Premier was entirely at odds with another honorable member—a prominent member—of his party as to the character of the Statement of the Colonial Treasurer. The late Premier said very little more than to corroborate what my honorable friend had stated in the House. He did not in any way deny the accuracy of his figures, or the general correctness of his remarks. All he told us was, that there was nothing new in what the Treasurer had brought down—that everything that honorable gentleman had stated had been known for months; that it had been placed plainly before the country every quarter in the quarterly public accounts; that it was only such a Statement as he himself would have brought down earlier than this if he had remained in office, and for the result of which the Government of which he was the head were prepared to provide. He said he actually left measures for the new Government which would provide for the whole condition of affairs set forth in the Statement of the Treasurer. All of new that he told us was that the party who placed the Government in power were to blame for the fact that this condition of affairs was not provided for before, and was not placed before the House in the usual way. The same thing has been said by other honorable members; but every one who was in the House last session knows that the honorable member, the late Premier, had the fullest opportunity to lay the state of the finances before the House. We adjourned from day to day for nearly a fortnight at his own request, in order that he might have an opportunity of elaborating the figures which would enable him to make his Statement; and we waited with the greatest anxiety for such a disclosure as the present Treasurer has given us to-night. No obstacle whatever was thrown in the way of the honorable member for the Thames: on the contrary, the Opposition afforded him every possible opportunity for making his Financial Statement, and displayed a moderation on account of which they have incurred the stigma of feebleness and irresolution. The fact is, the irresolution and weakness with which we are now charged consisted solely in the extreme moderation we displayed for the express purpose of allowing the honorable gentleman to bring down his Financial Statement last session. There is nothing in what I now state that can be contradicted. I myself desired above all things that we should have a Financial Statement; and, when the Loan Bill was before the House, I said in my place that nothing but the promise of the Premier that we should have a clear and explicit statement of the accounts before Parliament was dissolved would induce me to support the passing of that Loan Bill. I was prepared to face unpopularity and every sort of objection rather than allow the Loan Bill to pass, if not very certain that we should have a clear and explicit Financial Statement. But, after all this, the honorable gentleman comes down and tells us that we, and we alone, prevented the state of the finances being laid before the country. What we held, and what we pressed upon him, was this:

that he ought to have called Parliament together not later than the month of May, and should then have laid before the country the serious and alarming state of the finances. So far from preventing the honorable gentleman from making a Financial Statement, we urged and pressed him in every way, until he came down to the House and told us our conduct was cruel, that we were urging him beyond his powers, and that he could not possibly make a Statement. The honest truth of the matter was, that the honorable gentleman had no grasp of the financial position of the colony, and did not know how the finances stood. He took control of the Treasury only a few weeks before the session opened, and he knew no more about the finances of the colony than any child in the country does. Nothing could be clearer than that, when the honorable gentleman, as Colonial Treasurer, first sat at the table to pass the estimates. When the simplest question was put to him asking for information regarding the state of the finances we could get no answer, for the simple reason that he was in such a puzzle that he could not give a rational or intelligible answer. I well remember the present Colonial Treasurer asking him whether a sum of over £40,000 was at debit or credit, and the Treasurer of that time could not tell to which side the balance belonged. He absolutely knew nothing about it; and that was the real reason why no Financial Statement was made. The state of affairs disclosed to-night convinces me more than ever that the Government acted very wrongly indeed in allowing so great a part of the year to slip away, and not calling Parliament together before the 24th of July. Had they done their duty to the country honestly and straightforwardly they would have called us together at least in May, and would have said, "The state of the finances is so grave that we must make provision at once for additional taxation, or else largely reduce the public expenditure." The honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey) told us that the reason why he did not reduce the expenditure was because it was very impolitic to reduce the public expenditure during a time of depression, and I was surprised to find that that statement was loudly cheered by honorable gentlemen on his side of the House. I admit at once that it is unpopular to reduce public expenditure during a period of depression; but to say that it is impolitic to do so is to state what to my mind is exactly the reverse of fact. I say that it is the bounden duty of men intrusted with the control of the affairs of a colony like this to reduce public expenditure, whether it is a time of depression or not, when they see that it is greater than the colony can bear, and is leading the colony into a state of affairs which will enormously increase that depression, and will enormously increase the burden of poverty weighing on the people, however much it may damage their popularity for the time being. I understand at once that, if you suddenly stop public works during depression, it will have the bad effect on the country which all spasmodic action has. I am not at all advocating spasmodic action; but I say that public expenditure ought to have been reduced, and the House ought to have been invited to reduce it. It is not necessary expenditure on public works that we object to. It is that during all this time, when the Government knew, or ought to have known, that the expenditure was largely exceeding the revenue—when they ought to have been cognizant that we should meet this year with a very large deficiency—it was their bounden duty to cut down the expenditure in those departments which are not in any way remunerative or profitable. Let us take, for instance, the Native Department. How can we—how can the Middle Island members especially—justify the enormous expenditure on Native affairs during all this time when the Government knew there was a deficiency, and that every day the deficiency was increasing without any means whatever being in view to meet it? When we find that the expenditure on Native affairs has actually exceeded the votes—which were admitted to be enormously extravagant—by £18,000; when we know that the money has been squandered in all directions, not on productive works, or to relieve the depression, but in a manner which was absolutely a terrible waste to the country; when we know that the money has been squandered in presents to the Natives, a great part of which is consumed in drink, and which, instead of relieving the depression, actually increased it, we know that that money might have been saved, and would have gone to decrease the deficit we find in the Public Treasury to-day. I entirely dissent from the opinion of the honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey) that it is impolitic to reduce public expenditure during a time of depression. He simply used the wrong word. If he had spoken what was in his mind I am sure he would have said it was unpopular to do so; and the reason why the Government did not reduce the public expenditure was simply because they were afraid to face the unpopularity which reduction in expenditure always produces. Whether this Government is in office or another Government, I say they will have to face that unpopularity; but, if they do their work honestly and boldly, their unpopularity will be transient, and they will gain the respect and confidence of the country for having done this unpopular but by no means impolitic act. Then the honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey) told us that he was prevented from dealing with finance by the manner in which the dissolution was granted by His Excellency in August last. Now, it is true that the Governor did attach conditions to the granting of a dissolution, those conditions being that, besides the Loan Bill and the finance—which he specially excepted in his communication to this House—there should be no contested motions brought forward. The honorable gentleman tells us that this prevented him from dealing with finance. We have only to look in Hansard to see that in the communicated conditions imposed by His Excellency he has expressly stated that finance and the Loan Bill were excepted from the conditions. Those were the two things he might deal with; and the Governor instructed us to deal with them before dissolving; and yet the honorable gentleman tells us that he was prevented from dealing with finance by the conditions imposed by the Governor. Even supposing the conditions imposed by His Excellency had precluded him from dealing with finance, is it not clear to the mind of every honorable member that the Premier at that time had a way out of the difficulty? If he really believes that the Governor prevented him from dealing with finance, and if he was desirous of avoiding a great public danger, all he had to do was to resign. In fact, there is no doubt whatever in my mind that the terms in which the Governor's memorandum were couched consisted of a clear intimation to him that, if in his opinion the public danger was so great as might be conceived, then he ought to resign, and ought not to accept a dissolution. The Governor laid the whole responsibility upon him. The Governor actually said in his memorandum that he recognized there was a great public danger in a dissolution taking place at that time, but he understood that Ministers would accept the whole responsibility for it. Yet, after that, the honorable gentleman comes down and says we on this side of the House are to blame for the present state of affairs. The honorable gentleman has adduced the strongest reason why there should not have been a dissolution; and that reason was urged upon him at the time, inside this House, and by the public Press from one end of the colony to the other, as a reason almost insuperable why at that particular juncture Parliament should not be dissolved. If he had really cared one straw about the interests of this colony he would have resigned his office at that moment, and would have left it to another Government to deal with the question of finance. Instead of that, in the teeth of the warning of the Governor and of members of this House, he dissolved Parliament without laying before the country one word of explanation as to the position of the finances. I said that the honorable member entirely corroborated everything said by the Colonial Treasurer. He told the House that he knew it all, that a great number of members knew it from the quarterly accounts published in the Gazette, and that there was nothing new at all in this Statement, and nothing that the late Government would not have provided for. But no sooner was that said—no sooner had we got that testimony from the late Premier—than the late Colonial Treasurer, the honorable member for Wanganui, comes and tells us that there is nothing in the Statement, that the figures are grossly over-coloured, and that, instead of the state of affairs being gloomy, as admitted by the honorable member for the Thames, they are, in fact, rather satisfactory than otherwise. What he stated was that the whole position of the finances was very satisfactory. There we have those conflicting views of the matter from two gentlemen who were within three months members of the same Ministry—one Premier and the other Colonial Treasurer, and one having succeeded the other in the Treasurership. What weight can be attached to the statements of the honorable member for Wanganui when he contradicts the statement of his successor in office, and tells us that the Statement of the present

Colonial Treasurer, corroborated by the late Colonial Treasurer, has nothing in it, and is a gross misrepresentation of the actual facts? I am quite contented with the figures brought down by the present Colonial Treasurer. As to his past policy of finance I have nothing to say. I have differed very widely from him on broad principles of finance, and, unless he gives us a totally different finance from that brought down in 1877, I shall differ from him as widely still. But, as to his figures, I say that he has never brought figures down to this House that could be impugned. I believe that for accuracy of accounts he is not to be surpassed by any honorable gentleman in this House. And yet the honorable member for Wanganui gets up, without a word of argument, or without the slightest proof, and says that the honorable member for Egmont has grossly coloured the Statement which he has made. I believe that the Statement brought down by the honorable member for Egmont is a sober, accurate, and true statement of the finances of the colony at this moment, and I do not attach the slightest importance to the mere assertion made by the honorable member for Wanganui, that the honorable member for Egmont has very grossly coloured the figures for the purpose of effect. He is the last man in the world to colour figures, and I entirely believe him when he says that had it been in his power he would have brought down a Statement more encouraging to honorable gentlemen and to the country. The honorable member for Wanganui tried to divert the mind of the House from that part of the Statement which refers to the vast expenditure of public money, and the liabilities connected with the purchase of Native land. He told us that there would certainly be a loss on Native lands—a mere pecuniary loss; but that what they had to look forward to was not direct money profit, but the great question of the settlement of the North Island; and that statement was cheered rapturously by honorable members on that side of the House. His predecessor, the honorable member for the Thames, stated distinctly that there would be a large profit—a large money profit. His predecessor dropped sentiment for the moment, and applied himself to the strict monetary business. He told us there would be a money profit on these Native land transactions, and that the Colonial Treasurer was mistaken when he supposed that these millions of money spent in Native lands would not prove remunerative. The honorable member for Wanganui says that there will be a loss, but that there will be an immense gain in the settlement of the country, and that we must not regard a mere monetary loss, because indirectly it would be a great gain. I believe there will be a great loss, because I believe that we pay for these Native lands a great deal more than we shall get for them in the open market. Not only is the price paid in many cases very ill-considered and ill-estimated, but the matter is not treated as a private land transaction would be, where a man would look at a piece of land and consider well what he had to pay before he bought it. The eagerness shown in these land-purchase transactions has led to many ill-advised things. Look also to the expenses of the Land Purchase Department. They are enormous. Here is a department which, two years ago, the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) told us he was going to do away with absolutely. Last year, £10,000 was expended for salaries in the Land Purchase Department, so that it will be seen on the whole that we are paying a very high price for these lands—a much higher price than we are likely to get back for many years to come. But, admitting that the loss on these lands was not considerable—admitting that we ought not to look for a pecuniary gain upon them—is the statement correct, that the operations of the Land Purchase Department have led to the settlement of the North Island? Where, I ask, is the evidence that people have been settled on the purchased land? The cry in the North is, that there is no such land to be had for the purposes of settlement; and I say that the whole thing has been breaking down as a pecuniary transaction, and as a system of settlement of people upon the land. Then the honorable member for Wanganui tells us that the measures referred to by the Colonial Treasurer as having been found, belonging to the late Government, for providing for this deficiency, were not all their measures—that they intended to increase the Customs duties. There he comes in conflict with the late Colonial Treasurer, who tells us that the deficiency was entirely provided for. The honorable gentleman says, "Oh! you have not got all the measures. We had got a beautiful policy to develop, entirely apart from the measure you have got hold of." Then the honorable gentleman tells us that one of the measures proposed was for increasing the Customs duties. Let us look back to what the honorable gentleman did in 1878, when his policy was to abolish the Customs duties, and place the whole taxation on land, property, companies, &c. And there was that unfortunate Beer Duty Bill. What the honorable member for Wanganui did by way of a slight beginning was to throw away £100,000 a year Customs revenue—an amount which was easily collected on articles of general consumption; and then he comes down and tells us that his policy was to increase the Customs duties. He throws away £100,000 one year, and puts it on another year in consequence of a deficiency in the revenue. That is his system of financing. One of the great causes of the deficiency which has taken place is the "tinkering" with the finances by that honorable gentleman in 1878. Anything better calculated to bring about a deficiency and financial ruin could not be conceived than the finance of the honorable member for Wanganui. I criticised it at the time as a peddling policy; and the thing has turned out to be exactly as I represented it. The honorable member depended on the Land Fund for a great share of the revenue that was to be spent on ordinary purposes, while the Minister for Public Works (Mr. Macandrew) also looked to the same source for his public works expenditure. Who can forget the remarks I had the honor to make on that occasion, when I compared these two politicians to two bears climbing up the same pole, and trying to sit on the same spot on the top? I told them that the pole would break down, and I was laughed at by those honorable gentlemen. We were told that we were Jeremiahs, looking gloomily upon everything. What is the result? It has absolutely broken down. In the month of October, when the land revenue was just then beginning to show signs of slightly dropping off, the honorable gentleman came down and made his estimate of land revenue for the year. We told him it was fallacious, and that within one month from that date he would have no land revenue to depend on. What did he say? "Look at the October sales; they are keeping it up: if so, we shall have half a million in Canterbury alone." The October sales were simply owing to the Bill providing for pre-emptive rights being declared by Land Boards to be of special value, and the large amount paid in was caused by the runholders buying up the pre-emptive rights at £2 an acre, to escape the legislation with which they were threatened. I warned the honorable member for Wanganui that after October he need not look for any more land revenue. He laughed at the whole thing, and told us that we were totally incorrect, that we were going on wrong premisses, that we were drawing wrong conclusions, and that, in fact, we knew nothing about it. The revenue went down at once from hundreds of thousands to £24,000, and has never since shown any signs of revival, until within the last few weeks in Canterbury. This all shows that the honorable member brought it in a great measure on himself by his utter incompetency to deal with the finance of the country during the short time he occupied the position of Treasurer. The honorable member went on to tell us that the expenditure at the great Native meetings in the North was a good expenditure—that it was money well spent, and that, judged by the results, the meetings were cheap, even at the high price which we find they cost. That, again, is a pure assertion, which amounts to nothing more, and I do not believe it in the least. He tells us that the alliance of Rewi, which he says was gained at the Te Kopua meeting, was well worth the four or five thousand pounds spent at the meeting. How can it be shown that the alliance was worth a sixpence to us? He tells us that it has enabled the Government to dispense with a large armed force on the frontiers of Waikato. Why was it necessary to keep a large armed force on the frontier of Waikato if, as we were informed more than a year ago, peace was "at last" restored? Supposing that under ordinary circumstances it is necessary to keep a large armed force at Waikato—though I cannot see the necessity of it; I see no signs of disturbance there—the next question is, Has the alliance of Rewi removed the cause which would otherwise necessitate the presence of a large armed force at Waikato? It would not make one straw of difference whether Rewi is our friend or not. I question very much whether we have Rewi's alliance. I believe that, for his own purposes, and for the benefit of his own people, he entered into communication with the Government; but I am quite satisfied that this communication came to nothing, and if any one derived benefit it was Rewi and his people, and they alone. Are we to suppose that it need have cost four or five thousand pounds to hold that Kopua meeting? The money was squandered. There was no control over it, or attempt at economy. The money was thrown away in some channel, and we cannot find where it all went to. All we know is, that there was £2,200 spent for gifts and presents to Natives, and food, which, I presume, includes an immense quantity of rum. According to the honorable member for Parnell the meeting was a tea-meeting.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Champagne.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—They were above rum, and had nothing but champagne. The money was squandered; and all the good effects, if any, might have been obtained without any of this vast expenditure at all. It was not necessary to squander so much money in food, and drink, and presents, in order to arrive at precisely the same result as regards friendly relations between the two races. It is the waste that we object to. We object to seeing taxes placed upon the Middle Island which are exceedingly costly of collection and harassing in their incidence, and then to have the money wrung from people who can ill afford to spare it squandered upon these Native meetings, and made to serve no practical purpose and achieve no result whatever, so far as the settlement of Native difficulties is concerned. The honorable member for Wanganui went on to say that he had estimated almost precisely the amount of revenue that would be obtained; and this is how he makes that out: He over-estimated the land revenue by one and a half millions, and under-estimated the receipts to be derived from the railways—the excess on one goes to make up the deficiency on the other; and that is what he calls good finance. So long as there is a good average at the end of the year it does not matter; the one makes amends for the other. I must say, however, that that is fancy finance, and that all calculations in such finance must be upset by a crisis like that we had lately. As for the great profit on the railways, I myself am beginning to doubt very much as to whether there are such very large profits at all. I firmly believe that if the railway accounts were fairly charged, as between capital and profits, we should not see anything like large profits from the railways. For example, how is the reconstruction of railway lines paid for—the renewal of lines, the placing down of heavy steel rails for the bad rails placed on the line in the first instance? This is paid for out of borrowed money—out of loan. Surely no man conducting his own private affairs would charge that to capital instead of to profit; but it is charged by the Government to loan, and it is not accounted for in the profit or expenses of the railway. If we were to keep these accounts as an ordinary private person keeps his accounts, no great increase in railway revenue would be shown. And thus the correctness upon which the honorable gentleman plumes himself would vanish into thin air. Certainly the honorable member for Wanganui has an extraordinary idea of the finances of the colony. He tells us that there is only a deficiency of £260,000, whereas last year there was a surplus of £120,000; and yet he considers that upon the whole the finances are eminently satisfactory. That may be his idea of what is satisfactory, but it seems to me most unsatisfactory, and that no member of this House who has the slightest regard for the public interest can regard it as otherwise than an exceedingly serious matter. The honorable gentleman always harps on the point of the land revenue having fallen to a considerable extent. Well, Sir, every one who pretends to take part in the affairs of this House ought to have known that the land revenue would not keep up. It has been wrong to depend for purposes of ordinary expenditure upon the land revenue, no matter what Government may have been in office; and I say, further, that we shall never get honest finance, permanent finance, or satisfactory finance until we entirely cease to depend upon land revenue for the purposes of ordinary expenditure. That ought to be the first thing we should do—to so order our finance that for the ordinary expenses of government we should depend absolutely upon ordinary sources of revenue. You have no right whatever to touch the land revenue for such a purpose. The land of the colony is the security for the money which we have borrowed, and the land revenue belongs to the public creditor, and should not be applied to other purposes than the repayment of the loans, or the construction of other public works which may form additional security to the outside creditor. Yet the honorable member for Wanganui comes here and says that, by the mere accident of the postponement of a land sale, we lose revenue to the amount of half a million. I hope we shall hear no more of that. I hope that, when my honorable friend the honorable member for Egmont, or any other Treasurer, comes down with his financial policy for the year, he will put out of consideration, as regards the expenditure for ordinary purposes, all reliance upon the land revenue of the colony. But the honorable member for Wanganui entirely ignores the fact that, if the land revenue has fallen off, it is because of misgovernment, and that he and his late colleagues are alone to blame for it. What did they do immediately they had estimated they were to get two millions as a Land Fund? It was well known that by far the greater proportion of that sum must come from Canterbury; yet one of the first acts they did was to reserve eight hundred thousand acres of the best land in that province. How they could expect to get two millions sterling at all, I never could make out; but, supposing they had any chance of getting that sum, they went to work in the manner best calculated to make the thing absolutely impossible. The first act they did was to put a tax of $\frac{1}{4}$ d. in the pound upon the purchasers, and the next act was to reserve eight hundred thousand acres of the only land in Canterbury that would sell. Even if times had been ever so good and money ever so plentiful, they would not, after this action, have been able to realize their estimate of land revenue, because there would have been no land to be bought. Any one who has lived in Canterbury, and knows where the land is situated, must know that the land reserved was the only land that the people would have purchased, even if they had the money. But, apart from this, speculation in land could not be expected when a land-tax of $\frac{1}{4}$ d. in the pound had just been imposed, and when Ministers went about the country threatening to put on a tax of 3d., 4d., or 6d. in the pound. In such a state of things a man would be mad to buy unimproved land—it would be simply a millstone around his neck to drag him down; and therefore we see that from that time to the present there have been no land sales in Canterbury, except in the case of one or two men who had the courage to go into the back-country. That is the effect of the financing of the honorable member for Wanganui. Last year, when he came down with the finances, I was perfectly astonished that any man could be so ignorant as to the state of the country, and so ignorant as to the circumstances in which people were placed in various parts of the colony; but I am now more convinced than ever that he knows nothing of the practical operation of the finances of the colony, or the circumstances with which he has to deal. He looks at everything from a purely book-keeping point of view, and is not at all aware of how the operations of his finance will affect the colony. Before I leave the honorable gentleman I should like to say one word about a matter which affects no other person but himself. He has been taxing my honorable friend the Colonial Treasurer, and persons acting with him on this side of the House, with preventing the late Government from bringing down a Financial Statement to this House. Sir, they had every opportunity for doing so. If they pleased, they could have called the House together for the express purpose of laying before us a Financial Statement. But nothing of the kind was done. The honorable gentleman himself seems to have taken fright; for, two or three weeks before the House met, he suddenly left the Ministry. Just when the House was going to meet, and when the country was looking forward to an exposition of its finances, that honorable gentleman quitted the Ministry. Under what circumstances we do not know. The honorable member for Waikouaiti has given one version, and for me that is quite sufficient. I am not going to inquire how or why he left the Ministry. Certain statements were made public, and I may say it was with the utmost regret that I observed that such a scene as took place was ever published, to the great scandal of the colony. But whatever took place is not to the point. What I complain of is, that when that honorable gentleman came down to this House he did not on the first possible occasion explain to the House how it was that he had resigned the portfolio of Colonial Treasurer at such a critical period, and how it was he was unable any longer to perform the duty of bringing the finances of the country before the House. That was the most singular circumstance I have ever met with in my connection with public men and public affairs. The honorable gentleman sat in the House for weeks, and never once opened his mouth to explain how it was he had ceased to be Colonial Treasurer. He is now practically debarred from coming down here and lecturing us about finance, and denouncing my honorable friend for the action he has taken, by the fact that he has never yet explained to the House how it was he evaded the responsibility of making a Financial Statement last session. We have never received any explanation. I believe that throughout last session he never once addressed the House. There he sat, observing that the Colonial Treasurer floundered with the finance in this House. He seemed to be desirous that that honorable gentleman should exhibit most perfectly his utter ignorance of the public business of the colony. He never once got up and explained what took place between himself and the Premier that caused his retirement from the Ministry, and never attempted to give any information at all as to the state of public affairs. And therefore I say that he has not the slightest claim on the consideration of this House—that he has no right whatever to come down here and lecture us upon the position of the finances, or to lecture the occupants of the Treasury benches for what they have done towards bringing the state of affairs before the House and the country. I think my honorable friend the present Treasurer has done a very great deal of good to the colony by bringing down this plain, unvarnished statement of our finances. I believe, when the state of affairs is really known, it will create a great feeling throughout the country. I am satisfied that people generally have no idea whatever of what is the position of our finances. The truth is, that the colony has come to the end of its financial tether. We have been coming to it for some time past, and at last it has been reached. There is no doubt about it. And that the Statement made by the Colonial Treasurer is true there cannot be the slightest doubt, for he has said that the figures are all ready, and that he will lay tables before us to verify the statements he has made. Every thinking man will at once recognize that the colony is in a dangerous position, and every man who has anything to lose will at once feel that his attention is demanded by the condition of public affairs. I am satisfied that the honorable gentleman has done perfectly right in bringing down this Statement at the earliest possible moment, and I believe very great good will arise from it. I was rather amused at the manner in which the honorable member for Waitemata came down to the House, with that majestic impudence which is characteristic of him, and informed us that he had no confidence in anybody or anything else, except the honorable member for Waitemata. He said he supported the late Government because he thought they were the lesser evil of the two; but, generally speaking, he saw nothing in them to call for his very earnest support; that the country was going to the dogs as fast as it could, and, in fact, that it had been on that road ever since Sir Julius Vogel brought down his public works policy. In fact, the honorable member for Waitemata seemed to contemplate the position with great equanimity. He seemed to feel in a very satisfactory and comfortable state, and to think it would be all the better as soon as the colony was smashed up. Well, I cannot say any one envies him that position. I suppose we must put it down to the fact that there has been an utter absence of responsibility from his shoulders. He has been taking part in public affairs for years and years, and, after all, he finds that the only position he can take is, that he is able to criticise and find fault without being able to offer one suggestion likely to be of advantage to the country. Sir, I quite agree with the honorable gentleman that the state of affairs in which we find ourselves placed to-day is the result of the public works policy of 1870. I myself, in the House and out of the House, have never for a moment wavered from my opinion, and have never hesitated to express my opinion, that the policy introduced by Sir Julius Vogel in 1870 would sooner or later land the colony in a very grave and disastrous financial difficulty. I have never wavered in that belief. I have been opposed to that policy and to the mode of carrying it out. When I heard honorable gentlemen crowing over the success of the colony, and the enormous good which that policy had done to the country, I felt that the time would come—that all we had to do was to wait, and one of these days the Colonial Treasurer would have to come down to the House and say that the public works policy was at an end for the time being; that the bubble had burst; that there was a deficiency of a million sterling, which must be made up by the imposition of increased taxation. I entirely agree with my honorable friend that such must inevitably be the result of such a policy, administered in such a fashion as that policy was administered. I do not mean for a moment to cast any aspersions on the honorable gentleman who brought down that policy: Sir Julius Vogel is not here to answer for himself; I do not wish to blame him for bringing down that policy. I do think there was the germ of permanence in it, or the elements of great success; but I say the policy was ruined from the outset by the reckless extravagance by which it was administered, and by the manner in which it was pulled to pieces by all sections of this House. There were provincial jealousies, and all sorts of jealousies, which interfered greatly with that policy; and, instead of being a well-devised scheme, spread over ten years and carried out in a methodical manner, the whole thing was hurried on in two, or three, or four years, and absolutely destroyed. I have always been of opinion that the Vogel Government would have done far better to have put their foot down firmly in the first instance and said, "We will not allow this great policy to degenerate into a mere scramble; we will resign our seats a hundred times over rather than allow that to be done." They would have retained office, and would have been able to carry out the policy in a prudent manner. They would have turned it into a success, instead of its being to-day an entire failure. But it was not in Sir Julius Vogel's line to do that. He was more an originator than an administrator. When he had once got a scheme placed before the House it mattered little to him how it was to work. He was warned by honorable members in this House, and by people outside of it, that within a very short time it must come to this: that the expenditure of the colony would increase beyond the revenue; that, the burdens of the colony having increased altogether out of proportion to the increase of population, an enormous deficiency would have to be faced; and that a crushing burden of taxation would have to be placed upon the shoulders of the people. I agreed with the honorable member for Waitemata that such a state of things would come about; but where I differ from the honorable gentleman is this: He entirely skips over that period in the history of the colony which he has spent in improving his mind amongst the older countries of civilization. From the time when the honorable gentleman shipped from Auckland, on his voyage Home, until he took his seat again in the House, he seems to imagine that there has been an entire blank in the history of the colony. There has been nothing of the kind. I have been in the colony during that interval of time when the honorable gentleman was enjoying himself amongst the relics of antiquity. During that interval of time events took place which take the blame off the shoulders of Sir Julius Vogel's Ministry, and put it upon the shoulders of the Ministry who have just been turned out of office. We were told by the honorable member for Wanganui that when he was Colonial Treasurer he could not foresee what was coming. But others could foresee what was coming. Men who did not pretend to have any knowledge of finance at all—men who never made any claim to understand finance, but who have been observant—men watching the state of affairs, living amongst the various centres of population in the colony, and noting what was going on around them—told the honorable gentleman at that time that he must be prepared for such a state of affairs as we have had shown to us to-day. He tried to carry on the extravagant system of government of the Vogel Ministry without making any adequate provision for the expenditure, such as the Vogel Ministry invariably did. Does anybody believe for a moment that if Sir Julius Vogel had been on those benches we should have now a deficiency of £900,000 without anything in the world to show for it? If the present Colonial Treasurer had been there he would have made provision for the expenditure last year. If there had been any deficiency at all it would have been a very small one, and would have been provided for in such a way that there would be no danger whatever to the colony. Sir Julius Vogel never shrank from imposing taxation. He made taxation increase with the expenditure. I am convinced that if Sir Julius Vogel or the present Colonial Treasurer had been on those benches we should not have seen the state of affairs which now exists. It has been caused through the fault of another so-called financier, and his ignorance of the circumstances of the people he tried to rule. This is where I differ from the honorable member for Waitemata. We have often talked of these matters together, and I know that he holds the same views as I do. Of course, in his delicate position at this moment it would have been very inconvenient for him to have come down and told the whole truth; and he only told part of the truth. It would have been inconvenient for him to have said that Sir Julius Vogel was an imposition, but that an honorable gentleman who lately sat upon those benches was a greater imposition. I quite recognized the difficulty of his position. I grieved for him, for I knew that nothing would have given him greater pleasure than to show that half the blame was attributable to the honorable member for Wanganui, who, as a financier, was a failure. The real blame of the present position of affairs rests on the shoulders of those honorable gentlemen who preceded my friend the Colonial Treasurer on those benches. The honorable gentleman said—rather unfairly, I thought—that the Colonial Treasurer had denounced the finance of his predecessor. The honorable gentleman did no such thing. My honorable friend the Colonial Treasurer denounced nobody; he introduced no debatable matter in his Statement; he introduced no argument of any sort. He came down with a plain statement of figures, and told us precisely how the finance stood, without imputing blame to anybody, without making a single political allusion during the whole of his speech. He did here and there throw out a suggestion to the House that honorable members might think it their duty to inquire more closely into the details of the Native expenditure. I sincerely hope that the House will adopt that suggestion and see what it all means. I may be wrong in supposing that the honorable gentleman intended that as a hint for the House to act upon; but, if he did, that was the only thing that could bear a political interpretation in his speech. He by no means denounced the finance of his predecessors; he referred to them in no way whatever. He simply made a straightforward Statement to the House, and sat down at the very point when it might have been expected that he would have shown grounds for blaming those who had preceded him. My honorable friend was a little unfair in what he said on that point. Well, the honorable gentleman said he was not here last year, and knew nothing of what took place in this House; but he found it stated that a majority of fourteen in the House were unable to compel the Colonial Treasurer at the time to bring down a Financial Statement. There was a scene for the pencil of the artist to depict. The scene was simply this: that we, with a majority of fourteen in the House, tried our very utmost to get a Financial Statement out of the honorable gentleman; and no Financial Statement on earth could anybody get out of him. It was not a question of a majority; it was a question of absolute emptiness. You cannot squeeze blood out of a turnip; you cannot squeeze a Financial Statement out of a gentleman who has no two ideas on the subject of finance. We did all we could to assist him in every way, and to get him to deliver himself of some sort of exposition of finance; but the honorable gentleman was as innocent of finance as a child. He knew nothing about it. We brought all the pressure we could to bear. Sometimes we urged him; sometimes we stimulated and spurred

him. We gave him six weeks to get up this unfortunate Statement, and it all ended in smoke. When the honorable gentleman came down, the House was crowded. All the usual forms had been gone through for receiving the Statement. All we know is, that he mumbled out a clause from the Appropriation Act; he then sat down, and afterwards moved the adjournment of the House. That was absolutely all we got. Still, we believed that there would be a Statement in Hansard—a printed document. In fact, if I remember rightly, the honorable gentleman hinted as much—that there would be a printed Statement. When we got Hansard we found that the reporter had had to apologize for the fact that no Financial Statement whatever was delivered. That is the history of the matter. The honorable member for Waitemata was enjoying himself, reclining on his golden gondola on the canal at Venice, admiring the beauty of the scenery of Europe, when the majority of fourteen were talking away days together to try to squeeze a Financial Statement out of the honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey). I can assure the honorable gentleman that Maclise, with his best pencil, could not have made anything of that scene but a very plain painting indeed. There was no romance about it at all—nothing that I would like to see painted on the walls of this chamber. It was a miserable, melancholy scene, such as I hope never will be repeated in this House as long as responsible government exists. There was a man at the head of affairs, assuming the office of Colonial Treasurer, who was absolutely incapable of giving to the House one word of information about finance—who was unwilling or unable to give the House the slightest information on finance. The honorable gentleman then went on to say that my honorable friend the late member for Wanganui, Sir William Fox, had threatened to refuse a loan or supplies, but the honorable gentleman the member for the Thames said, "You shall grant supplies, you shall grant a loan, and we will not accept your conditions." The honorable gentleman was either dreaming, or else he has been entirely misinformed by some of those associates in whose company he sits so often. I can assure the honorable gentleman nothing of the sort took place. It is quite true the honorable member for the Thames did come and make an exhibition of himself by telling us, "You shall do this, and you shall do the other," amid the roars of laughter of this House; but, Sir, we never threatened anything of the kind. Sir, William Fox, when he was trying to get the Colonial Treasurer to give us something about finance, said: [Extract read.] The honorable gentleman then went on to show that there had been cases, or that there might be cases, in which it would be proper for an Opposition, in the situation in which we then stood, to refuse supplies. He showed that there would be a constitutional ground for doing so; but he said that, as a party, we were determined to follow the very broadest lines of the Constitution, and on no account whatever to object either to the Loan Bill or to supplies. This is a matter of history—

Opposition last year absolutely declined to get the public business in any possible form, Sir, the honorable gentleman comes and jeers at us, and tells us it was entirely not that the Loan Bill was passed and that no such Statement was made. I can assure you of nothing of the kind. We had to put the circumstance with which we were faced—namely, a Colonial Treasurer who absolutely nothing about the duties of his post, but, as to threatening him and being obliged to pass the Loan Bill by him, it was not a little coup d'état on the part of my friend, who came down, and “shalled,” “sn’ted,” and “won’ted” like a spoilt child, stir up the waning courage of his supporters.

That was the whole story, which I had never require to be mentioned again in this House. As to our passing the Loan Bill, Sir, I feel that we really took an enormous responsibility upon ourselves. I felt it at the time I expressed it at the time. On the third of that Bill I was one of the very few up in the House and denounced the proposals in the last degree reckless and unwarranted.

I felt that in doing what I did in supporting the Bill at all I was virtually betraying the interests of those whom I represented and of the colony. But that certainly was my opinion of the people at the time; and in this House who would have had the courage to oppose the Loan Bill would have had no poor chance of being returned to Parliament. Not that I cared for that, because I denounced it on the hustings, reckless borrowing of money. I stated in debate, and boldly stated, as every honorable member will recollect, that it was a recklessness, entirely unwarranted except by necessity of the occasion, as represented by honorable gentlemen who were then on those benches.

We had no option. We were compelled to pass that Loan Bill. It was not a question of a majority. Neither Sir William Fox nor any one else in this House would have got a vote to follow him into the lobby against the Bill. We had to pass it, and I was one of those to whom it was a very bitter task indeed.

There is one other point in the speech of the honorable member for Waitemata to which I like to refer, and that is the extraordinary statement he made about the Vogel Government. The honorable gentleman, I am afraid, Julius Vogel still resting very badly on his laurels. I can recollect that when Sir Vogel was in this House the passages between those two honorable gentlemen were delightful to listen to. I never knew any honorable member for Waitemata rise to such heights of satirical eloquence as he did in denouncing the Colonial Treasurer of that day, turning him into ridicule before the members of this House. I am bound to say he got a Roland for his Oliver, because Sir Vogel was apt to hit back, and he used it with very good effect. But the honorable member might leave him alone now. No one in this House had a greater objection to Sir

Julius Vogel throughout the whole of his career than I had; but I believe I shall always remember with satisfaction that from the time when he left this House I never once referred to him in a depreciatory manner, and for the simple reason that he was not here to defend himself, and that we might be judging very wrongly the motives which actuated him. And I was rather sorry to hear the honorable gentleman—ungenerously, I thought—striking an absent man—damaging the reputation of an absent man, and fighting his battles over again with one who would have fought hard enough with him had he been present, but who cannot answer his attacks. The honorable gentleman gave the House the impression that the Vogel-Atkinson Government were something like Sir Robert Walpole's Governments—that they governed this House by open and barefaced corruption; and the assertions he made on that subject were perfectly marvellous. He told us that the corruption even inside the House had reached such a point that the Government had to bring in a Bill to prevent members of Parliament from being corrupted. Then he told us that, after that, the corruption of members went on to such a dreadful extent that they had to bring in another Bill to whitewash those who had brought themselves under the penalties of the Act. Now, does the honorable member really know what the Act was which he tells us was an Act to whitewash members of this House who had brought themselves under the penalties of the law by their corrupt practices in relation to the Government? One member of the Government—the present Premier, I think—had been appointed to the Executive Council in contravention of a technicality of the Disqualification Act—absolutely nothing else—and that, too, without salary. This appointment was found on inquiry to be a violation of the technical provisions of the law, and it was quaintly proposed by Mr. Stout that the honorable gentleman should be declared a half-caste within the meaning of the law, and that would set him all right. The fact was, it was nothing in the world more than a pure technicality. We passed a little Bill through all its stages at once, and the thing was set perfectly right; and that little Bill, which we passed through all its stages at a sitting, and which was a mere form and nothing else, is the Act which the honorable gentleman tells this House was passed in order to indemnify a number of honorable gentlemen who, by their corruption, had brought themselves within the scope of the law. There is no occasion, in my mind, to make things out worse than they have been in the past. They are quite bad enough in the present to occupy all the attention we shall be able to give them. I shall conclude my remarks by saying this: that if one thing more than another could convince me that this Government ought to be left in office unmolested, and without being harassed by any premature vote of want of confidence on the part of this House, it is the statement of affairs which has been brought down by the Colonial Treasurer to-day. I say that on an occasion of this sort we ought, as far as possible—and we can do it if we choose—to lay aside the violence of party, and take into consideration the grave dangers which affect the interests of every inhabitant of the colony. I say that the position we stand in to-day is a more seriously alarming one than any in which we have stood for the last ten years or more. It is the more serious for this reason: that, although in the year 1867 or 1868 the finances were as bad as they are now, and the difficulties and burdens weighing upon the public then were even greater than they are now, at that time the country was accustomed to hardship and privation; the people were accustomed to self-denial; they had been educated by the Ministry of that day to understand what rigid economy was; and it was possible, during all those trying times, to govern the country without subjecting the people to any grievous burdens, and without giving rise to any violent disruption of the system of government. By this time the country has become debauched with borrowed money, and the people have been led by a system of extravagance, fostered by a period of unexampled prosperity, to believe that the evil day will never come. Now the evil day has come, and the people are not at all in the frame of mind to face their difficulties that they were in during the disastrous period of 1868. I say that in a new Parliament like this, when we have had such a short time to form differences of opinion on personal questions, or anything of that kind, we ought to be able to raise ourselves above party considerations, and fairly, firmly, sincerely, honestly, and straightforwardly to grasp the financial position of the day, and do our very utmost, by helping each other, by mutual co-operation and assistance, to endeavour to pull the colony out of the terrible position which my honorable friend assures us it is in.

Mr. PYKE.—We have heard a great deal during the present session respecting a waste of the time of the House and the country. I want to know who is wasting the time of the House and of the country now. There is not the slightest objection to suspend the Standing Orders and pass this Bill through all its stages to-night, if the Government are willing to do it.

Mr. HALL.—Who began it?

Mr. PYKE.—The honorable member must have a very short memory indeed if he does not remember that he and his colleagues began it. I am not going to address myself to the question. I want to draw the attention of the House and of the country to this fact: that there is no opposition to the motion before the House—that we are prepared to vote for it without one word of debate.—(Oh, oh.)—We will consent to suspend the Standing Orders, and pass the Bill through all its stages, so that the public business shall not be delayed, so that the whole matter may go to the other branch of the Legislature to-morrow, and so that the money so urgently required, according to the Statement of the Treasurer, may be obtained. If the Government will only allow this matter to proceed, it can be done to-night; and, if there be any delay, upon their heads it rests. It is they who are obstructing the business of the country—they, the gentlemen who sit on the Government benches, are obstructing their own business and the business of the country for a factious purpose. The only object they have in view is to prolong this debate so that their own proposal may not receive the assent of the House to-night, so that they may keep the thing going until next Friday, in order to ransack the pigeon-holes and see if they can find something there to bring down to the House. Why, Sir, I am greatly disappointed. I came down here to-night expecting to hear some great disclosures, expecting to hear all the great scandals which it was alleged would be exposed. Where are the great disclosures? What has it all amounted to? It amounts to this: A statement from the Treasurer, supported afterwards by the Premier, that the members of this House had never studied the public accounts, and therefore did not know how far the public revenue was in arrears. Why, Sir, I venture to say that there are not ten men in this House who did not know as much as we were told to-night before the Treasurer got up. Speaking with all due respect to parliamentary authority, I think it was somewhat an impertinence to make use of such a remark as that respecting the representatives of the people. I beg to inform the honorable gentlemen who sit on those benches that the representatives of the people know as much about the public accounts as they do, or perhaps a little more, after all their ransacking. I am not at all surprised at the statements which have been made. I believe they are exaggerated and highly coloured. It is only natural that they should be so. But to tell me that not six members of this House were aware of the dreadful state of the finances is to make one of the most absurd statements I ever heard within the walls of the House. Any man who can read, or who knows the difference between the figure 1 and the figure 9, must surely have been able to understand them. The Government have disclosed nothing new. They have had more than a week; they have ransacked the pigeon-holes: what have they found out? Where are these grave scandals? Why, if they were twelve months in office they would find no grave scandals. They would only find that they have discovered a mare's-nest and nothing else. I say to Ministers now, Why don't you get on with your business? We won't obstruct you. We'll pass your Bill through all its stages to-night if you wish us to do it; but if you persist in talking against time, as you are doing now, the country shall know that it is the Government and their supporters who are obstructing the business, and not the members of the Opposition.

Mr. TURNBULL.—I cannot allow this debate to close without making a few remarks on the Statement of the Colonial Treasurer. Whatever struggles there may be between the two sides of the House to obtain possession of the Government benches, it is to my mind a matter of far greater importance that the credit of the colony should be maintained; and it struck me as a very serious matter that a gentleman to whom I have always listened with the greatest respect and attention should make a Statement in this House so much calculated to depreciate our credit as the Statement of the Colonial Treasurer. I was sorry to observe, when the honorable gentleman made that Statement, that he did not, with that honesty which usually characterizes his statements, refer to what was unquestionably the great cause of the deficiency in the revenue last year. And when he pointed out that nearly a million of money would be required to meet that deficiency he ought to have shown that, as it was, that was quite within the reach of the people of the colony. All those who heard the Statement of the honorable member for Wanganui (Mr. Ballance) last year, must be aware that he took credit for a very large sum which was expected to be derived from the sale of the Waimate Plains; and the non-receipt of that money largely accounts for the deficiency. A great deal has been said about the unwisdom of reserving from sale a large amount of land in Canterbury. I understood the honorable member for Geraldine to say that 800,000 acres in that province had been reserved from sale; but I do not regard this as a deplorable state of things, for it must be borne in mind that we have preserved the public estate to that extent. Whether the land is of the quality stated or not, we have reserved more than enough to cover the loan asked for. The increased value given to this land by the formation of the railways will be quite equal to the amount of the loan. I say that this statement as to the deficiency is one that ought not to have been made unless it had been plainly shown how easily the deficiency could be covered. The Treasurer must be aware—and I say this with all respect—that he is himself to a large extent responsible for the deficiency. He was a member of the Government which introduced this system of subsidies. The honorable gentleman says there is a deficiency of £900,000. I am not prepared to admit that until I see the printed statement of accounts; but I may point out that there are two ways of meeting the deficiency—either by increasing the taxation or by reducing the expenditure. Now, I apprehend that without increasing the taxation such a reduction could be made in the estimates as would bring them quite within the limit of our means. I believe I am correct in saying that the subsidies to local bodies amount to £250,000.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—£500,000.

Mr. TURNBULL.—Very well; there is one very large item which could be considerably reduced; and I believe the Native expenditure could also be largely reduced. Then, again, the Statement was unfair in this respect: The estimate of revenue for the year was taken far lower than it need be. The honorable gentleman said he expected to receive from taxation £1,500,000; for services rendered, £1,300,000; and he reduced the revenue from the Land Fund to £380,000. Now, I think that, as the railways are made, the Land Fund will increase so much as to bring the revenue something nearer the mark. I should really like to hear from the Colonial Treasurer that the position of the colony is not so bad as he makes out. With his eminent ability, I am sure he could as easily show a surplus if he wished to do so.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—Sir, it seems to me that throughout the Treasurer's Statement there runs an apparent wish to damage the late Ministry. The honorable gentleman made his Statement so unnecessarily gloomy that, if it should be telegraphed Home, as it may be, it would very materially interfere with the raising of the loan. I am sure the honorable gentleman would not wish it to have that effect; but I do not see that it can have any other than a very damaging effect upon the colony. Now, I wish to prove to the House—and I think the honorable gentleman himself will acknowledge the correctness of the statement—that there is no real cause for alarm, or for the grave censure which he cast on the late Government. I understand that one of the most grave charges against the late Government is that no Financial Statement has been made for fifteen months. Now, there was nothing I regretted more than that no Financial Statement was made before the want-of-confidence motion came on for discussion last session. I will go further, and say that I think it was a cruel wrong to the country to bring on a want-of-confidence motion before the Government had had an opportunity of showing the position of the finances of the colony. It was not a question with me who should occupy those benches; for I regard that as a small matter compared with the necessity of putting before the people of the colony a statement of the financial position in such a manner that they could understand it. The honorable gentleman at the head of the Government was not in the House last session, when the present Government party was led by Sir William Fox, who never gave the Government of the day an opportunity to come down with a Financial Statement; and, looking at the matter as a colonist who would like to see the credit of the colony stand high in the Home-country, I say that I regret nothing so much as the fact that last session, with indecent haste, and solely, as it seemed to me, from a desire to occupy the Government benches, those gentlemen refused to allow a statement of the finances to be placed before the country. The honorable gentleman says that we are £80,000 short of the estimate of last year. That is quite true. I think the Treasurer admits that that is the amount we should be short if the land-tax had been collected. Now, I will ask if the late Government can be accused of having over-estimated the income when, in the month of July of last year when they made their Statement, everything was coulour de rose, and the land revenue was coming in in an almost extraordinary manner. The present Colonial Treasurer never objected to the estimate of the land revenue. On the contrary, he himself expected that there would be a very large revenue from the sale of the Waimate Plains.

Major ATKINSON.—No.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—To prove that the honorable gentleman did, it is sufficient to mention that he objected to any portion of the usual 20 per cent. being taken from the receipts from land sales in the Patca District for railway purposes. He said, This is the first time the country is likely to derive any benefit from the land sales; and he protested against the deduction.

That shows that he expected to get a considerable amount from the land sales in the district; and, when he expected it, was the Colonial Treasurer of the time wrong in expecting it? Well, Sir, there was £80,000 short; and that, considering the depression which last year existed all over the colony, was a very small amount indeed. Now we come to the present session. I understand from my honorable friend the late Minister for Public Works that the estimates on which the Colonial Treasurer relies as showing the expenditure of the department are estimates which were furnished by the department, which had not been yet sanctioned by the Minister, and which the Minister was very likely to cut down considerably. The honorable gentleman knows very well that the estimates of the Under Secretary of a department are estimates that would cover the whole expenditure that he would wish to see incurred; but the Minister of the day, having regard to the finances of the country, is bound to cut them down if possible. If it is the case that they can be cut down, that will go largely to decrease the deficit of £98,000. I have never taken a very sanguine view of the amount to be derived from the land revenue, and I think it is very likely the late Treasurer did rather over-estimate the amount to be derived from that source. I do not touch upon the expenditure, because we cannot go into the anticipated expenditure for the present year until we have the estimates before us, when we shall have to consider them very carefully, and say what ought to be the expenditure—not merely accept what the Under Secretaries may propose. The Colonial Treasurer dwelt very strongly on the fact of the late Minister for Public Works anticipating the loan. He said it was a very wrong thing, and also that it was unsound, and showed a reckless mode of action. But, Sir, I ask, has this never been done before, when the honorable gentleman was himself on those benches in former days? Of course it has been. Take the four-million loan. When Sir Julius Vogel went Home to raise that loan, the honorable gentleman was his colleague. He (Sir Julius Vogel) said he must have the money, for the colony was in a "mess." Those are the words, and they can be seen in the Blue Books now. The money was to be raised at all hazards, and Sir Julius Vogel went to the Rothschilds, and, in effect, got them to back the bill, so as to raise the money. And yet now the Colonial Treasurer denounces the late Minister for Public Works for anticipating the loan. That has always been done by this House. We never yet waited for the money to be raised before we contracted for works; and my honorable friend should be the last to denounce the late Minister for Public Works, when he was himself a party to a very similar transaction.

Major ATKINSON.—I was not.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—My honorable friend was a member of the Ministry, although he was not Treasurer at the time. And now allow me to say a few words in conclusion; for I am not going to take up the time of the House. I agree with my honorable friend near me that it is far too grave a question to use it for a display of oratorical language or of chaff. I have to charge the Colonial Treasurer with having brought about this state of things. In July, 1877, he stated that his finance was a far-seeing and safe finance. He then said there would be no necessity for increasing taxation; that his finance was far-seeing and safe. Sir, his finance was this: that he partly covered the expenditure by Treasury bills. That was the honorable gentleman's finance. He gave subsidies to the Road Boards and to the counties that never could have been paid out of the ordinary revenue without the issue of Treasury bills. That was no safe finance; and I say that, had the House not seized the Land Fund in 1877, so far from there being a deficiency of only £80,000, we should have had a deficit of £700,000. And yet the honorable member called his finance far-seeing and safe. And now he is Colonial Treasurer—with great honesty of purpose, we all agree; but are his antecedents in finance such that we can trust him to bring our finances into a proper position? He objected to the putting-on of taxation, and he issued Treasury bills. Taking his own figures, we are landed this year in a deficit of £900,000. What did the late Government do to make that deficit? All they did was to strike off some tea and sugar duties, which would have amounted to about £60,000 for the last half-year, and they put on a land-tax that made up nearly a like amount; so that, at the most, all the late Government did in the way of reducing the revenue would have been not more than £10,000 or £20,000, if they had collected the land-tax. Wherein, then, are the former Treasurer (Mr. Ballance) or the late Treasurer (Sir G. Grey) responsible for the deficit this year? I want the honorable gentleman to show us that. Had the Opposition allowed the Financial Statement to be made at the beginning of July, last session, the country would have seen then what has been foretold to the honorable gentleman years ago by the honorable member for Bruce and others—that his system of finance would end one day in a deficit that would astonish the people. And it has come now. His system of finance never met the difficulty in the face. He put forth to the House that he was going to get an income out of land revenue that never came, and he tided the difficulty over by issuing Treasury bills. If the honorable gentleman had done what he was pressed to do—if he had said, "We cannot pay these subsidies out of ordinary revenue; we must not issue Treasury bills in anticipation of land revenue;" or had he put on taxation two or three years ago, we should never have been landed in the difficulty in which we now find ourselves. But, Sir, I agree with the honorable member for Waitemata that, if this House can be got to meet fairly in the face our financial position, and to say that this extravagant expenditure on public works which are not reproductive shall cease, and, I also say, if it puts a stop to the purchase of Native land, which I do not believe will be reproductive, the financial difficulty of the present time would not be an unmixed evil. I think a country is somewhat the same as an individual: until it sees that it is short of money, it cannot find out where it can retrench. Having said that I believe we are in a grave position, I trust the finances of the country will be dealt with seriously by honorable members, as such a very important question deserves to be dealt with, for the good of the country, and with less regard as to who shall occupy the Treasury benches.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, I am very sorry to trouble the House at this late hour, but I must, in self-defence, say a few words. One honorable gentleman, during the recess—I need not mention his name—told his constituents that he always voted with the Government during last session. This was a matter of very great surprise to the person who heard him speak, because he was known to be a staunch Oppositionist. When he was asked how this came about, he said, "Oh! half the Government always go into one lobby and the other half into another, and as there are only two lobbies I am always obliged to vote with the Government." It appears to me that that is exactly the position which the Opposition have taken up to-night in regard to the finances. They must be right, because half declare there is no deficit, and that it is quite unreasonable to think the matter at all serious; while the other half declare there is a terrible deficit, and we must look it fairly in the face. I do not know how we are to deal with these honorable gentlemen. However, as the hour is late, perhaps we had better put off the discussion to a more convenient time. But I must say this: that, if they really want to discuss the finances as a serious matter, as the honorable member for Akaroa does, I would ask them—and especially that honorable gentleman—to be more exact in their facts. I would recommend to that honorable gentleman a course of light reading, in order to prepare himself for the task; and I would ask him to glance his eye over my Financial Statements, and then he will see that everything he has stated to-night in regard to myself and my finance, and my action about the loan, is absolutely incorrect. I shall be quite prepared to meet him—not to-night, but at a more convenient period, and I ask honorable gentlemen to suspend judgment in the meantime. One thing I preached from the very beginning—from the time when I first took the Treasury in 1875—was the absolute necessity for mapping out carefully beforehand the amount of money we had to spend, and the amount of money we ought to spend every year. All the time I was in the Treasury, for three years, I carefully adhered to this plan, and the Government always distinctly stated the amount it would expend in every case. So much for that statement of the honorable gentleman. Then, with regard to his statement of the Government of which I was a member anticipating the four-million loan: that statement was a suppression of the truth, or rather it was an insinuation of half a truth. The honorable gentleman knows very well that a large portion of the four-million loan was undoubtedly anticipated; but that was done before I joined the Government, and I had nothing whatever to do with it. The honorable gentleman knows perfectly well that contracts had been entered into, and liabilities incurred, before I joined the Ministry. Such a thing never occurred after I joined; and I will tell the House this: that during the whole time I was in office the only borrowing power we asked for was to the extent of about £1,300,000, including Treasury bills; and when I quitted office I left in the Treasury £1,000,000 of that money, and the Treasury bills were used in assisting Auckland, Wellington, and Westland. Honorable members can see, from that, how accurate the statement of the honorable gentleman was. I never stated that taxation was not required. What I said was, that at that particular time, 1877, while our revenue was equal to our expenditure, while our railways were in an incomplete state, while we did not know what our requirements were, and we knew that our liabilities were enormous, it was unwise, with the enormous amount of administration which the change in our Constitution had thrown on the Government, to start a new system of taxation. That was the position I took up. Let me say one word with regard to what the honorable member said about the estimated expenditure. He tells the House that these estimates were left by the late Government in a very incomplete state as furnished by the Under Secretaries—that Ministers did not revise them—and he was assured by the late Minister for Public Works that they would have been greatly cut down. I am bound to accept that as far as it goes; but all I can say is that, if that was the practice pursued by the late Government, it was exceedingly unfair to the Treasurer, and is a thing that was never done before. The invariable rule with regard to the estimates is this: The Treasurer, when the financial year comes round, calls upon each department to supply him with the estimates of the department. The Under Secretaries prepare these estimates; they go through them with the Minister for the department, and the estimates are then sent to the Treasurer, who looks through them, and if he is dissatisfied he goes to each Minister of the department. I always saw every Minister upon his particular estimates. After that process has been gone through they are referred to the Cabinet, and finally revised. In all the Governments with which I have been connected, Ministers always revised them before sending them to the Treasury. I may say, further, that they had been, I am informed, considerably added to since the late Colonial Treasurer (Mr. Ballance) went out of office. In what I said this evening regarding the estimates, I guarded against committing myself or the late Government to them; but I pointed out this significant fact, that the actual expenditure last year was £1,000,000, and that the estimates of expenditure which I submitted for consideration amounted to only £3,970,000. This was considerably under the actual expenditure of last year, and I pointed out that the expenditure, instead of having decreased year by year, had gradually increased. Therefore I should have been untrue to my duty had I represented to the House that I thought it was possible to make any great reduction in this expenditure. I said I thought it was not, and I think so now. If we are prepared to follow the present system, I prophesy that the estimates, before they go through this House, will be increased rather than diminished. Then, with regard to the deficit: it is very easy for honorable gentlemen, with cheerful dispositions and without responsibility, to talk in an airy way about this deficit, but if the honorable member for Wanganui (Mr. Ballance) were on these benches he would never give utterance to the speech he has given utterance to to-night. When I came down here to-night I came with a full sense of the responsibility that rested upon me. I knew that the statement I was going to make was damaging to our credit, and I should have been exceedingly glad to escape from making it, if I could; but I had a duty to perform to this House and to the country. I went carefully through the estimates of revenue, with the view of increasing them, and I am afraid I put several items down for larger amounts than will probably be received; it is possible that I may be wrong in this expectation, and I hope I am. But the fact remains that even the late Colonial Treasurer admits the deficit, but apparently thinks so lightly of it as to speak of it as nothing—as being only a small amount of £500,000 or £600,000. To my mind it shows a most terrible lack of due appreciation of the difficulties of our situation. The honorable gentleman may have some grand scheme, and I hope he will enlighten us; but I have given facts and figures which honorable gentlemen can examine for themselves. I may state that the Customs revenue for the last quarter amounted to £306,000. My estimate for the full year is £1,200,000, and I venture to think, after some little consideration of the subject, that the revenue of this quarter is the largest that will be received during the year. Honorable gentlemen can see from this how much the deficit will be reduced thereby. Then, with regard to the Land Fund, I have estimated that at £388,000. The Land Fund for last quarter was £41,000. Whether honorable gentlemen think that is an under-estimate or not, of course I cannot tell; but, at any rate, I put it down at what I think is the highest amount I am justified in submitting to the House. On the other hand, I submitted the estimates of the late Government, and I showed that by them there was a deficit of over £600,000, and by the other estimates a deficit of some £900,000; and I fear my estimates will not be shaken. Just one word with regard to the statement of the late Minister for Public Works. The late Colonial Treasurer (Mr. Ballance), also upon the authority of the late Minister for Public Works, stated that the figures I had submitted to meet the requirements of the department, showing what would be spent out of the Public Works Fund, were entirely erroneous, and that not more than £100,000 per month would be spent by the Minister for Public Works.

Mr. MACANDREW.—No; not the requirements of the department. I understood that the figures sanctioned by the late Government were what the honorable member was talking about. I understood him to say that the late Government had entered into contracts which would require two millions of money to meet them before June. That was the statement I was referring to. I was utterly amazed at that statement; it took the breath out of me. I cannot conceive how such a statement could be made.

Major ATKINSON.—That is exactly what I meant by "the department." I meant that the department had entered into contracts for that amount. The honorable gentleman says he is amazed; but I am not surprised, seeing the way I found these matters in the offices; for I found that the Public Works Department goes on its own way rejoicing, and apparently considers that the duty of the Treasury is simply to provide any amount of money it thinks proper to ask for. The first thing I did when I came into office was to send for the Secretary to the Treasury—a gentleman thoroughly competent for his work—and I asked him what were the payments from the Public Works Fund that we should be required to make for the next two or three months, and he said, "I cannot tell you." I said, "Do you not know what the Public Works Department wants?" He said, "No; we do not get anything from the Public Works Department until they send in their vouchers." I said, "Is not that rather peculiar?" He said, "It is; but they appear to consider it unnecessary to give the Treasury any intimation of contracts entered into until the money is required." I thereupon directed that an estimate should be obtained from the Public Works Department as to the actual amount of money month by month that we should be required to pay. I now hold that estimate in my hands, showing the estimated amount required during the financial year 1879–80 to meet the actual liabilities incurred to the 31st December, 1879. This estimate was handed to me by the Under Secretary to the honorable gentleman (Mr. Knowles), and is signed by Mr. W. A. Thomas, the Accountant to the Public Works Department. I have always found the permanent officers of the department to be certainly reliable. Now, the honorable gentleman said that there is no one month in which we shall have to pay more than £100,000. We have that on the authority of the late Colonial Treasurer (Mr. Ballance). Well, in this document which I hold in my hand the Public Works Department say that in the month of October they will want £163,000; during the month of November, £170,000; and during the month of December, £182,000. The total estimate of what will be required between the 10th October and the 31st December, 1879, is £516,000. Of course, if there is any inaccuracy in that return, at any rate it does not rest with me. When I get an official statement from a public office I am bound to state it to the House; and, if I make a misuse of it, it is quite clear that the House will call me to account. But until it is proved to the contrary this House will accept the statement furnished by the permanent officers of the department—the Accountant and Under Secretary—rather than the recollection of the Minister for Public Works, however capable he may be. Then, with regard to cutting off the subsidies. Some honorable gentlemen seem to think that we are going to get over the difficulty and do away with a considerable deficit by doing away with the subsidies. But it is quite impossible to cut off the subsidies this year, whatever we may do afterwards, because there is no doubt at all that they are practically spent. We have permitted the County Councils and Road Boards to make their finance this year upon those subsidies; and therefore it is quite clear that, whatever we may do afterwards, we cannot cut them off this year. I am prepared to argue in favour of those subsidies. I believe in them thoroughly—that they are sound in principle, and can be defended upon principle. No doubt there is a difference of opinion on the subject, and when the proper time comes we will discuss it. Sir, I will not trouble the House further than to say that the remarks of the honorable member (Mr. Pyke) are hardly to the point. The debate, I think, has been conducted with some advantage. Certainly, Sir, the debate did not rise from anything upon our side of the House—certainly not, Sir; and, whatever may be the opinion of the honorable member for Akaroa in regard to the general tone of the Statement which I had the honor to submit to-night, I endeavoured, to the best of my ability, to guard myself against putting blame on any one. I made it perfectly impersonal. Undoubtedly blame is attachable to some persons for our present financial position. I am informed by honorable members opposite that a large portion of the blame attaches to me. If the honorable gentlemen are not culpable in this matter, nothing that I said could make them blamable; and, if I was responsible, then any colouring was against myself. But I endeavoured, and stated so distinctly, to throw no blame on anybody—to leave that for future consideration, as also to leave for future consideration the means of dealing with the state of our finances which I unfortunately had to reveal to this House. I beg to move, That the Standing Orders be suspended for the purpose of introducing and passing through all its stages a Bill to amend "The Public Revenues Act, 1878."

Bill introduced, and read a first, a second, and a third time.

Mr. HALL. — I should now like to know whether the House wishes to go further to-night. I beg to move, That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SHEEHAN. — I hope the honorable gentleman will not break faith. His motion is distinctly breaking faith. We consented to this Bill being put through on the distinct understanding that No. 1 would afterwards be gone on with. I hope the honorable member will not break faith.

Mr. SPEAKER. — According to the Standing Orders, no new business can be taken after half-past twelve o'clock.

Mr. SHEEHAN. — There was a distinct understanding that No. 1 would be taken after this Bill was disposed of. I hope the Hon. the Premier will not break faith in the matter.

Mr. HALL. — I do not think the honorable gentleman will, when he has sat in the House with me somewhat longer, find that he has occasion to ask me not to break faith. There was certainly an understanding that we should go back to No. 1; but there was no understanding that we should continue to sit till five or six in the morning. I appeal to every impartial member on the other side whether there was such an understanding.

Mr. SHEEHAN. — Perhaps, Sir, you might read what the Order of the House was.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Order of the House, and ruled that no new business could be proceeded with after half-past twelve a.m.

Mr. PYKE. — I would like to ask the Hon. the Premier whether he will put that Bill first when the House next assembles. Will he keep faith by bringing that Bill on first?

Mr. HALL. — I will say this: that we are anxious to go on with the business of the country; and, if honorable members are at all reasonable, there is no reason why there should be any loss of time. Our conduct has been very much misrepresented. We claim the opportunity—which need occupy very little time—of placing our policy before the House and the country. If honorable gentlemen will agree to give us that opportunity, we will take their want-of-confidence motion as the first Order of the day upon the earliest date they can reasonably expect. This is a fair offer. If they will not accept that offer, they cannot force us and they shall not force us to take it earlier.

Mr. HISLOP. — I submit, Sir, that the Order, having been called upon, cannot be considered as being new business. Business which has already been considered by the House during the day, and has been postponed in order that another matter may be considered, with the express understanding that it will be taken up again so soon as the intervening matter has been disposed of, cannot be regarded as new business. It has been usual in past sessions to take Orders of the day—a great number of them—and postpone them for the express purpose of taking them up after half-past twelve. I submit that when business has been actually called on, and an Order has been made by the House with regard to it, it should not be treated as new business.

Mr. SPEAKER. — The Order was made supposing that the Bill which it made way for would be disposed of early in the evening. It was never supposed that it would come on at so late an hour. It is clearly new business, and it is contrary to the Standing Orders to bring it on for consideration now.

Mr. PYKE. — Sir, I should like to ask a question of the Premier. The Electoral Bill is one of grave importance, and I wish to know from the leader of the Government when he will bring that Bill up for consideration and discussion. That is all I wish to ask him.

Mr. HALL. — I really cannot fix a date at which the Bill shall be brought up. It is not right that such a question should be put to me, and that an answer should be demanded at once. I entirely deny the right of the honorable member to expect me to answer that question at once. I have sat many years in Parliament, and have never seen any precedent for such a thing. I tell the honorable gentleman that he will have no good reason to complain of any delay on the part of the Government. We are only too anxious to bring the Bills forward, and to get them disposed of.

Mr. READER WOOD. — I apprehend, Sir, that the rules of the House will settle this question. Leave to introduce Bills must always take precedence of other business.

Mr. HISLOP.—I should like to ask the honorable gentleman whether he intends the motion of want of confidence to go on. I am sorry the honorable gentleman has denied the right of a majority of this House to express their opinion with regard to whether the Government of which he is the head has any right to sit upon those benches. If the honorable gentleman does take up that position, I can only say this: that, if there are only five persons with me, the Government shall get no supplies while they adopt such a position as they seem now to be adopting. Such a position has never previously been heard of in any country in which constitutional government has been adopted. As a person who has lived in New Zealand pretty well all his life, I feel degraded when I find the head of the Government rising to make such a statement to this House as has been made to-night. I only hope that the honorable gentlemen, for the sake of responsible government, for the purpose of showing us on this side of the House that there is some sincerity in the lectures read to us by members on the other side of the House as to what is constitutional and proper under our form of government, will themselves act constitutionally now, and allow the motion to be brought forward. I have not spoken on this question before, but I must say I have been tempted to rise and answer the statements which have been made. As to there being any parallelism whatever between what has taken place now and what took place in 1877, no person who has the slightest knowledge of the history of the colony can fail to recognize that there is no parallel between the circumstances of the two occasions.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think that on the motion for adjournment a question of no-confidence in the Ministry can be discussed.

Mr. HISLOP.—I do not intend to discuss it, Sir. What I wish to discuss is the position which the Government has taken up with regard to that motion; and I submit that I have—

Mr. SPEAKER.—That would be bringing the motion into consideration.

Mr. HISLOP.—I apprehend not, Sir. What I wish to discuss is simply this: the position the Government have taken up in regard to the order of business, as indicated by the Premier to-night. The Premier said that he would take up a certain line, and it is his conduct in making that statement which I am discussing. That is my only reason for rising. I cannot allow such a statement as that which he has made to be made in this House without entering my protest, although I am a young member. With regard to what took place in 1877, honorable members will recollect that immediately the new Government took their seats on those benches a want-of-confidence motion was placed on the Order Paper. The Ministry at once gave every facility for discussing it, and it was discussed and decided upon. It was disposed of, being negatived by the casting vote of the Speaker, and then, immediately after that motion had been rejected, another want-of-confidence motion was brought forward. There was a great difference between the positions of the respective Ministries. The Ministry who were turned out of office by Sir George Grey in 1877, were turned out for two reasons: one was—

Mr. WHITAKER.—I should like to ask your ruling, Sir, as a matter of order, whether debatable matter can be introduced in remarks made under the circumstances under which the honorable member for Waitaki is speaking, and, if so, whether any other member of the House will be in order in speaking in reply to him. I have not the slightest objection to his proceeding, so long as I have an opportunity of replying to him.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The same privilege will be accorded you as is accorded to any other member of the House. I can only say that it is laid down that under cover of a motion for adjournment it is not proper to introduce matters that are set down on the Order Paper for consideration, such as the present notice of no-confidence. When I interrupted the honorable member for Waitaki he was taking a course which would have brought that motion into consideration.

Mr. HISLOP.—Yes, Sir, perhaps I was; but I am now avoiding that. I was proceeding to say that when the Atkinson Ministry were turned out of office, in 1877, there were two reasons why they were turned out. The first was maladministration; and the second was their policy, or, rather, their want of any policy. The Ministry which came into office met with great opposition by reason of the fact that they were supposed to favour Separation, and a majority of the House was anxious to turn them out before their policy had been declared. A great many gentlemen said they would not vote with any Ministry that was headed by Sir George Grey, because he was a supporter of Separation; but afterwards, when the policy was brought down, and it was seen that Sir George Grey had no idea of proposing Separation, a number of members who were previously prepared to vote against him said that they were satisfied with the policy, and had no objection to the Ministry continuing in office. The honorable member for Egmont thereupon withdrew from further opposition. I submit there is a distinct difference between the position of the then Ministry and the position taken up by the Ministry at the present time. I believe there is one mode of getting quit of the honorable gentlemen on the Treasury benches, in spite of all the forms of the House being used to keep them in office; and, if they continue to defy constitutional usage, that course will be resorted to, although it will be an everlasting disgrace to the House and the colony. However, I hope that persons who, like the honorable member for Avon, have lectured this House upon all sorts of subjects, setting up a high standard of political morality, especially in reference to constitutionalism, will consider what they are doing, and not be instrumental in bringing about that which will be a disgrace to the colony.

Mr. MACANDREW.—It seems to me, Sir, that we must admit we, in our innocence, have been outflanked on this occasion. It would be better to submit now; but we shall be wiser next time. It is getting late, and I would suggest an adjournment. No doubt we shall get this motion on to-morrow.

Mr. WHITAKER. — I think the honorable gentleman who has just sat down has very wisely come to the rescue, and I hope we shall now adjourn. But I cannot refrain from saying a few words with regard to the remarks which have fallen from the honorable member for Waitaki (Mr. Hislop). I am sorry he lost his temper, because, although I have not had much experience in this House, I feel pretty sure that members who lose their temper will not receive very great consideration at the hands of the House. When you, Sir, gave your ruling that this was a new matter, and could not be taken after half-past twelve, that should have been final. I have heard that there is such a device in parliamentary warfare as "stone-walling," but this is the first time I have heard stone-walling proposed in this House, and I cannot let the opportunity go by of warning honorable gentlemen on the other side that they had better not proceed to that extremity. The temper of the House is such that it will not stand such proceedings, and the honorable member for Waitaki may be perfectly certain that many persons who sympathize with his party will desert that party if anything of that kind is tried. As to the reasons of the Premier for declining to discuss this want-of-confidence motion at present, it seems to me that they are good. The reasons are these: Our party has never ceased, from the time the late Government attempted to carry certain liberal measures into effect, to be charged with having a desire to resist those measures. Throughout the debate on the late want-of-confidence motion we were sneered at, taunted, and abused on this very point, and were called Conservatives—whatever that may mean in this colony—and we were told that, while we had Liberalism on our lips, our hearts were not sincere; that if we came into office we should never attempt to carry out liberal measures. Now, we say there are persons on this side of the House who are equally liberal with those on the other side. I say that we have a right to practically refute these accusations by showing the country that we really do mean to carry liberal measures, by bringing them before the country before the Government are compelled to vacate those benches. It is a duty that we owe to ourselves, and to our constituents, to show that we will support these liberal measures. We are not blindly to follow the leader of the Opposition in this matter. They have no right to compel us to consider a motion of want of confidence until such time as we have cleared ourselves from the accusations which the honorable member for Waitaki and others have brought against us from day to day. We ask nothing that is unreasonable or unconstitutional. In the House of Commons, when a new Government have come into power, no matter how small may be their majority, they have always been allowed to place their policy before the House and the country. I am speaking from positive knowledge of constitutional law, and I say unhesitatingly that that is the case. If any honorable gentleman disputes my statement I can easily produce authorities which will prove its accuracy. I say, unhesitatingly, that that has been the invariable practice in the House of Commons. We are asking nothing more or less than the constitutional right of telling the country what we mean to do. This cannot occupy more than four or five days. When that is done, we have the full assurance of the Premier that he will give the honorable member an opportunity of bringing forward his motion of no-confidence. I cannot but think it unfair and unconstitutional to attempt to remove the Government from those benches until they have had an opportunity of showing the country what they really intend to do, and I am perfectly certain that honorable members will agree that we have a right to clear our characters before this House and before the country from the imputations that have been cast upon them. When we have done that, let the motion of want of confidence be brought forward. We will accept the verdict of the House upon it, and, if defeated, we will cheerfully submit to that defeat.

The House adjourned at twenty minutes past one o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Wednesday, 15th October, 1879.

First Reading—Public Revenues Bill.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

New Plymouth Gas Company Bill.

PUBLIC REVENUES BILL.

This Bill was received by message from the House of Representatives, and read a first time.

The Hon. Mr. WHITAKER. — Sir, I now move that this Bill be read a second time. As I informed the Council yesterday, it is necessary that a certain amount of money should be raised for the purpose of defraying the current expenditure of the Government. Several modes of raising the money were suggested; but the Government came to the conclusion that the easiest way would be to alter the sum of £400,000 in the Public Revenues Bill to £600,000, and to make it a temporary measure. If we were to pass a Debenture Bill, it would require a great many provisions similar to those contained in the Public Revenues Act. This Bill gives the Government power to borrow on deficiency bills the sum of £200,000, in addition to the £400,000. Provision is made that the £200,000 is to be raised during the present session, and that the Bill shall remain in force during that time only, leaving the whole question as to the way in which the finances are to be dealt with for future consideration. This Bill was indispensable, otherwise the payments by the Government would be stopped. If the Council pass this Bill, the next measure I shall bring down will be a Bill giving authority to spend the money. Therefore I shall ask the Council to meet again to-morrow, at half-past seven, for the purpose of passing a Bill giving authority for spending the money which it is proposed to raise by this Bill.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—I will support the honorable gentleman in passing this Bill, as I am persuaded that such a measure is necessary for the public service. Whether or not this is the best mode of providing temporarily for the requirements of the State I by no means feel certain; but that the necessity exists for some such measure I think it my duty to bear witness. The other branch of the Legislature having practically agreed to pass the Bill without discussion, I can hardly see that it would be very well worth our while to consider whether this is or is not the best mode of providing for the public service. The honorable and learned gentleman has disappointed me in not bringing before this Council, in what I believe it is usual to call a "concrete form," some of those vague charges of extravagance that have been levelled in another place, and in the Press of the colony, against the Government of which I was a member. I feel sure that the more the financial transactions of the late Government are looked into the better they will bear scrutiny, and the less ground there will appear to be for the assertions so frequently made. It is true there has been a deficiency in the public revenue—chiefly in consequence of having depended so much on the land revenue. I did not attempt to disguise that this would require to be supplemented by fresh taxation, at the time of the passing of the Appropriation Bill. There is £300,000 short, undoubtedly, in the accounts for the next financial year, compared with any estimate we could make of land revenue and ordinary revenue and the expenditure of the country. Four months have elapsed without any provision being made, and that may be assumed to add another £100,000, and it is quite possible that there may be another £100,000 to be provided for through the failure of the land sales. The question which Parliament must consider this session will be, whether it will decrease the ordinary expenditure or raise this deficiency by taxation. There is no advantage to be gained by exaggerating the gap there is at present in our financial position as between revenue and expenditure; but, on the other hand, there is nothing to be gained by concealing it. Now, I am prepared to admit that somewhere about £500,000 must be provided for, either by taxation, by diminishing subsidies, or by reducing the departmental expenditure; the last of which I regard, from the experience of the past, as a hopeless task. That being the case, I take this opportunity of contradicting, as I am quite sure I am entitled to do, the exaggerated rumours which have gained currency as to the actual deficiency. In fact, I heard it stated recently within the precincts of this House, by what should be an authority, that the amount we require is double that which we shall really require; and such a statement, if not contradicted, is calculated to do a great deal of injury to this country, and is very much to be regretted. At the same time, I am happy to hear that testimony has been borne to the fact that the departmental expenditure of the late Government has been reasonable, and could not be reduced. That, to my mind, takes away the greater part of the blame which has been cast upon us for extravagance in administration; but, whether we are or are not interested in that, I beg honorable gentlemen to dismiss from their minds any idea that any great economy can be exercised by cutting down the salaries of Civil servants. I have given my best attention to the matter, and I assure honorable gentlemen that, if possible at all, it is possible only to a very limited extent to cut down the salaries or reduce the number of Civil servants. On the other hand, I do feel that in some of the departments the salaries are exceedingly and unfairly small. Therefore, Sir, we must seek outside of that for means of restoring the balance between our expenditure and our revenue. I think, considering that so much has been hinted upon this point against the Government, that honorable gentlemen will pardon me for having occupied a few minutes' time in drawing attention to the subject, and rebutting the accusations which have been so frequently made.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL.—Sir, although I should have liked to refrain from saying anything on the occasion of the second reading of this Bill, after hearing the statements which have fallen from the honorable and learned gentleman opposite, and the honorable and gallant gentleman who has just sat down, I feel bound, on my own part, to say a few words. I feel all the more responsibility to do so, because I have been one of those who systematically, since I have had the honor of being called to this Council, have taken every opportunity which presented itself to give, so far as a private individual might give, a warning to the country of the dangers into which we were running in our finance. And, Sir, I feel that, having taken the responsibility on myself on so many previous occasions of doing this, it is all the more incumbent upon me to express my dissent from the representations upon which the assent of this Council to the Bill now before us seems to be sought. Sir, I need not apologize to you for taking the proper parliamentary course in referring to the Ministerial Statement made in the other House last night, upon which this Bill is founded; because, although we know the parliamentary rule is rightly strict as to not referring to debates in the other House, we also know that we have a clear parliamentary right to refer to any Ministerial Statement made there. It is true that it would be extremely unwise for us to criticise Ministerial Statements made elsewhere, and we should, if we refer to them at all, limit ourselves as nearly as possible to assent or dissent; but there are occasions when it is impossible to refrain from referring to the broad lines of a Ministerial declaration. And I think it right, for my own part, to say that I do not consider that the country is in the position which is apparently exhibited—although I do not say it was the intention of the Government so to exhibit it—in the Financial Statement that was made last night; because by that Statement, as it appears to me in reading it in the paper this morning, and hearing it as I did last night, the impression likely to be produced in the country, and likely to be produced in England, is this: that there is now a deficiency of £900,000 in the finances of the country; and I think we ought not to have any such idea expressed, and still less telegraphed to England, without declaring our dissent from the grave conclusions which that idea would carry with it. In a very few words I propose to say to the Council why I do not think that is the financial position of the country; and, in doing so, I hope I shall do proper justice to the Colonial Treasurer, because I cannot believe it could have been the intention of the Treasurer, or of my honorable and learned friend, in asking our assent to this Bill, to lead us to give our assent to the Bill under the belief that there is a deficiency of £900,000. Not only is it quite certain that the Colonial Treasurer did not say there is now a deficit of £900,000, but no budget could be possibly produced which could ever show such a deficit. It is utterly impossible that any Financial Statement or appropriations for the year could be made to show a deficiency of £900,000 in the public finance. All we are entitled to say, bearing in mind the constant warnings that have been given to the various Governments that have existed, is that there is a certain amount of deficit actually ascertained; but we are not entitled to say there is a deficiency of £900,000, because we know two things: first, that no such deficiency has been reached; and, secondly, as I have said, that no budget that could possibly be produced could ever allow such a deficiency to exist. Very well: then what I wish to add is this: It would be dangerous to our public credit, it would seriously endanger the success of the loan, if a cablegram should unfortunately appear in the Times one fine morning that "The Financial Statement has been made, and there is a deficit of £900,000." That, I say, would be a very dangerous, wrong, and inaccurate announcement to appear in England. Sir, whoever may be the Colonial Treasurer in this country, and whatever may be the budget which he proposes for our finance, this is absolutely certain: that his budget of this year will not do more than state the deficit which has accrued, and which we know has accrued, up to the time of existing appropriations—the 30th September just past—and that he will have to show how he means to prevent that deficit from being increased during the remaining period of the financial year. It is no use for us to say that if we adopt the estimates of last year, which were continued in a hurried manner for the first quarter of the existing financial year, and if this expenditure is continued, and if no other means are taken to replenish the public finances, we shall at the end of June next be driven into a deficit of £900,000. What would be thought of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in England if, in presenting his budget to Parliament, with a revenue of £80,000,000, he said that if a certain expenditure took place he would have a deficit of a quarter of his revenue, or twenty millions at the end of his financial year? Would he not be told to show how he would meet it? And what we have a right to expect from any Government—I don't care what Government it is which takes its place on those benches, and has the responsibility of directing the finance of the country—is that, when they tell us of the deficit that already exists, they should also let us know how the accumulation of that deficit is to be prevented; and I hold that it is not a sound finance to let it be said here or in England that we can by any possibility have a deficit of £900,000. That deficit, I repeat, does not exist, and never will exist, because, whoever may be the Treasurer, he will have to bring down a Statement to the House whose peculiar privilege it is to deal with it, which will show some means by which the augmentation of the existing deficit shall not be allowed. And I think it is the duty of every public man to prevent the serious dangers with which we are undoubtedly face-to-face, from being exaggerated into rumours of a much more alarming kind, whose effect may be so disastrous to the colony. It is all very well for us to serenely contemplate in this Council the conflict of parties which does not affect us; but, in the interests of public confidence in our resources and our solvency, it is of the highest importance that we should sustain our public credit and prevent even the chance of a scare, such as is likely to be created by the statement that there exists anything like the deficit which has been referred to.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—It is very important, Sir, that we should not have an exaggerated idea in regard to the difference which may exist between our year's revenue and our year's expenditure. At the same time, it seems to me equally important that we should not run away with an erroneous idea of a contrary nature upon the subject—an idea calculated to deceive ourselves and the public as to the true state of the case. I think that one of the worst features in colonial politics for some years past has been the apparent determination of politicians in New Zealand not to realize the true financial position of the colony—a determination, apparently, to shut their eyes to the inevitable consequences of the policy that was adopted; and, if we are to have that healthy system of finance that we should have, the first step toward its accomplishment will be thoroughly to realize our true position, and not allow ourselves any longer to be deceived in any respect. My honorable friend (Sir F. Dillon Bell) has told us that in his opinion there will be no deficit such as has been referred to, and that there cannot occur a deficit of £912,000. Well, there is at the present time undoubtedly a deficiency in existence. What the Colonial Treasurer has said is simply this: that between our ways and means as existing at the present time, and the expenditure, based upon the system which has hitherto prevailed, at the end of the year there must be—in the absence of retrenchment, and in the absence of fresh taxation—a deficit of £912,000. I have been carefully through those figures, and I am forced to the conclusion that that is not depreciatory of the future circumstances of the colony. We know better now than the late Government did what is likely to be the Customs revenue of the colony for the present year. The experience of the first quarter of the year throws a light upon our circumstances which did not exist at the commencement of the year, when the late Government prepared their estimates. We know likewise that the Customs revenue in the first quarter of the year was swollen through causes which are not likely to operate in succeeding quarters of the year. Large quantities of goods were poured into the country consequent upon orders which were sent to England when the colony was enjoying prosperity; and the result has been this, as every person at all acquainted with mercantile matters must be aware: that there is in the colony now an accumulation of goods which renders it most probable that the revenue during the succeeding quarters of the year will be less than in the first quarter, so that the Treasurer's estimate of the Customs revenue for the present year is more likely to be slightly in excess of what we shall actually receive than it is to be less. And the same may be said as regards land revenue. The Treasurer has reckoned the land revenue for the year as considerably less than the late Government did. We have here likewise the experience of the last three months to guide us, and that experience makes it pretty certain, in the absence of very great improvement, which none of us can anticipate during the next few months, that the receipts from that source of revenue will be much less than the late Government anticipated. He must be a very sanguine man indeed—he must be a man ostrich-like, who hides his head in the sand—who fails, after carefully going through the figures, to arrive at the same conclusion as that of the Treasurer, that at the end of the year there will be a deficit of £912,000 unless we meet that deficit by increasing our taxation and by retrenchment. The Treasurer himself referred to both these matters as being those which must engage the attention of the Government. He intimated, however, that at the present time he could not be expected to settle how far in that direction the Government was prepared to go. I cannot for one moment bring myself to believe that we shall, as a matter of fact, have such a large deficit; but of this I am certain: We shall find that all our efforts to increase our revenue by increased taxation, and all our efforts to diminish our expenditure by reductions, will fail to absorb this deficit, and that, at the end of the year, we shall be in the position of having to pay a large portion of the deficit out of borrowed money. I wish that for one moment I could bring myself to believe that in succeeding years we are not likely to incur deficits; but I am forced to believe that such will not be the case. It is an undoubted fact that for years past we have been relying upon our land revenue, and that the land revenue has now received a shock from which it is never likely to recover. It is not that there will not be a demand for land, but that the land for the most part has been already parted with; that our landed estate no longer exists—the land is no longer available to the same extent as formerly. In a paper which has been recently distributed—the report of the Crown Lands Department for last year—there is a reference made to this matter, which shows the fact that finance depending upon land revenue for the future is likely to be deranged, because the land available for sale has been parted with to such an extent that we have a very small quantity left. The Secretary for Crown Lands states that, as regards the Province of Canterbury, whence the larger portion of land revenue has been received of late years, “comparatively little of the land remaining in the hands of the Crown in this district can be deemed agricultural.” Then he goes on and refers to the land in other provinces, and he makes it perfectly clear that for the future we cannot rely as we have done in the past for aid to our public works expenditure or to our own general revenue on sales of land.

The Hon. Mr. WOOD.—I should like the indulgence of the Council for a moment while I draw attention to the fact that, in referring to the Province of Canterbury as yielding a large proportion of the land revenue, the honorable member scarcely did justice to the subject. I ask indulgence in this matter because, as has been said by the Hon. Sir Dillon Bell, it is highly dangerous that damaging reports should go forth at a time like this. I would refer him to Otago—

Hon. MEMBERS.—Order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—The honorable gentleman is clearly out of order.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—I was speaking upon the spur of the moment, and was not going fully into the case; but, as my honorable friend (the Hon. Mr. Wood) referred to Otago, I will read what the Secretary of Crown Lands has to say about that province. He says, “The land now offered and remaining to offer is generally more pastoral than agricultural.” It is quite clear, therefore, that we cannot rely, as we have been in the habit of doing, upon our land revenue; and it is equally clear there was no warrant for the late Treasurer last year relying on the land revenue for receipts amounting to £1,200,000 in aid of current revenue, and something like £750,000 in aid of public works. We have been undertaking an extensive system of public works—we have constructed hundreds of miles of railway—relying upon the continuance of our land revenue. It is evident we had no right to so rely upon it. I am referring to this to show that we have been living in an atmosphere of deception. We have been shutting our eyes to the inevitable; and there is too much reason to believe that, if we continue to act as we have been acting, we shall bring ourselves to grief and the colony into contempt. We shall not only injure the prospects of the colony, but we shall carry ruin to hundreds and thousands of persons elsewhere—the persons who have been induced to lend money on the security of the colony. We have not only to consider the prosperity created by this outlay,—the benefit to ourselves personally for the time,—but we should remember that there are others concerned. There is a moral responsibility connected with our actions, arising from the fact that hundreds and thousands of persons are lending their money upon the security of the colony. I refer to this only because I differ from some honorable members in this matter, and believe that the very best means of bringing about the restoration of our financial position is by not shutting our eyes to the truth of the position, but by regarding it coolly and temperately, with the determination of bringing our expenditure within our means.

The Hon. Mr. WOOD.—Sir, I wish to offer a very brief excuse for having interrupted the honorable member; but I thought it was undesirable, at a time when our circumstances do not appear very flourishing, that we should make worse of them than they really are. I must say I think the position has been painted, as was stated by a previous speaker, in the blackest possible colours, and, moreover, that the honorable gentleman who has just sat down has tried to make things appear as bad as possible. I do not know that he has done so intentionally; but, at any rate, the remarks he has made with reference to the land of New Zealand must produce a bad effect, and it is only upon that ground that I have a word to say on the present occasion. The honorable gentleman said very little land was available; but we know that there are millions of acres of good land in New Zealand, not available for sale at the present time, whether the honorable gentleman knows it or not. Why, I believe there is sufficient unsold land in the Province of Otago alone to pay off every shilling of our debt. There may be differences of opinion on that point, but some gentlemen do not know how much land there is there. I do not know the exact acreage myself, but I should say it is well on for fifteen million acres of unsold land in Otago. Some, of course, is of comparatively little value; but some of it is of very great value indeed. Therefore I do not think it is well such damaging statements as we have heard should be allowed to go forth uncontradicted, because they may do us serious injury.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER.—Sir, it is to be hoped that those who undertake to manage the finances of the country will have a clearer idea of the resources of the colony than the honorable gentleman who has just sat down. His statement that there are fifteen million acres of unsold land in Otago was exceedingly amusing, seeing that that is about the area of the whole province—mountain, plain, and all. I do not desire to go further into that matter, but I will add this: that when honorable gentlemen get up and complain that too gloomy a picture has been made out in reference to the state of the colony, and say such things should not be done, I desire, for one, to say, in my place in this Council, that I utterly reject all this talk about painting the finances of the colony in such black colours. I believe that the truer you make your exposition of the affairs of the colony the better it will be for the colony. Whether the deficit is £900,000 or £500,000, the best thing you can do is to tell the truth. I am quite sure you will not raise the credit of the colony by glossing over the truth and bolstering up a false condition of things with the view of securing a little ephemeral prosperity, which will be blown away by the first breath of adversity. If you want to establish a sound credit, which shall not be liable to be swept away with the first reverse of fortune, you must tell people really how you stand, and you must not attempt to conceal anything at all, however unpleasant it may be. I, for one, take exception to the language used by those who find fault with the Treasurer for stating what he did last night. What was he put in office for, but to tell the truth? And the truth he has told, as he believed it. It is possible his figures may not be absolutely correct; but, with the greatest deference to my honorable friend the Hon. Sir Dillon Bell—who has had great experience as a politician, and for whose advice we are most grateful in this Council—I prefer to take the Treasurer's figures, and I only hope we may not find that the Treasurer, so far from exaggerating the amount of the deficiency, has under-estimated it. I think that those persons in this colony who are true settlers, and who have a real interest and a stake in the country, would do well to express their satisfaction at having a gentleman in the Government who is not afraid to fearlessly expose the real position. I, for one, am not in the least afraid of the position of the colony. I believe the colony only requires to be governed by a firm and strong Government, who will administer affairs as they ought to be administered, who will act straightforwardly without reference to consequences to themselves; and then the finances of the colony will be restored to prosperity. We know that our resources are very great indeed, and we know that we are, and have been, indulging in luxuries such as no community like this has ever before indulged in; and it is only reasonable to expect temporary difficulties, though we shall be able with proper management to tide them over. We are, for instance, giving a quarter of a million of money away every year as subsidies to Road Boards, County Councils, and similar local bodies, although some of those very local bodies have large sums lying to their credit in the banks—sums of money upon which they are absolutely drawing 5 or 6 or 7 per cent. as interest. Honorable members of this Council know that to be fact, for some of them have had connection with these transactions. Yet we talk about the financial necessities of the colony while this sort of thing is going on, and no one apparently has the courage to do that in reference to these subsidies which would be a straightforward, simple, and proper course. I hope I have said nothing offensive, but it does seem to me it requires plain talking in order to get at the proper course. We also want a strong Government, who will have the power and the courage to reduce the expenditure on public works. That is the direction in which an immense reduction must take place; and we want a Government who will take a firm stand in this matter. And, moreover, we want a Government—I do not wish to speak offensively to the Hon. Colonel Whitmore—which will sweep away that tinkering of the Customs duties which the late Government were guilty of—a tinkering which lost to the revenue £100,000 a year without doing an atom of good to any individual in the colony. There are three things which require to be seen to, if our financial condition is to be restored. The Colonial Treasurer has done the colony no injury. He went into the Treasury to do what good he could—not with the view of doing all the injury possible, as some would have us suppose; and he has done good by telling us the simple truth, instead of making misstatements. The Treasurer bears a character which is sufficient to negative such charges; and I hold it is absurd to say any such statement was made with a view to injure the country, and it is absurd to say it will injure the country.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL.—I hope the honorable gentleman does not wish to convey that I said any such thing as that the Treasurer meant to injure the country?

The Hon. Mr. MILLER.—Well, the honorable gentleman went very near saying that, if he did not actually say it. If there is one characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon race of which I think sometimes we might have reason to be proud, it is that unsparing self-criticism which we indulge in, whether it be a time of national adversity or a time of prosperity. Look at the criticisms on our military organization during the time of the Crimean war. Was anything ever more utterly unsparing than the revelations as to our want of organization in many departments? But did those criticisms, severe and unpleasant as they were, do us any harm? We held ourselves up to public scorn during that war; and yet it has been admitted by every nation in the world that we came out of it, as compared with our allies, in the very best possible way. We introduced reforms; and our organizations, such as transport, victualing, and so forth, were much more perfect at the end of the war than at the commencement. But how was that done? Not by contending that there was nothing to be found fault with. It was done by telling the truth; and that is the manner in which we must cure the evils of our finance. If these figures of the Treasurer be true—and I believe that they are true—I hope the Government will not yield one single inch; and if they are to be turned out of office for telling the truth, at least let it be known that there are men in the colony who are prepared to state what is absolutely correct, and who will not gloss over anything whatever in the state of the public business. Perhaps I have spoken with too much warmth; but I feel that so much has been said, both last night and since, about the dreadful facts of this Statement, that it is only right that those who feel that, so far from doing any harm, it must do good, should at least give expression to that feeling. If it does affect our credit for a time, it will do good in the long run, because people will be much more willing to lend us money when they know we tell the truth with regard to our affairs. I think the Hon. Mr. Wood greatly exaggerated the value of our land. I do not know whether it is right to say so in my place in Parliament, but, really, I do not believe all the land available for sale would be anything like sufficient to pay off our debt. But, fortunately for us, we need not take that to heart. The creditor does not look to the land. It is well known that what he looks to is the general revenue of the colony; and if we take the proper means—no doubt we shall suffer for a time from the depression which no country in the world has escaped—but if we take proper means we shall be able to restore our revenue, because, when prosperity returns, no doubt we shall find the revenue will greatly increase. At the same time I cannot help thinking that the Treasurer could not have estimated his revenue at any higher figure than he has put it, looking to the returns of the first quarter and to the present state of affairs. With regard to the Bill, I think we may safely leave that to the Government. I am quite prepared to believe that this is the best way of providing funds for the purpose.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL.—I will ask the indulgence of the Council to say only one word. If there was a single expression I used which could possibly be construed, except in the mind of my honorable friend, as conveying an imputation against the Colonial Treasurer that he had made the statement with the intention of injuring the colony, I should be most sincerely sorry for using it: nothing of the kind ever entered my conception, nor could I imagine that, after the long parliamentary life I have led, I could ever be supposed capable either of feeling such a sentiment or of expressing it in my place here.

Bill read a second and a third time.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Wanganui Endowed School Bill, Lyttelton Harbour Board and Corporation Exchange Bill.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. TOMOANA.—I wish to make a personal explanation. There are two particular mistakes regarding what I said the other day. I did not say that Mr. Hall had agreed to put a stop to the purchase of Native lands, and to abolish the Native Land Court. I clearly remember what I said. Those were not Mr. Hall's words to me.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I may say, Sir, that I intend to-morrow to move that the whole matter be referred to the Reporting Debates Committee; and that will be the proper time to enter into the question. I shall bring the matter forward as one of privilege affecting the records of the House.

Mr. McLEAN.—I would like to call attention to the fact that an inquiry into the Hansard reports will do no good, because I presume the Hansard reporter takes down what the interpreter says; but what is disputed is the interpretation, and the production of the reporter's notes—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable gentleman had better reserve this point until the motion comes on to-morrow.

MIDDLE ISLAND RAILWAYS DEPARTMENT.

Mr. STEVENS asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether any instructions have been given for the removal from Christchurch to Dunedin of the departments of the Commissioner, the Accountant, and the Cashier, Middle Island Railways, or any one of those departments; and, if so, what is the date of those instructions?

Mr. OLIVER replied that no instructions whatever had been issued for the removal of any branch of these departments to Dunedin. Some correspondence relative to the subject had been laid on the table.

SYDENHAM POST AND TELEGRAPH OFFICES.

Mr. STEVENS asked the Postmaster-General, Whether the Government will take steps to erect a post office and telegraph station in the Borough of Sydenham with the least possible delay?

Mr. HALL said it was the intention of the Government to open a post office and telegraph station in the Borough of Sydenham. Inquiries were now being made for a site, and as soon as satisfactory arrangements could be made the buildings would be proceeded with.

CAMBRIDGE-ROTORUA COMMUNICATION.

Mr. MOSS asked the Minister for Public Works, What steps are being taken, or proposed to be taken, to open up communication between Cambridge and Lake Rotorua by way of Tapapa?

Mr. OLIVER, in reply, said that no work had been executed on this road yet, because no vote had been taken for the purpose. It had been proposed to expend £1,200 on the construction of bridges, and, if the road was to be of any service, a further expenditure of £2,000 would apparently be necessary; but nothing had been done yet, and the matter would be fully considered before the estimates were submitted.

BLUFF-WINTON RAILWAY.

Mr. BAIN asked the Minister for Public Works, If he intends to place a sum of money on the estimates for the purpose of fencing the railway line from Bluff Harbour to Winton?

Mr. OLIVER replied that the Commissioner of Railways for the Middle Island had only provided in the estimates for the fencing-in of such portions of this line of railway as were necessary, having regard to the safety of passengers and traffic. The question of fencing in the whole of the railways was engaging the attention of the department; but it was a matter which would involve very considerable expenditure, and therefore required serious consideration.

INVERCARGILL MUNICIPAL SINKING FUND.

Mr. BAIN asked the Government, If they will lay before this House all correspondence in reference to the recent appointment of trustees of the Invercargill Municipal Sinking Fund?

Mr. HALL said the Government would have no objection to lay this correspondence on the table. It included an anonymous communication to the Government. He did not know whether the honorable gentleman wished that to be produced.

Mr. BAIN said he asked for all correspondence.

TAIERI COUNTY SUBSIDIES.

Mr. FULTON asked the Colonial Treasurer, How soon the subsidies now due to the various local bodies in the Taieri County will be paid?

Major ATKINSON said the whole of the subsidies due to the various local bodies throughout the colony would be paid immediately after he had obtained funds under the Bill which passed through the House on the previous day.

OTAGO LAND FUND.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Government, If they are disposed to pay to the local government bodies in the Provincial District of Otago the £54,000 of Land Fund impounded by the late Government, and which the Public Accounts Committee reported belonged to the Provincial District of Otago?

Major ATKINSON said, as far as he knew, this sum was in the same position as the £100,000 which was held by the Government, and which a Committee had reported ought to be repaid. Both of these sums, he understood, were chargeable to loan, and the repayment of them would have to depend on the raising of the loan. They would, of course, appear in the public works estimates.

FIVE-MILLION LOAN.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Government, If they have received any information regarding the negotiation of the £5,000,000 loan; and if there would be any objection to lay such information before this House? After the Statement made on the previous evening, it was perhaps not necessary to ask this question, unless in the meantime further information had been received by the Government in reference to raising the five-million loan.

Mr. HALL said the Government had received a telegram on this subject on the previous evening, during the delivery of the Financial Statement by the Colonial Treasurer. The loan had not yet been placed, and the Government did not think it desirable that the telegram should be produced at present.

TUAPEKA MUNICIPAL LOAN.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Government, If it is true, as stated in the public Press, that £5,000 has been lent to the Municipality of Tuapeka; and, if so, on what terms, and by what authority?

Mr. OLIVER replied that last year a loan of £50,000 was authorized on behalf of those localities in Otago which suffered from the floods that then prevailed. Out of that £50,000, two sums, of £5,000 and £3,000 respectively, had been advanced to the Tuapeka County Council. The loans had been made repayable by equal instalments, extending over five years, without interest.

Mr. J. C. BROWN would remark that the Government had misconceived the facts in this case. The debt was not that of the County Council, but of the Municipality.

Mr. MURRAY said he understood this matter referred to the Municipality of Lawrence or Tuapeka. The statement was, that the money had been lent for a term of years to the Municipality, at 6 per cent. per annum.

Major ATKINSON said it was true that there had been certain negotiations between the public departments and the Municipality of Lawrence, but the negotiations apparently came to nothing, the department not deeming the security sufficient.

ARMED SETTLERS, ETC.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Government, How many settlers, Volunteers, and Constabulary are under arms at the present time in New Zealand, and at what weekly cost?

Mr. HALL said that, so far as the Government were aware, there were no Volunteers actually on duty at the present time. There were certain Volunteers stated to be on duty at the Thames, but there was no record in the offices of the terms upon which that duty was being performed.

PUBLIC DOMAINS.

Mr. TOLE asked the Government, If they will lay before this House a return showing the amounts paid to the various bodies having control of reserves under the Public Domains Acts, for the year ending the 30th June last?

Mr. HALL said the Government would lay the return on the table at the earliest possible date.

NATHAN AND WILKIE.

Major WILLIS asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether a sum of money was not, several months ago, paid to the trustee in bankruptcy, at Wanganui, of the estate of Nathan and Wilkie, railway contractors under the Government, for the purpose of paying the wages due to some of the men employed by them on such contract, who had, prior to the time of such payment to the trustee, duly proved their debts; and why the said money has not hitherto been paid to the men? Also, whether interest has been received or accrued by or to the said trustee in the interval?

Mr. HALL said that, Nathan and Wilkie having become insolvent, the works were carried on by the Government. A sum of £1,075 due to them was paid by the Government to the trustee in bankruptcy, on the condition that he should give due notice to all the workmen that the money had been paid. The Government were not aware whether anything further had been done in the matter, but he would be glad to show the honorable gentleman all the correspondence on the subject.

MANDEVILLE AND RANGIORA DRAINAGE.

Mr. BOWEN asked the Minister of Lands, Whether the Government will appoint a Royal Commission to take evidence and report as to the drainage system of the Mandeville and Rangiora District? A great deal of money had been spent on the drainage of the district, and opinions differed very much as to the manner in which it had been laid out. The fact was, that a new river-bed had been formed, with a great deal of water in it, and some of the farmers in the district considered that they had been injured by the manner in which the drainage works had been carried out. The matter was one of importance to the settlers, and also to the Government, as the railway ran through the district. It was desirable that an inquiry should be held, and the people hoped it would be thorough. He did not ask for a mere departmental inquiry, as it was necessary that evidence should be taken on the spot as to the original watershed, and the best line for the permanent outlet. It would be advisable that an engineer from the Public Works Department should be associated with some independent engineer familiar with drainage works, and that they should take evidence upon the matter.

Mr. ROLLESTON was aware this was a vexed question, and that Government property was seriously affected by the drainage works. He was also aware that the action of the Government in the past with reference to these works had been very much called into question, and the Government were of opinion that an inquiry should be instituted. The particular nature of the inquiry was a matter for future consideration. He should be glad to confer with the honorable gentleman, and the Government would take steps to have an inquiry made. Whether it would be by Royal Commission or otherwise he was not now prepared to say.

LOCAL INDUSTRIES.

Mr. LEVIN asked the Government, Whether they will appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the best means of promoting and encouraging manufactures and local industries in the colony?

Mr. HALL said the subject was one of the greatest importance; and, without committing themselves to any opinion as to what was the best manner of assisting local industries, the Government concurred with the honorable gentleman in thinking it desirable that a Committee of the House should investigate the subject. If the honorable gentleman would be good enough to confer with the Government as to the appointment of the Committee and the selection of members to compose it, they would be very happy to meet him.

WAKATIPU GOLD FIELDS RUNS.

Mr. FINN asked the Government, If they have released the late licensees of the Wakatipu Gold Fields Runs from the payment of rents due prior to the cancellation of licenses?

Mr. ROLLESTON said the Government had not released any of the late licensees from the payment of rents due prior to the cancellation of the licenses. No reason had been shown, so far as he was aware, for releasing them. The leases were given upon condition that no rent should be paid from the date of surrender. That was all the information the Government had at present, and upon that information they saw no reason to alter their decision. They would be happy to hear from the honorable gentleman whether there was any reason why the rent should be remitted.

Mr. FINN said he asked the question because he wished to know the position of the licensees, as several of them were very heavy sufferers by the late floods; and he understood a petition was about being presented to the House by one of them, asking for relief.

QUALIFICATION OF ELECTORS BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Sir, I shall take up the time of the House very briefly in concluding the speech I was making when the debate was adjourned yesterday. To put the position plainly to the House, it is this: We, on our side, contend that the honorable gentlemen who ask for leave to bring in this Bill do not possess the confidence of the House. We say that they are in a minority at the present time—a minority greater than the minority they were in when the division was taken on Friday evening; and that, in point of fact, instead of having acquired strength, they have lost strength. I go further, and say that by no possibility can it be proper that a measure of this kind should be brought in by a Government which does not possess a majority. The principle of parliamentary government is, that the Government of the day should command a majority in the House. We may be told that on a previous occasion there existed a Government which did not possess the confidence of a majority of members of this House; but, so far as the votes went, they did. The very same tactics which we pursued then are being pursued towards us now. I do not object to "being hoist with our own petard," but we propose to show the country plainly and unmistakably that the Government does not possess the confidence of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must point out to the honorable gentleman that he is opening up the whole question of a want of confidence.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Then I will limit myself to the question before us. I say that the proposal to bring in this measure comes from a Government which does not possess the confidence of the House. This measure originated with the late Government, and with their party. It is really and truly the measure of the Liberal party.

Mr. HALL.—Our party.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Of the Liberal party to which the honorable gentleman does not belong. He may at the present time be wearing the Liberal clothing, which is merely stolen from his predecessors in office. I say, further, that if it had not been for the fact that we put that measure before the country the honorable gentleman would never have thought of bringing it in; but, as the country has approved of it, and as many honorable members on his own side will have it, he is wise enough in his generation in bringing it in. As I said yesterday, I do not believe in unfair tactics. I gave the honorable gentlemen an opportunity yesterday to make their Statement on finance, and I expected that last evening we should have had a chance to take a division on this motion; but that was not possible. You, Sir, ruled that no new business could be taken after half-past twelve; but it seems to me that I might justly complain that the honorable gentleman did not come to me and arrange to give me an opportunity to bring this question on before the House adjourned. The motion I intend now to move is what is called the previous question; but I wish, before making that motion, to ask you to rule on one or two points. First of all, I wish to know whether this motion is one which, if carried, would prevent this Bill being brought in again this session.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the previous question were carried, That the question be not put to-day, it would be quite competent to bring it on on a future day.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—The second point is this: I have been about nine years in this House, and there are gentlemen here who were in it nine years before me. I have often seen the previous question put when many honorable members have been uncertain which way to vote upon it. I understand the form of putting the question is, "That this question be now put;" and that I, as mover, and those who think with me, are entitled to negative that question.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is so.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—That being so, I will not take up the time of the House further, but move now, That the question be now put. I have to explain distinctly that the reason why I make this motion is in order that the strength of parties may be tested, and because the leader of the Government did not choose to give precedence to the motion of want of confidence which has been tabled.

Mr. HALL.—May I ask, Sir, as a point of order, whether, when that question is disposed of, I shall be entitled, as mover of the main motion, to speak again in reply, if I speak now to the amendment?

Mr. SPEAKER.—You will not be able to do so.

Major ATKINSON.—With all deference to you, Sir, I understood that, when an amendment was disposed of, an honorable member was in exactly the same position as he was before it was put—that is to say, that my honorable friend could speak now, and then in reply on the main question.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the honorable member speaks to the amendment, he has forfeited his right to reply.

Major ATKINSON.—I submit that any honorable member speaking to the original question can speak again to an amendment, and, when that is disposed of, if he is the mover of the main question, he can sum up in reply.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That would give the honorable gentleman an opportunity of making three speeches.

Major ATKINSON.—That may be, Sir; but I submit that it has been our practice.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable gentleman is mistaken. The Speakers of this House have always ruled that, if an honorable member moves a motion, and then speaks to an amendment to that motion, he forfeits his right of reply.

Mr. HALL.—Perhaps, by the indulgence of the House, I may be allowed to make a statement explanatory of the position which the Government have taken up in this matter. I think it would be convenient that, before the debate goes further, I should, in a few words, explain the position. In order to do so, I shall have to read a letter written to me by the honorable member for Port Chalmers, and my reply. I presume the honorable gentleman will not object, as the letters may be considered public property. I will avoid argument, and will merely state facts to the House. The position we have taken up is that, before the House entertains or decides the question of no-confidence, we should have a reasonable opportunity of bringing before it our policy. The earliest possible period at which my honorable colleague the Native Minister can make his Statement is Friday evening. Having said so much, I will read the letter I received from the honorable gentleman who is said to be the leader of the Opposition—although this seems doubtful, because one receives proposals from so many honorable gentlemen opposite that it is difficult to say who is their leader. However, for this purpose I suppose he must be looked upon as the leader. The letter is as follows:—

“13th October, 1879.

“DEAR SIR,—Will you be good enough to inform me whether it is the intention of the Government to place my motion of want of confidence on the Order Paper so that it may come on for discussion to-morrow (Tuesday), in accordance with the will of the House, as expressed by its vote on Friday last?—Yours faithfully, “J. MACANDREW.

“The Hon. John Hall, &c.”

To that I sent the following reply:—

“Wellington, 13th October, 1879.

“DEAR SIR,—My colleagues and myself consider it would be unconstitutional for the House to entertain a motion of no-confidence in a Government until it has had a reasonable opportunity of placing its policy before the country. We cannot, therefore, agree to your suggestion to take your notice to-morrow.

“If you are willing to allow us a reasonable time for the above purpose, we shall then be ready to take your motion as the first Order on some day to be agreed upon. I trust you will consider this to be a reasonable compromise.—Yours faithfully,

Major Atkinson

I have received no reply to that letter, and, in consequence, a member of the Government has spoken with the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan), who has given us to understand that he has communicated to the members of his party the proposition which we have made—namely, that, if the Opposition will allow us the present week to bring forward our measures, it being understood that the Native Minister will make his Statement on Friday, we shall agree that on Tuesday the motion of want of confidence of the honorable member for Port Chalmers shall be taken as the first Order of the day. We do not ask the House in any way to indorse our measures of policy: we merely ask that our Bills may be advanced so as to be before the House and the country. I submit to honorable members of independent and moderate views on the opposite side of the House, that this is a reasonable proposal. I do not want now to argue the question, but I think honorable members must see that the position which the Government have taken up is only reasonable. That is the proposal the Government have made, but we have not received any reply.

Mr. MACANDREW.—Could not the honorable gentleman arrange to take the want-of-confidence motion on Friday? It means another week's loss of time if we put it off till Tuesday. I think it would be a fair compromise to take the motion on Friday, and I am ready to agree to that.

Mr. HALL.—We would do so, if it were possible; but we have to carry on the ordinary work of the Government, and that occupies us from ten o'clock in the morning to two o'clock next morning, day after day. It is therefore impossible for my honorable colleague to make his Statement at an earlier period than on Friday night.

Mr. McLEAN.—I should also like to point out to the honorable gentleman, when he asks the House to take his motion on Friday, that we have to proceed to consider the election petitions at three o'clock on that afternoon, and that will break into the day. The proposal made by the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government is so very reasonable that I am perfectly sure all the independent members of the House will agree to it, and will not submit to be led by those who, I must say, show such indecent haste in trying to force this want-of-confidence motion before the House. I do not at all see that, even if they manage to do so, they will find themselves in the position in which they expect to be; and, when they do get it on, they will very probably be sorry that they did so. They have been getting, as they think, recruits from this side of the House, and certainly we know of two. With regard to one of them we have expressed no surprise, because we know it is an ordinary thing for him to turn political somersaults; but, with regard to another—

Mr. HISLOP.—I rise to a point of order, Sir. Is it competent to the honorable member to anticipate the debate on the no-confidence motion?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I was not for the moment paying particular attention to what the honorable member was saying; but I think it would not be advisable to anticipate the debate that may arise on a motion which has not yet come before the House.

Mr. MURRAY.—Speaking to the point of order, I think the honorable member who has just raised this objection has gone much further in anticipating the debate on the no-confidence motion and departing from the subject before the House than the honorable member for Waikouaiti.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Waikouaiti was speaking on the Bill which was before the House last night, not on this question.

Mr. HISLOP.—I have not spoken on this question.

Mr. McLEAN.—I was proceeding to show that, although they had got one or two members over to their side, there are honorable gentlemen on that side who are perfectly free to act as they think fit—in point of fact, to go to whichever side of the House they please. I very much misjudge those honorable gentlemen if they allow themselves to be led away by those who seek, with indecent haste, to get upon the Government benches again, and to whom I say it is life or death to get on those benches again as speedily as possible. However, I do not wish to keep up this debate now, as there is a motion of the honorable member for Clive on the Order Paper which I should like to see brought on. I will therefore take another opportunity at an early period this session to review the conduct of those honorable gentlemen.

Mr. MOSS.—I should like to ask the Premier if he does not think that the Statement of the Native Minister might be made during the debate on the no-confidence motion, so saving time. It seems to me to be the desire of both sides of the House to bring matters to an issue as soon as possible, and get through the important business which we have before us. Why, then, might not the Native Minister make his Statement during the debate? I feel perfectly sure that, if the Colonial Treasurer had taken that course, instead of making his Statement last night, it would have had quite as much effect, and we should have avoided some hours of discussion on that Statement. I throw this suggestion out to the Premier, who must be as anxious to expedite business as we are on this side of the House.

Mr. SEDDON.—As one of the independent members alluded to by the honorable member for Waikouaiti, I should like to express my opinion with regard to the delay that has taken place in getting on with the business. I am simply disgusted, when I come here to work and do what good I can for the country, to find that we are kept from day to day talking and talking, and doing no work—to find that, although we have been now three weeks here, we are still in just the same position that we were in when we first met. There has not been a single day's work done, and now we are asked to waste another week. The Government know full well that all they are doing now is waste of time. Although they are interviewed day by day, and urged to get on, and although they keep on tinkering with measures that do not belong to them, they know quite well that they have not got a majority to support them. Let them face the position at once. It would be a much more business-like way to have this want-of-confidence motion brought forward at once, and then let us go to the real business we have to do. I may say that I, as an independent member, am not going to give party votes time after time, and neglect my duty as a private member; because such a course of action would be injurious to the country. Why do not those honorable gentlemen at the head of the Government listen to the voice of the majority? The honorable member for Waikouaiti speaks of its being a matter of life or death to honorable gentlemen from this side to get on those benches again, and says that when they were in the Government they clung closely to those benches; but there is no record before the House that they refused to accept a no-confidence vote at the beginning of a session, or that, when they found themselves in a minority, they did not at once resign. That being the case, I suggest that we go on with private business. On Friday we shall have the Statement from the Native Minister; and on Tuesday next let us have the no-confidence vote. During that time, the Committee asked for by the honorable member for Clive will be sitting. While waiting for these things, this debate will be prolonged, so that I look forward to next week being lost before the no-confidence vote is brought to a conclusion. After that, if the party on our side are successful, they will want a few days to repair the damage done by the gentlemen now occupying the Government benches; so that you may say there will be a fortnight lost. Having these facts before us, I say it is incumbent upon all members of the House like myself to take up this position: Seeing that it is a waste of time to attempt to go on with the business of the Government at the present time, we had better stop all business and bring the matter to an issue. That is the position I take up as an independent member in this House, and I trust other independent members will take the same step.

Mr. PITT.—As one of the new members of the House, I think I may be acquitted of having taken up much time in the House during recent discussions. But I do not admit that these discussions have been profitless. We have achieved one event since this House met which I do not think has been dearly purchased, even if it had taken up the whole time which has elapsed since the House met. I mean the displacement of the late Government. That is an event in the history of this colony which I, for one, rejoice at, and I do not think the time has been wasted which has been occupied in achieving it. But I hope that no more time will be wasted in reference to these measures, and I would appeal to the young members who like myself were returned to this House pledged to carry out what have been styled those "liberal" measures, to go on with them, to protest against this waste of time, and to protest against their being imperilled by any further postponement. These measures we have been returned here pledged to our constituents to pass, and we believe the country is anxious to have them; and I appeal to honorable members to rise above all party considerations, and unite, as I think we may all unite, on common ground to pass these measures as speedily as possible. Party ties are all very well, but consideration for the interests of the country should, I think, be paramount; and I think these are times when those party ties should not be held to be binding—at all events, not binding to this extent, that they are to be mere instruments of what can be styled nothing more or less than factious opposition to the prosecution of the work of the country. It seems to me it is only a question of who is to have the credit of passing the measures to which I refer. The present Opposition seems to be jealous of the Government taking the carriage of these Bills through the House. If the patriotic spirit referred to by the honorable member for Auckland City East exists in this House, I ask honorable members possessing it to unite and have them passed as speedily as possible. We have had a warning in reference to the Triennial Parliaments Bill. On Friday evening last we had an opportunity of passing it, and, if honorable members had taken the course I now ask them to take, that Bill would have gone through this House, and by this time would have reached the other branch of the Legislature. I would ask, Where is that Bill now? If honorable members refer to the Order Paper they will see that, in addition to being behind all those fifty-one notices of motion, it is down to No. 21 among the Orders of the day. Goodness knows when we shall come to it again. The question whether or not the present Government have the confidence of the House does not seem to me to be wrapped up in these measures. We were returned to pass them; and our duty to our constituents and the country, if we are sincere and in earnest, is to have them put on the Statute Book as speedily as possible. For these reasons, I hope honorable members will not interfere further to prevent the passage of these measures through this House, and then we can all unite to have them passed as speedily as possible.

Mr. MURRAY.—I do not wish to address myself to the proposal now before the House so much as to make a few remarks on what I consider is the unfortunate position taken up by the gentlemen who formed the late Ministry. We have met here as representatives of the people, to do the work of the country, and I would ask them to do it, instead of offering factious opposition. There is no necessity for any delay in the business. There is any amount of private business on the Order Paper, which is of quite as much importance to the country as what is called Government business. This is a private members' day, and I submit that both sides of the House should agree to accord to private members two days a week for their business. Then let the Statement on Native Affairs be taken on Friday, as suggested by the Premier. It would save a great deal of unkind feeling if honorable members would accept with a good grace what is inevitable, and agree that the debate shall take place on Tuesday. I think the honorable member at the head of the Government stated the position very fairly, and I am sorry his advances were not met in the same spirit in which they were made. I trust that those gentlemen who, like myself, are impartial and independent, and determined to do what is right, will not sacrifice principle to personal and party considerations, but will see fair-play and justice given to both sides.

Mr. KELLY.—It appears to me that a reasonable proposition was made by the Government, when they proposed to take the motion of want of confidence on Tuesday. The other side want Friday, so that there is no very great difference between the two parties. I think the matter might be settled by adjourning until half-past seven this evening, and the question considered of bringing on the motion on Monday at half-past seven; and I would therefore suggest that the debate be adjourned until that time, to enable the leaders on both sides to meet and confer, so that the melancholy spectacle now presented to the country of blocked business be put an end to.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—I am astonished that we have had no communication from the leader of the Opposition with reference to the remarks made by the Hon. the Premier and by the honorable member for New Plymouth. I do not think the House has quite considered what would be the effect of "the previous question," if carried. It simply amounts to this: that we should go on then to the next notice—leave to bring in a Bill—and the same decision would be repeated upon that Bill, and so on upon all the other Bills, the consequence being that the whole of to-day would be entirely wasted. The whole of to-morrow will also be wasted. That is entirely carrying out the intention of the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan), who declared that he would obstruct all the Bills, one by one, in order to prevent any business being done before the want-of-confidence motion is considered. The consequence of that clearly will be that the whole of this week will be absolutely wasted, without any business being done. If honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House would accept the exceedingly reasonable proposition made by the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government, to take Tuesday next for the want-of-confidence motion, in the meantime permitting the Government to bring forward their measures, and the Native Minister to make his Statement, we could get through all the private business at present on the Order Paper probably in the course of to-day and to-morrow, and also advance those Liberal measures a certain stage, so as to keep them in the first rank of the business on the Paper. Whatever Government is in office will have to bring forward those measures, and it would therefore be an advantage, in any event, to have them advanced a stage. I cannot understand why honorable gentlemen opposite should be so determined to absolutely block the way of business. I look upon the matter from a perfectly impartial point of view, and I fail to see the object of the obstinate obstruction of business which honorable gentlemen are displaying. For my part, I am as grieved as any member of the House at the waste of time which is going on, but, at the same time, I am bound to say that it arises entirely from this obstinate obstruction of business. The honorable gentlemen could gain their object quite as well, and at the same time afford an opportunity to do a great deal of business. I have business on the Order Paper, and every other member has something he wishes to get passed; but the moment any Government business comes up the honorable member for the Thames raises a motion which puts a stop to anything being done. I say that that is not right, and the House might just as well accept the proposal of the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government. When a Minister makes a statement such as that made by the Premier to the House, he is entitled to some answer from the other side; but the honorable gentleman leading the Opposition gave no answer whatever. When the honorable gentleman made his proposal they remained silent and allowed the question to be put. I do not see why there should be any objection to the postponement of the no-confidence motion until Tuesday. There would be no loss of time. It would expedite matters if the Opposition were to accede at once to the proposal of the Government. I presume the honorable gentlemen do not wish to debar the Native Minister from making his Statement on Native Affairs. I do not believe the debate on the no-confidence motion will be a long one. It would be desirable that the debate should be brought to a conclusion as soon as possible, in order that we may see how we are going to get out of the trouble we are in. Do honorable gentlemen opposite say that, should the want-of-confidence motion be carried, business will then go on smoothly, and that no disputes will occur? Why, there will be a perfect pandemonium in this House, and I look forward to as extraordinary a state of affairs as ever was witnessed in this House. On Tuesday the Government will be prepared to take a vote on the want-of-confidence motion, and will either retire or remain in office as they may determine. In the interest of every member of the House, and in the interest of the whole country, I do trust honorable members will withdraw this dogged obstruction, take the debate on the want-of-confidence motion next week, and allow private members a chance of getting on with their measures. In a similar state of affairs in the session of 1877 the honorable member for the Thames, from his seat on the Government benches, begged honorable members not to obstruct the progress of private business. He said, "Let private business go on, and take the want-of-confidence motion afterwards." That request was well received by the House. I do hope that the leaders of the Opposition will recollect that they themselves have been placed in a similar position, and that they will accede to the proposal of the Premier to take the want-of-confidence motion on Tuesday. In the meantime we can clear the Order Paper of the private business.

Mr. SPEIGHT.—For the same reason given by the honorable member for Geraldine why the House should take one course, I think that exactly the opposite ought to be adopted. In the interest of members of this House, and in the interest of the country, the sooner this question is settled the better. The honorable member tells us that he tried to look at this matter as impartially as he could, and, having done so, he has arrived at a certain conclusion. I believe he has done so with the best intention, but in this case he had formed a foregone conclusion in his mind, and, however much he tried to disturb that conclusion, he found it impossible to do so. He thinks that the business of the country is being impeded because of the motion just made. I think honorable members on this side of the House claim at least as great a desire to facilitate the business of the country as the honorable gentleman. We recognize that in the present position of affairs the question of want of confidence should be disposed of at once by a prompt and distinct vote. Nothing else will settle the question but a prompt and distinct vote. The honorable gentleman thinks that the proposal of "the previous question," if carried, will block all private business. I apprehend that the suggestion of the honorable member for Bruce is the correct one. Let the motion be passed, and immediately take up private business. Let Government business go by for the present. Let the first division apply to the other proposals of the Government. However much honorable members may desire to get on with the business, it cannot be attended to so long as this motion of want of confidence is left undisposed-of. I think honorable members on both sides of the House recognize that. We should recognize this, also: that, whether the Native Minister will have had an opportunity of bringing forward his Statement or not, he will have an opportunity of bringing forward whatever he pleases as a private member of the House. I am not in a position to say how the vote of want of confidence will go, nor, personally, do I care much; but I say that the matter should be disposed of at once, and that we should proceed to business. It ought to be distinctly understood that, in voting for "the previous question," we do not destroy any of the Bills that appear on the Order Paper, or of which notice has been given, nor, indeed, impede them. Honorable gentlemen seem to think that, because certain proposals have been put in writing and not acceded to, further correspondence ought to take place on the matter, and that then it could be settled on the floor of the House in two or three moments. If the Ministry feel that the proposal of the honorable member for Port Chalmers is worthy of consideration, why should they not at once agree to a compromise to have the matter settled on Friday? In such case, we could go on with the private business at once. The honorable member for Geraldine tells us that, if this motion of no-confidence is carried against the Government, and they are turned out of office, a perfect pandemonium will ensue. I trust that is not meant as a threat as to the course of conduct that will be pursued by that honorable gentleman in this House should the motion be carried. If it should be the intention of the honorable gentleman to indulge in any antics tending towards a pandemonium, I hope he will remember that there is a Speaker in the chair who will protect the dignity of this House. I will only repeat that, in voting for the previous question moved by the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan), we are really bringing the business of the country to a focus; we are bringing the matter up to a distinct point, where it must be settled. Until that point has been reached and that matter has been settled it is utterly impossible that we can get on with the business of the country. I do trust the motion will be passed without any further delay.

Mr. READER WOOD. — I take the same extremely impartial view of the question that most honorable members are taking. I really think the Government should not throw any obstacles in the way of acceding to the request made. They told us that they wanted an opportunity to place their policy before the House and the country. They have had that opportunity, and they have taken the opportunity. Here are their Bills, not only on the Order Paper, but most of them are in print. And to show my extreme impartiality, I will simply say that, as regards the first Bill—the Electoral Bill—I think it is far superior in every possible way to the Bill which was placed on the table of the House by the late Government the session before last. That Bill was full of all sorts of fanciful provisions, which no one could understand: it was impossible to see how the measure could operate. On the contrary, the Bill which the honorable gentleman has placed before the House is clear and simple, and recognizes the principle that every man who is called upon to obey the law and to pay the taxes has a right to a voice in the election of those who make the laws and impose the taxes. They have put that policy of theirs before the House and the country. What more do they want? Do they want it carried? What could they wish for, more than to have their Bills put before the House and the country? After all, their Bills are simply the Bills of the late Government. They may be somewhat modified in detail, and under the present circumstances those Bills would have had to be modified by the late Government. They simply say that they are ready to adopt the policy of the late Government as the Liberal policy. With regard to finance, it was said that was most important. We did everything we possibly could to facilitate the honorable member in bringing forward the Statement he proposed to make last night. The honorable gentleman says that they want to place their policy before the House. There was no policy placed before the House last night by the Colonial Treasurer. He told us that he was simply making a Financial Statement. It was a Statement that could have been made in five minutes, and would have answered just as well in the want-of-confidence debate as in the more formal manner in which he brought it forward. There is no doubt whatever about one thing, that, unless the Government has the support of a majority in this House, it is quite impracticable that business of any sort can be carried on. Honorable members fancy that private business can go on after this question has been settled. There is scarcely a private Bill on the Order Paper that does not affect our policy and our finance in some way or other, and the House will demand that the Government shall lead it in considering those measures. How can the House be led by a Government that has not the confidence of the House? It is not the slightest use. You may advance these measures a stage or two, in the course of a week or ten days there may be a Government on those benches holding entirely different views, and what you have done may have to be done over again. Honorable gentlemen may say, Let the House proceed with the first Order of the day, the Auckland Harbour Foreshore Sale Bill. Well, that is a measure involving a question of policy, and it is impossible to say what course the Government might think it advisable to take in regard to it. They would have to look into what had been done before, and into the possible operation of the Bill. We should like the Government to guide the House as to the course it should take in the matter. Unless the House has confidence in the Government, and knows that the Government is likely to be a stable Government, there is not the slightest use in going on with the business. Then, with regard to the notices of motion now on the Order Paper, it is possible that the House might consider one or two of these motions. But here is Motion No. 3: "Major Te Wheoro to move, That Crown grants be issued for those lands which have been returned to the Maoris by the Government." There you have got the whole Native policy of the Government opened up at once. What is the use of discussing such a question as that, when you may see another Native Minister occupying those benches in a week or two? The only point that appears to me to be left is the Statement of the Native Minister, which is to be made some time or other. I really do not see much use in an exposition of the Native policy of the Government. What does it amount to? I really do not know. Probably the main feature will be a financial one. Well, we had that a few days ago, from the honorable member for the Thames, who told us precisely what the Colonial Treasurer told us yesterday, that the vote had been very considerably exceeded. I do not think there is anything more to be said about that. But, if the Native Minister is going into all sorts of questions of peace or war, what is the use of doing so, unless the Government first of all assert their position in this House? When they have done that, and secured a majority, then we can listen not only with pleasure, as we always do, to the Native Minister, but with a knowledge that we are actually doing business. But, as it is now, we shall simply listen, and, no doubt, be very charmed by what he says; we shall hear his views,—but who cares about his views, unless we know that they are supported by a majority of this House, and will become the practical policy of the country? I do not see that we can go on with any real business until this question is actually settled.

Colonel TRIMBLE. — I will not detain the House very long, but perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words on this question. I am going to follow the example of my friends opposite, and intend to offer a little advice. That has been the course all round; the honorable gentlemen opposite are so exceedingly fraternal in their feeling towards the Government that they cannot refrain from giving their advice. Now, my advice will come from their own side, and it is that, whether the debate on the want-of-confidence motion comes on on Tuesday next, or Tuesday week, or Tuesday fortnight, they will make it a point to place their measures as a record on the table of the House. It is nonsense to tell us that, by having them on the Order Paper, or by having them even in print in an unofficial way, they are brought in any sense before the House or the country; and I trust my honorable friends on the Government benches will resist in every possible way any attempt to prevent them from putting these measures in an official form before the House. With regard to the tactics adopted by the Opposition, I say advisedly that during the last hundred years they are entirely unprecedented. I say that very deliberately, and after having looked into the matter with some degree of care. In the Home-country, which, after all, is the precedent we are bound to follow, it has been invariably the case that, even when a Ministry has resigned—having still a small majority in the House of Commons—it has given its opponents ample time to mature their measures and to lay them before the country. And on one memorable occasion—I think, in the year 1866—when Lord Derby came into power, he had only one-third of the House of Commons in his favour and two-thirds opposed to him. Although the Queen had recommended the then Ministers not to resign, the Conservative Government were installed in power. They remained in office until it suited their own convenience to have a dissolution—in the autumn of 1868,—and, except towards the end of the term, at no time during their term of office were they disturbed by factious opposition or by any adverse motion. Gentlemen in this House who call themselves Liberals might, I think, take a lesson from that. The majority of the House of Commons on that occasion were Liberals; the majority of the House had set their minds upon great liberal measures; and yet they allowed their opponents to go on with the business of the country undisturbed. The Government now in office here do not ask to be left in power. They ask to be judged by their measures; and I think this House will not be true to its trust if it does not give them time to develop those measures and lay them fairly and fully before the country; and more particularly on this ground: that our opponents come into this House pretending to be Liberals. We on this side of the House accuse them of being—to use an expression which, of course, I do not mean in any sense offensively—wolves in sheep's clothing. We say that they are not Liberals at all. We say that they must be judged by their measures, which hitherto have not been framed in the true spirit of Liberalism, and that the measures which our friends on this side of the House are introducing, judged by the true principles of Liberalism, will meet the requirements of the country, and be satisfactory to those who send us here. I say that, under the circumstances, such a reasonable proposition as that offered to the leader of the Opposition ought to be accepted at once; and, if it be not accepted, I would recommend the Ministry to use every form of the House, until those forms are all exhausted, to remain in their places until they have developed their policy. And I would recommend them to take their time. The interval between this and Tuesday is a very short time indeed considering the business before them, and if it should prove too short I should throw the blame upon the obstructionists.

MR. SUTTON.—It seems to me that the leaders of the Opposition are very liberal indeed, so long as they hold seats on the Government benches and have an opportunity of talking Liberalism to the country. But immediately those honorable gentlemen are removed from the Government benches their Liberalism deserts them. I am one of those who think it is absolutely necessary that we should pass these liberal measures and place them upon the Statute Book as soon as possible. I care not one straw whether the party to which I have the honor to belong should have the credit of introducing them, or whether that credit should devolve upon the leaders on the other side. I say they are important measures, and let us pass them. But I am one of those who think that the so-called liberal measures introduced by the late Government were not altogether and entirely liberal. I think that the measure which we have before us now—the Electoral Bill—is far more advanced in the way of Liberalism than any Bill which has preceded it; and I trust the House will go on with these measures, and will, at all events, read them a second time, to give the Government sufficient time to bring down their policy and explain what they intend to do. It seems to me that the opposition which we are meeting with on the present occasion is very uncalled for. I cannot shut out from my mind the impression that the motive which influences those honorable gentlemen opposite in the course they are now pursuing is a desire to regain the seats they have so deservedly lost. If they were really anxious to carry the liberal measures which they have so flaunted before the country, we should not find this factious opposition. I am not certain whether the very full and able Statement which we had last night from the Colonial Treasurer, disclosing as it did the very serious and frightful state of our finances, has not so alarmed those honorable gentlemen that they are now prepared to strain every nerve lest further exposures should take place in other departments. We have been charged during this debate by the honorable member for the Thames with having stolen the clothes of the Opposition. I remember reading in Hansard that in the session of 1875 a Bill to give manhood suffrage, very nearly in the same terms as those in which it is now proposed to give it, was introduced into this House by an honorable gentleman who was then, I think, a member of the Atkinson Ministry—the Hon. Mr. Reynolds.

I have no doubt a good many honorable members will hear with a considerable amount of concern and astonishment that among those who opposed that Electoral Bill becoming the permanent law of the land was the late Premier (Sir G. Grey), the honorable member for the Thames, and other honorable members who are now leading the Opposition party. If they had wanted manhood suffrage, Sir, they could have obtained it five years ago. A Bill with that object was laid on the table of this House; its second reading was moved by Mr. Reynolds, then member for Dunedin City; but it was shelved on a motion of the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) that it be read a second time that day six months. I repeat, Sir, that those gentlemen are only Liberals when it suits their own purposes. We have heard a great deal about a redistribution of seats according to population. About three years ago my honorable friend the member for Kaiapoi introduced a Bill to carry out a redistribution of seats; and what did we find on that occasion? We found that the same gentlemen who are now so rabidly in favour of such a measure were then strong in their opposition to it, and that they all voted against it. Some of the honorable gentlemen who are opposing the passage of these measures seem to be under the impression that the no-confidence motion—which, by-the-by, has got wonderfully low down on the Order Paper—when it comes on for debate, will only occupy half an hour. I think that in all probability the debate will last for four or five days—very likely two or three weeks. It will be incumbent upon those honorable gentlemen who argue against the longer retention of the present Ministry in office to show why those honorable gentlemen are not entitled to continue in their seats. It will be incumbent upon them to show that the present Government have not brought forward a policy acceptable to the country, and that they have so mismanaged the affairs of the country as to forfeit its confidence. The position is now very different from what it was a month ago. We have a Ministry scarcely seated on those benches, against whom no act of maladministration can be brought, and consisting of gentlemen of known character in the colony for many years; and I say that the country, from one end to the other, will condemn us unless we give those gentlemen time to bring in their measures, and to lay before the country the proposals which they think ought to be adopted. Whether or not the result of this debate be the exclusion from those benches of the gentlemen who now occupy them, I am certain that the turmoil of the session is only just commencing. I see nothing whatever in the component parts of the Opposition to warrant me in believing that anything like a firm and strong Government will be formed from their side of the House. I shall oppose the motion of the honorable member for the Thames, and I shall also do all in my power to assist the Government in obtaining a fair hearing from this House and from the country.

Captain RUSSELL.—I should like to say one or two words on this question, and particularly in reference to the speech of the honorable member for Waitemata, who endeavoured to convince this House that it would be absolutely impossible for the Government to carry on their measures unless they had a majority in this House. Now, I imagine it was during the time the honorable member was in the House that a very remarkable example was afforded by those honorable gentlemen who lately occupied the Treasury benches of the possibility of a Government carrying on not only during one session, but during two sessions, without a majority in this House; and, by a system which they then taught us, I think it is quite possible that the present Government, by taking a leaf out of their book, may so avoid a debate on the no-confidence motion that it will be absolutely impossible to prevent the work of the country being carried on. I do not think it is advisable that such a thing should take place. We on this side of the House hope, honestly and truthfully, that we represent the constitutional party. We are people who are opposed to anything like factious opposition. Such being the case, I think it would be extremely injudicious for us to treat this no-confidence motion in the same way that the no-confidence motion nicknamed "the baby" by the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) was treated two or three sessions ago, when for many weeks that motion was carefully kept down on the Order Paper until the session was so far prolonged that it was impossible to bring the motion on at all. I think the Government would be wrong to resign their position until they have placed their policy before the country. Were I on the Treasury bench I should distinctly refuse to do so, and I should make no apology whatever. I should say, openly and straightforwardly, "I am going to do it," and I should do it. "Obstruct me as much as you choose; I do not care." I believe that would merit the confidence of the House, and would gain the confidence of the people outside the House. And then think of their ingratitude to the honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey). All those gentlemen who sit on the Opposition benches owe their position to Sir George Grey. If it had not been for him, they would have been absolutely nowhere now. It may be possible to turn the present Ministry out of their seats; but, without their head, without their brains, without the honorable member for the Thames, it would be absolutely impossible for the honorable gentlemen to hold their seats at all. I say, also, that, whoever is entitled to be called the leader of Liberalism, the honorable member for the Thames is, for it was he who first brought forward that cry, and I must say the honorable gentlemen opposite have treated their leader most ungratefully. It has not been my lot to support the honorable gentleman; it may never be my lot to do so; but, if the present Government is turned out, we shall have a Government with the honorable member for Port Chalmers at its head; and, much as I should feel myself incapable of following the honorable member for the Thames, I should have much more pleasure in doing that than in supporting the honorable member for Port Chalmers, because I feel convinced there is no real Liberalism in him.

The honorable member for Napier (Mr. Sutton), in speaking of the Qualification of Electors Bill of 1875, forgot one important point, which was this: that, when that Bill was before the House, the honorable member for Port Chalmers made a vigorous speech on the subject, which might be compressed into four words, which were, that nobody wanted the Bill. And if he did not want the Bill then, he would not want it now. I believe the honorable gentleman and his party are afraid of it. They know that if it goes to its second reading it will be impossible to burke it—it will be impossible for the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) and the honorable member for Port Chalmers to say, as in 1875, that nobody wants the Bill. That may be the feeling of the honorable member for Port Chalmers now, but, if he should succeed in putting out the present Government, it would be impossible for the Premier of a Liberal Government to say nobody wants the Bill. I therefore say that it would be extremely injudicious to delay this measure any longer. The honorable member for Waitemata said it would be impossible for any Government to carry on who had not a majority in the House. Now, it must be patent to the most partial observer that, even supposing that the honorable gentlemen opposite should succeed in getting on to the Government benches, they can only have a majority of one. I must commend them for the close attention they pay to the movements of honorable members, and for keeping gentlemen at all the doors of the House to tick off those members who may leave it for the purpose of taking a walk; but it will be impossible to keep up such a strain for weeks and months. Because we are in a minority, that is no reason why we should not introduce these Bills, more particularly when we have the knowledge that they are not likely to be introduced by the other side; for the honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey) voted against this Bill, or against a Bill almost identical with it, Mr. Sheehan voted against it, Mr. Thomson voted against it, and Mr. J. C. Brown voted against it, in 1875; and I have no doubt that people with such enduring characters as they have will not come down now and vote for a Bill which they so seriously disbelieved in three or four years ago. If we look back we shall see that the gentlemen who now compose the Ministry voted for the Bill. The honorable member for Egmont, the honorable member for Kaiapoi, and the honorable member for the Waikato voted for it; and, although I have not the Hansard in my hand to see who did and who did not vote for the Bill, it is beyond question that the members on this side represent the Liberal portion of the House, while those who claim to be such advocates of Liberalism are strongly opposed to it. No doubt they will tell you that they had very good reasons for opposing the Bill. One will tell you that it did not go far enough; another will tell you that it did away with the miners' rights; but the old aphorism, that language was given to us to hide our thoughts, seems to me admirably to apply to them. We cannot judge a man save by what he does in this House. Go to

Hansard and see how he votes: that is the only way to tell what he is. We have heard a good deal about Liberalism during the past two years, and we have heard many honorable gentlemen talk about what they have done. And what have they done? Go to the Statute Book, and what do you find there? Nothing. And here is an attempt being made to prolong what has been done for the last two years. An attempt is being made by Ministers to push on these Bills, and they are immediately opposed by the other side. Now, I always vote for a measure that I believe will be advantageous to the country. As a party man, I can usually be depended on to support my party; but I always support any Bill of which I approve; and I would urge those honorable gentlemen to allow these Bills, which are for the good of the country, to come on. Is it merely a question who shall move first in the matter? Have we so little patriotism, as the honorable member for Waitemata puts it, that we refuse to go on because of the fact that somebody-else's name is on the face of the Bill? I cannot believe it, because, if that were so, with the possibility of another want-of-confidence motion coming on in three weeks, the session may be a blank, and these Bills will never be recorded on the Statute Book. We ought to avoid such a thing as that, if possible. The great object ought to be to push on the business as fast as possible, and the only way in which this can be done is to frankly acknowledge that the House desires to pass these measures. Besides, why should the honorable gentlemen be in so great a hurry to turn the present Government off the Ministerial benches? Had I been a member of the late Government, I should never have been a party to giving any colour to those rumours which we hear outside, and which it is absurd to ignore. It would have been to their credit, and, in a political point of view, much to their good, to have challenged the fullest investigation. I should have said, "As soon as you have had time to go through the records, I shall bring a vote of want of confidence against you. If you prove anything against us, well and good; and, if not, we shall then be more strongly established than ever." That would have been a most judicious, and, in their own interest, wise course to have adopted. It is the merest affectation to ignore the feeling that exists in the public mind. Public confidence has been seriously shaken by the rumours that have gone abroad. Go where you will, you hear people talking in the most serious manner of the gross maladministration of the past two or three years, and I think the Government should have every opportunity of probing these statements to the bottom. They should refuse to leave their places until they have had an opportunity of doing so. I think the honorable member for Port Chalmers was wrong not to accept the offer of the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government to take the discussion on the want-of-confidence motion on Tuesday next. He must know that it is possible to postpone his motion for an indefinite period, and in the interests of his party he should have accepted the suggestion.

Mr. WHITAKER.—Sir, I believe I am in order in moving that this debate be adjourned until half-past seven o'clock. I do so, because I am happy to say, from what I have heard outside, that better counsels may shortly prevail, and that some compromise will be come to in this unfortunate matter. It appears to me, as far as I have heard from the speeches of honorable members, that there is but one feeling about the matter, and that feeling is, that this discussion is a great waste of the time of the country. Every honorable member who has addressed the House has said the same thing; and yet neither side of the House is willing to give way. Although the leaders of parties have not, I believe, met, still I have heard remarks made outside the House which lead me to believe that some compromise may be arrived at; and therefore I move the adjournment of the debate till this evening. I do so with the more confidence because this is a private members' day, and therefore I am sure honorable members will be glad to have an opportunity of bringing forward the business that is on the Order Paper. My experience in the House itself has not been of long duration, but I have had many opportunities of watching its proceedings, and I do not recollect any occasion on which obstruction has been offered to bringing on the business of private members, which is of great importance to the localities they represent. It would be a very harsh proceeding to offer such obstruction, and therefore I think it would be well to postpone this discussion for a short time. I need hardly remind honorable members on the other side that if the honorable gentleman, the leader of our party, chooses to carry out what he has said the Government could do—namely, use the forms of the House to prevent the want-of-confidence motion being brought on till he has put a clear statement of affairs before the country—he can carry out that course, and, if they compel him, he will, I have no doubt, however reluctantly, do so. I trust, therefore, the adjournment till half-past seven o'clock will be agreed to, so that some concessions may be made on one side and on the other. I apprehend, Sir, I shall be in order in saying a few words on the general question?

Mr. SPEAKER.—On the question of granting leave to introduce the Qualification of Electors Bill—yes.

Mr. WHITAKER.—I want to dispel one delusion which seems to prevail in the mind of that extremely independent member, the honorable member for Hokitika (Mr. Seddon). Of all the independent members I have ever heard address the House, he is the most curious. The honorable gentleman got up and said he was an independent member, that he wanted this party fight to be stopped, and business to be pressed on; and yet he made the most violent party speech that has been made during this debate, and accused us on this side of the House of obstructing business. It appears to me he was not going the right way to show his independence by attacking so violently the party that was not working with him. Then he said, in the most off-hand way, that we were opposing the wishes of a majority of this House. How does he know that his side is in a majority?

Mr. SEDDON.—By the last division.

Mr. WHITAKER.—By the last division! I apprehend, if the two members of our party who were absent had been here, it would have been a tie, and on the previous division we had a majority of two. I cannot see, therefore, how we can be said to be in a minority now. It is quite possible that honorable gentlemen on the opposite side may be just as much deceived with regard to their having a majority on the next division as they were when they thought they had a majority before. It is not to be taken as a matter of gospel, because the honorable member for Hokitika says the majority is theirs, that it is so. That is a matter of opinion on his part. I have had as long experience here as he has had, and my opinion is quite as good as his, and I do not feel by any means confident that any such majority exists on that side. My remarks are founded on observation. I do not pretend to know more, but, at all events, I think I know as much as the honorable member; and I am sure his statement is without any foundation. I will show the honorable gentleman and others on his side of the House why that is so, and why there is dissension in their party. I want to know why we see that party without its natural leader, the honorable member for the Thames. I want to know where the honorable member for Dunstan was six or seven years ago, where he was two or three years ago, where he was at the beginning of the session, where he is now, and where he is likely to be before long, in the event of certain contingencies. Is that their majority? Then there is another honorable member who voted with them on the last division, and who has left us. We have tried to drag him back again, but he sticks to his new-found friends at present as firmly as an oyster to a rock. It is therefore absurd to talk about a majority. That honorable gentleman, for notions of his own, left us, and, if disappointment should meet him, he may again be found leaving the ranks of the Opposition. I call attention to these facts to show that those honorable gentlemen have no right to claim that they have a majority. If it were possible to see that there was a good working majority on that side—if we could determine in our own minds that they had a majority able to carry on the business of the country—I should be the first—to use a sporting phrase—to throw up the sponge, and by all means proceed with business. But I cannot see it. I look around the ranks of that party and see those who have voted for triennial Parliaments and for extended franchise, and those who have voted against them: I see Greyites and anti-Greys; I see those who will have nothing to say to Sir George Grey, and those who will have everything to say to him; I see those who say that Sir George Grey is the saviour of New Zealand, and, sitting side by side with them, and ready to go into the same lobby with them, those who say that he is the destroyer of New Zealand. I say that the fortunes of New Zealand should not be lightly given into the hands of a party so composed. They should show us that they have a large and substantial majority before they ask us to consent to our party vacating the Government benches. At all events, they should not try to turn us out in the arbitrary manner they seem inclined to use. I am certain the words I now utter will find an echo in the minds of many of those honorable members. There was a strong phalanx which came down here pledged absolutely to support the honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey), for reasons which no doubt they very well understood. The late Premier has been deposed, and another king reigns in his stead. Surely those honorable gentlemen are not pledged to the honorable member who is to move the want-of-confidence motion.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the honorable gentleman is straying away from the question before the House.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Sir, I wish to make a personal explanation with regard to what has been stated as to myself by the honorable member. I understand that he says there was a negotiation going on in which I was concerned. I beg to say no such negotiation is now pending—none whatever. It is a mistake altogether. It came to an end at three o'clock.

Mr. WHITAKER.—I beg the honorable gentleman's pardon. I heard a conversation going on in the lobby in a loud tone of voice. The honorable gentleman was there; and I heard a proposition made that he should propose to the Government that the no-confidence motion should be taken after the Native Minister's Statement on Friday evening. I did not say he was pledged to that arrangement. I said I believed the leaders of the parties had not met, and therefore I did not mean to say that the honorable gentleman had agreed to the proposition; but, being challenged, I say I heard that conversation taking place. It is useless that I should mention the names of the honorable members who were present.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—The honorable gentleman did not listen long enough. I may refer to the gentlemen who were present, and they will confirm me when I say that I declined to make any terms whatever without the consent of my party to the negotiations.

Mr. WHITAKER.—I said I believed the leaders of the party had not been consulted; but I presumed at the time that the honorable gentleman had communicated with his party. I hoped he would do so, and regret that he has not; for, no doubt, if he had, something would have been agreed to. I did not say the honorable gentleman took upon himself to make any arrangement. Well, Sir, I believe you ruled me out of order in referring to matters connected with the vote of want of confidence. I will therefore not do so. So far as my parliamentary experience goes, these motions for leave to introduce Bills do not generally occupy a very long time, or engage very much the attention of the House. They are not like second readings, and the whole thing can be got through in a very few minutes. The honorable member for Auckland City East spoke very well, as usual, and very much to the point. He said he was quite unaware of how the division was going, and he further added—what seemed to me at the time to be superfluous—that he did not care. I was glad to find the honorable gentleman in that frame of mind; but I thought that, when the division-bell rang, he would know quite well what lobby to walk into. Of course it would be into the lobby into which those went who did not wish to obstruct business. However, I was going to say the honorable member for Auckland City East made a suggestion that we should take the division upon the postponement of this particular motion, and let the other Government Bills abide by the fate of it. But surely it will not take long to get through all these motions for leave to introduce Bills; there will be no waste of time in taking them all; and then we shall have before the House and the country all those liberal measures which both sides are willing to support. Our object is clear: their object in interrupting these Bills is by no means clear—for this reason, that half-an-hour would get through the whole thing. They seem to have some fear that the Government will get these measures before the country and before this House. I do not know why. I do not know whether it is, as the honorable member for Napier (Mr. Sutton) says, that they are afraid of the Bills themselves. I do not know whether it is that they really do not intend to pass these Bills when they get on those benches. I do not know whether it is that they have a horror, after all they have said about the Premier being a Conservative, of allowing him to introduce these measures. I do not know whether they are afraid that it will be flashed all over the colony that the great Conservative Government, as they termed it, have introduced liberal measures. But why do they not allow these Bills to be introduced? The honorable member for Waitemata, in an admirable speech, said he very much approved of these Bills; that they were very much superior to the Bills of the late Government. I thoroughly agree with that honorable gentleman. I believe that they are infinitely superior to the other Bills, and I feel certain that, if that honorable gentleman had a chance of voting for those Bills, outside of party feeling, he would do so. Now, if those Bills are superior to the others, and if the Government ask leave to introduce them, why not permit that to be done? If those honorable gentlemen opposite get into power it would then be possible for them to take up these Bills; but look at our position. We say that we have a definite and decided reason why we want leave to introduce these Bills. Our reason is, that a number of us belonging to this party are quite as liberal as, and perhaps more so than, the majority of the gentlemen on the other side, and we object altogether to have our title to that name questioned, as it has been inside and outside this House, by the party now in opposition. It has been said of me that I was going to follow certain persons who would never bring down liberal measures. Now, I wish to see this Bill advanced a stage, in order to show the House and the country that the Government are prepared to keep faith with them, and are prepared to scrupulously carry out the engagements entered into by the Premier. I say that it is only fair to the Premier that he should have an opportunity of vindicating his character against the aspersions cast upon him. I will now proceed to say a few words upon a subject on which there seems to be a misapprehension in the House. I lay it down as an absolute constitutional principle that a Ministry on taking office are entitled to some time to bring down their measures. I will read the following extract from Todd's "Parliamentary Government in England" to show that my premisses are absolutely correct. [Extract read.]

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the honorable gentleman is reading extracts applicable to the want-of-confidence motion, and is therefore out of order.

Mr. WHITAKER.—I bow to your decision, Sir. Some allusion has been made to the circumstances of 1877, as being similar to the present state of affairs; but I think there is a wide difference between them. On the present occasion, there is no proof that there is a majority of the House against Ministers. In 1877 it was perfectly well understood, and admitted by Ministers themselves, that there was a majority against them. But, notwithstanding that there was a majority against them, they still retained power; and these gentlemen, who are now wasting the time of the country in endeavouring to prevent the Government from bringing in their measures, managed to secure a majority in 1878. I cannot understand how those honorable gentlemen can desire to obstruct business when the Government only desire a fair chance of putting forth their policy. It is said that a new Ministry should receive great forbearance. [Extract read.]

Mr. SPEAKER.—I called the honorable member's attention to the fact that he was reading from a book large extracts, which had no bearing on the question of adjournment. The honorable member then said he would bow to my decision; but he is again reading extracts not applicable to the present debate.

Mr. HALL.—We are placed in a difficult position by the action of the honorable gentlemen opposite, in endeavouring to place, on any vote we may come to on this question, a particular construction. They claim, for any vote on this question in which we may be in a minority, the character of a vote of want of confidence. As long as they do that, surely it is right of honorable members to address themselves to that point. If honorable gentlemen persist in that course, it is rather upon them than upon us that the responsibility should rest.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I cannot allow this debate to anticipate the want-of-confidence motion; and I feel it my duty, as far as possible, to restrict it to the question before the House.

Mr. WHITAKER.—I bow to your decision, Sir, with the greatest respect. I have not much more to say upon the question of this adjournment. I hope the House will now vote for the adjournment of the debate until half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. HALL.—There is no doubt that there is a lamentable loss of public time taking place. The question is, Who is responsible for it? What is the right course for us to pursue on the present occasion? Of course, Sir, I wish to adhere as closely as possible to your ruling, not to go into that question of want of confidence upon a mere motion for adjournment; but I may go so far as to say that what we are contending for is simply the ordinary and, I may say, the invariable constitutional rule, that a Government coming into office with a majority has a right to a fair trial. It has been said that we are not true Liberals, and that if we came into power with liberal professions we should not give effect to those views when in power. The question now is, whether, under these circumstances, we, who now tell the House that we have liberal measures ready to put before the House and before the country, shall be deprived by an arbitrary vote of the opportunity of placing those measures upon the table of the House. That is the question. As the honorable gentleman stated, a short time indeed would have sufficed to have put these measures upon the Order Paper. We do not ask the House to read these Bills a second time until the question has been decided whether or not we possess the confidence of the House. But I say we have a right, in fairness to ourselves and in fairness to the country, to be in a position to see our measures officially on the table of the House. The honorable member for Grey and Bell—who has not been sufficiently long in this country to be strongly attached to any colonial party, but who has had political experience in the mother-country, and is able to take an impartial view of our proceedings—has shown in the clearest possible manner that we have a right to be allowed to submit our policy to the House and to the country. The honorable gentlemen opposite say that, if we agree to their terms, they will be satisfied. We are not prepared to put our necks under the heels of those honorable gentlemen. We have got the support, if not of the majority of this House, of a very large section of it. Honorable members may possibly carry a vote of want of confidence. I do not think they will; but, supposing they do, then it will be for us to say, as has been said by greater and better men than ourselves, that we will remain on these seats until our Bills are placed before the House. In deference to your ruling, Sir, I will not go into the constitutional question at present—into precedents which run back a hundred years and come down to modern times in the Old Country—but I go back to the history of this colony. Within my own personal knowledge, on three separate occasions, the Government has stood in a position similar to the present. On every one of those occasions the great constitutional principle for which we are contending has been asserted by the House. The House would not condemn the Government unheard on any one of those occasions. On the first of them, some twenty-three years ago, I personally occupied the position I now occupy—the position of Colonial Secretary. We were allowed nine days on that first occasion. On the second, a greater length of time was allowed. On the third occasion, in 1877, the House distinctly, in so many words, refused to consider a motion of want of confidence until the Government had had a fair opportunity of putting their policy before the House. When the proper time comes, I shall be prepared to show that every constitutional rule is in favour of the position that we now take up. It is a matter of greater importance now, when we are making history in the infancy of a community, that we should lay down and adhere to the great constitutional principles which are to guide us for the future, than that there should be a paltry party triumph. It is said that the Opposition have by arguments—not used inside of this House, but outside of it—converted one or two gentlemen who voted in our favour. That is really the pith and marrow of their speeches. They say, You had a majority the other day; we have got a majority now. And therefore, without any discussion of policy at all, we are at once to leave these seats. We should be altogether faithless to the trust reposed in us if we listened for one moment to that proposition. We simply claim the length of time which on a former occasion of this kind was granted to another Government. And yet my honorable friend the member for Akaroa, who claims to be head and shoulders above everybody else in his impartiality, descends to the level of miserable party considerations. My honorable friend seconded the motion for “the previous question,” in order that these liberal measures, of which he professed to be such an admirer, should not be proceeded with. Would the honorable gentleman like to go back to Canterbury with us and say he turned out the Government because he did not believe in their measures? When we want to prove ourselves true Liberals, the honorable member seconds a motion which would deprive us of the opportunity. What miserable inconsistency! I am glad to see that my honorable friend is blushing. There is hope of his repentance. If we have a division, I am sure he will come to our side. As I said before, what is now the question? The question is, whether we shall go on with the motion of want of confidence on Tuesday, or whether we shall have it on Friday. The difference between us is but a single day.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—You can carry on the business on Monday.

Mr. HALL.—We have been quite ready to entertain that proposal. We have offered all the concessions we can possibly make without absolute loss of self-respect. Did I understand the honorable gentleman to suggest that the business could be proceeded with on Monday?

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—If the motion were taken on Friday, we could go on with the debate on Monday.

Mr. HALL.—We have offered every fair concession. The question now is, whether, for the sake of one sitting-day, we are to lay down a wrong constitutional principle. I am, of course, only stating what I believe to be the sentiments of those honorable gentlemen who support me. I am entirely in their hands. I am giving effect to their views in the course I am adopting. I may sum up the position in a few words: Honorable gentlemen opposite are—I do not use the word offensively—exceedingly obstinate in the matter: but we will be as firm as they are obstinate. I would ask my honorable friend the member for Akaroa, who does not seem altogether lost as yet to a sense of propriety, not to take up a position intended to lead the country to believe that what we are doing now is not endeavouring to carry out constitutional principles, but merely engaging in an indecent scramble for office. That is the appearance this struggle would wear. The Opposition have, outside of this House, made one or two converts, and, as soon as they have done that, the Government are to be unseated untried. That will wear the appearance of an indecent scramble for office. I ask honorable gentlemen, for the sake of the character of this House, not to entertain a proposal of this kind, and not to object to the reasonable proposal which we have put before the House. If they do, it will inspire me with a very sad feeling; it will indicate an utter want of conciliation, an utter want of a spirit of concession, and an utter want of forbearance. If honorable gentlemen opposite do take these seats, they will find that there never was a Government which had need of so much forbearance, of so much conciliation, and of so much concession as theirs. If they make this unfortunate exhibition of a contrary spirit before they have any actual official responsibility to deal with, how can they possibly go on as a Government? They will have to make concessions at every point. It augurs exceedingly badly for the happiness of the political family which aspires to these seats. I will not trouble the House with any further remarks at present. Of course the debate has to go further. If it should be adjourned, I hope my honorable friend the member for Akaroa will endeavour to impose a more considerate disposition upon his colleagues—I do not say upon the leader of the Opposition. I believe, if that honorable gentleman had been allowed to follow out his own inclination, we should have arrived at an arrangement long ago. I have known the honorable gentleman for many years, and I have never, as a rule, found him to be at all unreasonable. I know that above all things he abhors waste of time. If the debate is adjourned until half-past seven o'clock, I hope honorable members will then be able to come to some arrangement. We have done enough to show the country that for this loss of time that has taken place—a loss of time exceedingly to be deplored—not our firmness, but the obstinacy of the Opposition is responsible.

Mr. MACANDREW.—Sir, I may be allowed to say one word before the question is put. As far as I am concerned, I absolutely deny that it is either love of place or love of power that actuates me in the position I have taken up. I know very well that in taking up that position I am holding myself up as a conspicuous mark for the shafts of envy, malice, and detraction. I am quite aware of that. But what I am really aiming at is to be instrumental, even in a humble way, in the establishing in this country of real parliamentary government—that is, true, genuine government by party—to the absence of which in the past we may attribute a great deal of the evils of this country. The absence of true party government has been very detrimental, to say the least of it, to the interests of New Zealand. My main object is to assist in my own humble way to have real, true parliamentary government established here. If the object of this delay is simply to enable the Government to get all their measures placed officially before us, there is nothing whatever to prevent that. Surely it could have been done this afternoon. Had the Premier agreed to take the no-confidence motion on Friday, as we suggested, all the measures now on the Order Paper might have been advanced to a second reading to-day. I have no desire to waste the time of the House. Repeatedly the honorable member asks us, What is the question? Sir, I say, "To be, or not to be? That is the question." I therefore think we should go to a division as soon as possible.

Mr. BOWEN.—The honorable gentleman has again talked of the existence of parties in this House, and he says that, above all, he desires that there should be party government. Now, I would like to ask him again—if he wishes really to discuss the question of party—on what lines these parties are to be formed; because I am perfectly satisfied, from conversations I have had with honorable gentlemen on both sides of this House since this question has been before us, even if I had not been convinced of it before, that there is no party in this House—no party based on intelligible principles. The honorable gentleman may talk about party lines, and may talk about party votes, but the fact is, that it is merely a personal question that is dividing the House; and when he is laying down the law in this way to the House and to the present Government as to what they are to do, he ought to remember that he was a member of a Government that has just been condemned by the House for its maladministration. —(No.)—That is the case—condemned by two Parliaments for maladministration; and it comes very ill from a gentleman who has been in that position to say that the honorable gentlemen who have been called to the position of Ministers of the Crown, and intrusted with the administration of the country, should not even have an opportunity of laying their measures before the country and the House. Now, Sir, when this is the case, it is necessary for us to ask why this opposition is made—why those honorable gentlemen opposite are so afraid that the Government may be allowed to lay their measures before the House. I can only conceive, under the present circumstances, two reasons. One must be, that they are afraid of the country and the House having an opportunity of comparing and contrasting the measures of the present Government with those which have been laid on the table or promised by the late Government. That is one reason which would account for their conduct, and I believe they are afraid of having the careful measures which are now being laid before the country contrasted with the measures of the previous Ministry. Last year we saw an Electoral Bill brought down by the Government, and we saw at the same time an Electoral Bill introduced by a private member of the House—an honorable gentleman who is not now in this Chamber, the Hon. Mr. Whitaker—and it was by universal consent admitted that the machinery of the latter Bill was infinitely superior to that of the Government Bill. And, Sir, there is another reason that suggests itself to me why those honorable gentlemen are determined to obstruct the Government in their endeavour to lay these Bills before the House. They do not wish that the echo from the country should come back to this House before they have been able to take another division. They do not wish to hear what the country has to say about measures which this Government are going to lay on the table of the House. They do not choose that the new members of this House should hear what their constituents have to say about the position of public affairs, as revealed by the Ministerial Statements we are getting from the present Government. By keeping up a sort of terrorism over members, and by threatening to placard them all over the country if they do not obey orders, they are trying to frighten those who are new to this House, and who have not yet thoroughly established themselves within what they are pleased to call party lines. They are trying to snatch a division by coercing these honorable gentlemen before they have heard what their constituents have to say to the policy of the present Government. These are the only two reasons which can suggest themselves to any reasonable men for the action which the Opposition are at present taking. Because, after all, are they facilitating the progress of business in the House? It is perfectly well known that the Government have taken up a fair and reasonable stand, and that they are backed by their party in so doing. In fact, I am convinced that if the Government were to give way, and to allow the Opposition to dictate to them in this matter before they had an opportunity of laying their policy before the country, they would lose the support which they are now entitled to from a large part of this House. There is a very large section in this House which has determined that the Government shall have the opportunity to which they are constitutionally entitled; and if the Ministry were in a cowardly way to give up their right and their position, they would forfeit the esteem of the honorable gentlemen who are prepared to support and follow them now. Therefore I say the honorable gentlemen who are endeavouring to prevent an arrangement being made which only involves a question of the difference of a day, are rendering probable the postponement of the business of the country for an indefinite time. They must know that they are doing so, and that in the course they are taking they are neither consulting the interests of the country nor advancing the progress of business in this House. The fact is, that honorable gentlemen are forgetting, as I said before, that the question that was really before the country at the last election, and the question which has been before this Parliament and the previous one, was one of administration, and that good administration is more important to this House than a great many of the questions of policy which are constantly being brought up. What we want is good, sound administration; and I say that the gentlemen who are now on the Government benches command the confidence of the country, both from their character and from the large experience they have had in political affairs.—(No.)—Yes, I say character, Sir; and I do not think the honorable member for Waitaki is entitled—

Mr. SHRIMSKI.—I did not.

Mr. BOWEN.—The honorable gentleman interjects constantly, and he interjected "Character."

Mr. SHRIMSKI.—I did not.

Mr. BOWEN.—I am told it was the honorable member for Caversham. All I can say is, that those honorable gentlemen will not be affected as to their character by the honorable member's opinion. I say that their character is far above any imputation which can be thrown upon it by the honorable gentleman, and that it does command the confidence of the country. It is a monstrous thing that, when honorable gentlemen have been intrusted with the administration of the country in a fair and constitutional manner, the gentlemen whose administration has lately been condemned should be the men to come forward, and say they will not allow them to bring their policy before the House and the country. The House will insist that their policy shall be laid before the country, and those who support them will take very good care that every possible means that this House allows shall be used to enable them to place their policy before the country fairly. Now, what the Government have asked is simply this: that a Minister who has charge of one of the most arduous departments of the Government—the Native Department—who has been at work night and day in preparing a Statement with regard to that department—who I am afraid is overworking himself so far as his health is concerned—that this honorable gentleman should have the time which is necessary for him to prepare that Statement; and the Government has told the House that he will be unable to make it until Friday next.

An Hon. MEMBER.—It has been granted.

Mr. BOWEN.—No, Sir; it has not been granted. A Minister is not going to make an important statement of that sort in the middle of a want-of-confidence debate. Such a proposal is a monstrous one. It is absolutely indecent to attempt to press the Government in that way; and it is an indecency which will be resented, not only by this House, but by the country. The Hon. the Native Minister will give us a Statement on Native Affairs, which are notoriously in a very critical position, and he will inform the House of the views of the Government regarding those affairs—as I understand, and as has been stated to the House—on Friday evening; and the Government say that when that is done—if there is no obstruction by other persons—they will, on the next sitting-day, notwithstanding the pressure of work, take the motion of want of confidence. They are thus acting in a very different way from the manner in which the late Government acted in 1877; but they wish to deal fairly and reasonably with the House. They have stretched a point to meet the honorable gentlemen opposite, and I say they cannot go one step further towards meeting them. If those honorable gentlemen do not choose to accept the reasonable offer that is made, on them be the responsibility of the delay which will take place; and delay will certainly take place, because the House is determined that the Government shall have fair-play.

Mr. MOSS.—I think we might very fairly accept the responsibility. I, for one, am perfectly satisfied to do so. I do not think we ought to suffer ourselves to be misled by words used one day in one sense and the next day in another. Nothing astonishes me more now than to hear the honorable member for Kaiapoi speak of the arduous duties of the Native Department. Why, we were always told that the Native Department would be abolished. The late Opposition were perpetually inveighing against the Native Department—perpetually declaring that the sooner it was abolished the better for the country—that work was created simply because the department existed, and that, when they were in power, that, at all events, would be one of the excrescences that would be swept away. Now, Sir, we hear of the arduous duties devolving upon the Native Minister. I wish sincerely that, instead of wasting a day here, as has been the case, the Native Minister had remained in his office and made a step towards that Statement which we are to hear on Friday night. If the Native Minister had been excused from attending the debates of the House for the present, he might even have prepared the Statement by to-morrow. The honorable member for Waipa quoted a passage from Todd, forgetting, however, to add that the Ministry referred to—Pitt's Ministry—were kept in office so long by the good graces and support of the King. Without that, they could not have existed. This Ministry can expect no such support. They do not hold office in the interests and by command of the Sovereign, as Pitt's Ministry did; and I presume they do not for a moment contend that they hold office in the interests and by command of the Governor. Therefore the two cases are not parallel. Then, Sir, we are told that administration is more important than legislation. That is, I believe, a heresy. I consider that the legislation now before us is of a most important character, because on this legislation depends the maintenance of a fair incidence of taxation for all time to come. That is the main reason why I am so anxious to see these legislative measures carried out.

HOUSE RESUMED.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

ONEHUNGA WATER RESERVE BILL.

Mr. HAMLIN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, did not think it necessary to detain the House at any great length, inasmuch as the preamble of the Bill fully explained the reasons for introducing the measure. Honorable members belonging to the Provincial District of Auckland would recollect that, at the time this education reserve was made, it was made with a view of stopping the exercise of certain scrip which had been issued to Mr. Busby. This reserve was made an educational one in order to stop the effect which the exercise of Mr. Busby's scrip would have had on it. It was understood that in the course of time it would be returned by the Education Board, and that it would be reserved as an endowment for the Borough of Onehunga. He did not think, however, that the Education Board had the power to hand it back; and this short measure provided that after the passing of this Bill it was competent for this reserve, under the written authority of His Excellency the Governor, to become vested in the Borough Council of Onehunga as an inalienable trust. It had been for years past used as a general watering-place for the farmers and others resident outside of Onehunga, and it would be for the benefit of these people that the reserve should be vested in the Borough Council of Onehunga. Those who knew anything of the Epsom District were aware that during the summer-time it was very much in want of water, and, if this reserve were not made, people would be put to the necessity of driving their cattle a greater distance for watering purposes than they had been in the habit of doing. It was provided by the Bill that the Borough Council of Onehunga should plant the reserve—not for the purpose of shutting out the public, but for the purpose of beautifying the reserve. As he had said, the preamble of the Bill fully explained the whole matter, and he would simply now content himself with moving the second reading, reserving to himself the right to address the House at greater length in reply, should there be any opposition to the measure, which he did not presume would be the case.

Mr. SWANSON would like to know whether the Board of Education had had notice that this Bill would be brought in. He would also like to know whether this reserve was to be made a source of revenue to the people of Onehunga. He would like to know how the rights of the general public were to be preserved. He did not think that any objection would be raised to any amount of planting being done, so long as access could be had to the water. So long as the people of Onehunga beautified the place no objection would be raised against them; but it would be wrong to deprive the general public of their rights without telling them that such was intended to be done. He did not know whether the public or the Education Board had received any notice of this Bill. He might state at once that he never heard of any warning being given. He did not wish to oppose the Bill, but merely desired certain information before voting for the second reading.

Mr. W. J. HURST suggested the postponement of the motion for the second reading until that day week.

Sir G. GREY said that, with regard to the question raised by the honorable member for

Mr. Hamlin

Newton, he would state that probably he (Sir G. Grey) knew more about this subject than any other person, as he had originally made this reservation for the public. These springs were reserved for the world at large—for everybody. They were very valuable springs indeed; and in the original reservation there was no intention whatever of handing them over as a source of profit to any particular borough. The country in the neighbourhood was subject to drought in the summer, and certainly the original intention of the reservation of the springs was that everybody might have recourse to them for the purpose of obtaining water. Upon the other hand the time perhaps had now come when it would be desirable that the springs should be vested in some body which would make regulations for their use and preservation; and, if provision were put in the Bill which would prevent the borough making any profit from the water, he thought the Borough Council would be as good a body as any other to which they could be handed over. But certainly to hand them over to the borough as a means of raising a revenue, with power to shut all other persons out if they pleased, would be totally contrary to the original intention with which these springs were set apart for a reserve. Then, upon the education question, he really did not think the Education Board ought to be allowed to make a profit out of these springs. The Education Board was supplied with funds by the colony at large—what he might call ample endowments were provided for it—and he thought it should be viewed exactly in the same light as the Borough Council, and that the springs should be considered to be vested in the whole public, to whom it would be a matter of the greatest importance to be enabled to obtain water from the springs free of charge. He thought provision should be put into the Bill to obtain these rights.

Mr. ROLLESTON thought the House was entitled to more information upon the subject before the Bill was read a second time, and he therefore hoped it would be postponed. There was no doubt the reserve was originally vested in the Superintendent of Auckland, and if it had not been made an education reserve it would belong to the Crown. But it had been made a reserve for purposes of education, and, under the Act of 1877, would become vested in the Education Commissioners. It was well known that the local Boards of Education, under the existing law, were entitled to the revenue arising from these reserves, and before the House dealt with this question there ought to be some proper understanding in the matter. The Bill practically changed the purposes of the reserve, and asked the Crown to resign the revenue which would be raised from it for educational purposes. He agreed with the honorable member for the Thames that, if there were valuable springs on the land, they should be preserved for the use of the general public in a way in which this Bill would not preserve them. He should be happy to assist the honorable gentleman in charge of the Bill to put it in a proper shape when he knew more about the matter, and had ascertained the views of the trustees who were affected by it. It was a mistake to go on with such a Bill without apprising the people affected by it.

Mr. READER WOOD said they now saw precisely what he suggested they would see—namely, that in commencing the private business they would drift into confusion, because of there being no one to lead the House. All private Bills involved matters of policy, and it was the duty of the Government, when a private Bill was introduced, to ascertain what rights it affected, and inform the House of the precise position of the matter. The Minister of Lands now said that if the honorable member for Franklin would come and see him he would arrange matters, and put his Bill into shape. He ought to have done all that before. He felt sure that all the other private Bills would have to be postponed, because the Government were not in a position to lead the House, to tell them the nature of the Bills, or to deal with them in any way.

Mr. BOWEN said the Minister of Lands had led the House. It was the duty of the Government to see that no injustice was done to the persons affected by the promoters of the Bill, and the Minister of Lands had distinctly and carefully guarded that point. None knew better than the honorable member for Waitemata that no Government pretended to know all the details of private Bills. The duty of Ministers was to guard the public interests, and that they had taken care to do.

Mr. ROLLESTON said the Bill had only just been circulated, so that he had had no opportunity to carefully study its contents.

Mr. GISBORNE hoped the honorable gentleman in charge of the Bill would consent to postpone the second reading. It appeared that the reserves were vested in trustees for certain purposes; and it was a very dangerous thing, after Parliament had given land to a certain trust, to deal with the land and change the trust without the consent of the trustees, or without compensation in case of divesting them of property. That was a practice the House ought not to adopt without further consideration, and he hoped the honorable gentleman would consent to the postponement of the second reading.

Mr. HAMLIN said there appeared to be a misconception in the minds of honorable members who opposed the second reading of the Bill. They seemed to have an idea that the land was absolutely handed over in trust for educational purposes. In his few remarks in moving the second reading he thought he made it sufficiently clear that the reserve had simply been called an education reserve to prevent it from being taken up under the scrip issued to Mr. Busby. He did not know that it had in any way been properly reserved as an education reserve. But suppose it were taken by the Education Board, and were let in order to assist the educational requirements of the Auckland Provincial District, what would then be the position of the people of Epsom and other inhabitants of the district who required water for their stock? It would be under the entire control of the lessee, whoever he might be; and he could charge for the use of the water of the springs. The honorable member for Newton asked whether the Education Board of Auckland were aware of the introduction of this measure. In answer to that, he might say that the Bill was introduced and circulated last session, so that neither the Education Board nor anybody else could say that they were taken by surprise. If honorable members would allow the Bill to be read a second time now, he would promise that no further steps should be taken for ten or twelve days, so that full opportunity would be given for all necessary inquiry.

MINISTRY.

Mr. MACANDREW.—Sir, I beg to move, That the House do now adjourn. I regret exceedingly that I am driven to the adoption of this course; but I do not see that we are justified in going on with any business until the position of the Government in this House is satisfactorily settled. We offered to-day to go on with the business on condition that the Government would agree to the no-confidence motion being brought on on Friday. The Government having refused to do so, I can see no other course open to me but to move, That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. HALL.—My honorable friend has frequently said that he did not wish to obstruct the business of the House—that he would do anything rather than that. Now we have the whole evening before us. There is a large amount of private business which has stood upon the Order Paper for a considerable time, and which we might easily get through this evening; and the leader of the Opposition tells us that we must throw it all on one side and let it take its chance, and for no reason that I can see which at all justifies such a proceeding. If the honorable gentleman has so mismanaged his notice of motion as to get it on the Order Paper in such a position that it cannot be taken to-day, that is his fault. I do not think private members should be made to suffer for that. It is a great pity that the private business, which is of great importance to the country, should not be gone on with. I should deplore the waste of so much valuable time, and I think that will be the feeling of the House. However, if the honorable gentleman is bent on adopting that course, the private business must give way, because it is in the power of honorable members to obstruct to such an extent that we shall have to accept the motion; but I hope the honorable gentleman will withdraw it, in order that we may get through as much private business as possible.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, a great many honorable gentlemen, in speaking on the subject which occupies our attention just now, have said they spoke as independent members—as unprejudiced persons. Now, certainly, if any man in the House can speak as an independent member, and can offer advice in that capacity, it is myself. I stand here an outcast among men—first of all, deposed from those benches, and, secondly, having abandoned the position I held as leader of a great party. I will first address myself to this question.

We have been told there has been a great loss of time; and there has been a great wailing, more especially from the Government benches, over that supposed loss of time. I say no time has been lost. The time supposed to have been lost has been an inestimable boon to this country. I have had the great pleasure of sitting here and hearing honorable gentlemen, upon both sides of the House, irrevocably pledge themselves to most liberal measures, bidding against one another as men do at an auction, promising the community at large to introduce a system of democracy which we should not have reached for years under other circumstances; and all through yearnings for place and desires for pelf. The country now stands fifty years in advance of the position it occupied at the beginning of this session. I stand here with confidence. My desire is accomplished. I know that for New Zealand is gained now the certainty of measures which those who live in this country have for years desired.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Sir G. GREY.—Honorable gentlemen cannot retract. They must aid in obtaining these measures. They may say "No," but they cannot help themselves; they are pledged. Out of office or in office I will drag them as my slaves at the wheels of my chariot. They shall pass those measures. Though they hate me, they shall not go into the lobbies against me; they shall go into the same lobby as myself, and shall bestow upon New Zealand measures so liberal that I should not have dared to propose them, knowing they would be defeated. Is this loss of time? No; it is a triumphant gain. That is the first point. Let not those honorable gentlemen who have wavered be afraid their constituents will be angry with them on account of the loss of time, for such will not be the case. They will be glorified by their constituents for having achieved that which New Zealand longed for.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Sir G. GREY.—The Government whip says, "No." Perhaps he represents the secret thoughts of Ministers; but those thoughts will not find utterance. Though such may be their secret views, they will not dare to stand up in the face of the country and avow feelings of that kind. Next I proceed to the constitutional view of this question. I say that it is our duty, our bounden duty, the duty of those likely to take a place in the Government, and the duty of those who, like myself, are to remain in obscurity, to insist upon the Governor removing those friends of his from those benches. What has taken place? This House passed a resolution lately that it had no confidence in the Government "as at present constituted." It was the duty of every good man to bow to that resolution of the House; and I, wishing to set a good example first of all, strove to give effect to the decision of the House that a reconstruction of the Ministry should take place. I failed in that. Evidently, in the Governor's mind there was an intention that that should not be done. Having failed in that, Sir, I was told by my friends that the motion was pointed at myself. "You are," they said, "the one obstacle that now stands in the way of the great principles which you have at heart being carried out, because there are honorable gentlemen, some two, three, or four members from the South, who would vote with us for those liberal measures if you were out of the way, and who would give us a majority in the House, but who will not do so as long as you are leader of the party." I bowed to the decision of the House, as I think every man ought to do. I retired. I placed myself in accord with both sides of the House, to obtain principles I longed for. I sacrificed myself unhesitatingly, and dropped back into that obscurity from which I originally came. It was the duty of honorable gentlemen to follow the example I set them; but what did they do? The honorable gentleman now at the head of the Government, having been sent for by the Governor—did he try to carry out the decision to which the House had come? Did he try to reconstruct the Government? No, Sir. After he had made efforts—as I believe he did—to win over some members of our party, and to form a coalition, not a reconstruction, and finding he could not succeed in a reconstruction, had he been a patriot or a statesman he would have gone back to the Governor and said, "I have failed to give effect to the decision of the House of Representatives." But he did no such thing. He formed a Government to support certain views, not views for carrying out liberal measures of electoral reform, but views with regard to continuing the grasping of the public lands of the country, the holding of positions of power to be enjoyed by his friends, and in favour of the great landed aristocracy which it has been attempted to set up here.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Sir G. GREY.—I affirm that such is the case. I affirm it was a foregone conclusion that such a party should be established here, and I affirm that ruinous steps have been taken for doing that. If there was the least doubt on that point in my mind, what has taken place this day would have justified what I have said. Almost every honorable member who has spoken to-day for the Ministry is interested, either as agent or directly, in great land claims. By one of the speakers a claim was set up for clients of his over Native lands for which the Government had actually paid certain moneys, and an attempt was made to repurchase from the Natives the whole land to the extent of 320,000 acres, and the Government were required to enter into an agreement that, upon condition of the claim of the clients of this gentleman being abandoned over a great part of the land, they would let these parties interested acquire 40,000 acres of freehold of the best land in New Zealand. The communication I received from a colleague went on to say, "You must remember, if you do not agree with this, it may lead to a change in the Government of the country, and you must be prepared for it." Well, I refused—I was prepared for the change—and I met my fate like a man. I would rather meet my fate in that way than have been a party to any grossly improper transaction of the kind. I may add, this Native land so claimed was, I am informed, surveyed by stealth, so as to deceive the Natives. I can state other cases in which other gentlemen made claims on land—but which until recently were unknown to me, the transactions having been conducted by confidential correspondence—and which having been refused, these gentlemen became bitter enemies to myself. In fact, one gentleman, who had, I am informed, wished wrongfully to acquire 4,000 acres of Native land, required my resignation from office and my retirement from public life at the end of the session if his vote was to be given on the side of the Government in the recent no-confidence debate.

Sir G. Grey

Hon. MEMBERS.—Name.

Sir G. GREY.—I shall give no name. It is needless that I should name the honorable gentleman. He sits in the House, and can name himself. Both the honorable gentlemen whom I have alluded to now sit before me. Let them stand up and say if I have not spoken rightly. I am saying this in their presence.

Colonel TRIMBLE.—I should like to ask you, Sir, whether the honorable member has any right to cast imputations upon members of the House. This is an accusation of a very serious character made against some one who has to-day addressed the House, and we ought to know at whom that accusation is levelled. As one of the speakers, at any rate, I should like to know if I am referred to.

Mr. SPEAKER.—No honorable member has any right to impute motives to members of this House.

Sir G. GREY.—I imputed no motives. I stated facts.

Hon. MEMBERS.—The facts were heard by all.

Colonel TRIMBLE.—If those statements were facts, the persons referred to are, I apprehend, disqualified from sitting in this House; and, as the honorable gentleman referred to persons sitting in the House, I suggest that the names ought to be given.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Christchurch City (Sir G. Grey) says he has not imputed motives, and the House must accept his denial. I did not hear any motive attributed. The honorable member for Grey and Bell asked me if it was in order to attribute motives, and I said it was not in order.

Sir G. GREY.—Now I proceed to the manner in which this Government was formed, and I say this: that there is an honorable gentleman now at the head of the Government who has, I believe, upon two previous occasions resigned his seat in the Upper House for the purpose of taking a seat here.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Sir G. GREY.—Certainly there has been one other occasion. Twice he has resigned. I say, again, that he ought not to have been allowed to resign his position in the Upper House without the Governor having been advised to receive his resignation. A resignation is not complete until the Governor approves of it; and I say, the Governor having accepted his resignation without advice, the putting him back into this House for the purpose of leading a party was a personal act.

Mr. HALL.—I would ask the honorable gentleman if he did not advise the acceptance of my resignation.

Sir G. GREY.—If I had advised it, I should not have disclosed that advice. I did not advise it. I say, therefore, that he sits here the personal representative of the Governor in this House. Sir, that is the case. Unless that had been done, he could not have been here. That is one way in which the great party connected with the landed aristocracy has been formed here. In the case of the Legislative Council itself, we have seen a gentleman called to that body for the purpose of immediately being made a Minister, after he had just been rejected by a constituency. That was a most unusual and improper act. Had he been solely called to the Legislative Council, I should gladly have seen him called there, on account of his past experience, his abilities, and his claim to that position; but to be put into the Legislative Council for the purpose of being at once made a Minister, after having been rejected by a constituency, is an unknown thing. I believe I can defy any honorable gentleman to produce a precedent of the kind. I say, therefore, there was a foregone conclusion to make a Ministry of that kind. That Ministry having been forced upon the House without the recommendation of the House that the Government should be reconstructed being attended to, I say it was our duty to say that not for one hour shall they remain on those benches. It is essential, if this House is to possess its proper freedom, and its proper degree of liberty, that it should determine who are to be its Ministers, for the Ministry are really the representatives of this House. That is absolutely essential, and I say those honorable gentlemen do not represent the House; they did not get fairly into their seats; they do not represent the country, and it is our duty to ourselves, for the purpose of giving a good example, to say they shall not occupy those benches a moment longer. This may be thought a trifling question, but really upon this question depends the entire future of New Zealand. I believe this is the first time that an attempt of this kind has been made to force a Ministry upon the House of Representatives of New Zealand, and I say that, if we do our duty to ourselves, if we do our duty to the country, we shall resist that attempt, and shall insist upon their leaving the position they hold. If no other course can be found for bringing that about, I say an address should be moved to the Governor requiring him to dismiss them from their position. Let honorable members recollect this: that the question we are really fighting now is the question which is uppermost in the minds of the people of a great part of that portion of the world which is inhabited by the Anglo-Saxon race: it is distinctly the question of the tenure of land. I say, again, that the honorable gentleman who has been put at the head of the Government under the circumstances I have stated (Mr. Hall) is the real representative of what I may call the "land ring" of Canterbury. He has, above all men, been implicated in land transactions—in the making of laws, in the administering of laws, and, to a certain extent, in benefiting himself by the laws so passed and so administered. Therefore he distinctly represents what I call the great landed aristocracy of the Middle Island. Again, the honorable gentleman who has been called to the Legislative Council (Mr. Whitaker) most distinctly represents the same position in the northern part of New Zealand that that honorable gentleman (Mr. Hall) occupies in the central portion of the colony; and, if this question of land for the people—if the question of the preservation of the rights of the people—is to be fought out, we must fight it out now with the Ministry which has just been forced upon us, or it will be lost for ever. There must be no waver- ing, there must be no slinking back, in this fight. It is a desperate fight. It is a fight going on in England as well as here. It is a fight in which the present Tory landowners of Great Britain are deeply interested. It is a struggle in which they will make every effort to have their views carried out here, lest New Zealand should set an ex- ample detrimental to the aristocracy of England—which example it will set, which example it is determined to set, which example we who are working for the people will see that they are enabled to set. Enabled to set, Sir, because a happy time has arisen in this country. All re- cent debates in this House show that the time has arrived for conferring all these electoral rights on the people—show that the time is come when the masses are at last to be considered. Those who for years have been neglected are to be thought of at last. This is the dawning of a new era. Long ago these liberties should have been given to the people of New Zealand. South Australia, New South Wales, Victoria—all the other colonies—have obtained them but this; and the New Zealand people are not sluggards, are not laggards. It is not their fault that they have been left behind. It is the fault of those who for years have had the power to confer these rights on the people, and have never done so, but who now, for the first time, in their anxiety to work out this great land question for their own interest, have suddenly woken up to the neces- sity of conferring the rights which years ago should have been granted to every citizen of this country. Let us weigh this question thoroughly and deliberately. A great deal has been said about the example set by Mr. Pitt, and how George III. chose a Ministry for himself, which represented his own views—how George III. favoured a par- ticular Ministry, and kept them in office against the wishes of a majority of the House of Com- mons, and how a great precedent has been set in that case, which we should allow to be followed. To this I answer there is no analogy between the cases. George III. was an hereditary monarch, whose family had reigned over the country for years before, and whose children would reign after him. He had therefore an hereditary in- terest in the country of which he was governor: he knew that upon his wise administration de- pended in a great measure the rights of his successors. Mr. Pitt was a young and untried man, who was known to hold most liberal politi- cal views. How, then, can you compare the action of the hereditary monarch in England with that of the Governor of a colony, who is here to-day and gone to-morrow—a stranger to the country he rules, and to its people? How can you compare a gentleman who comes here perhaps for only a few months, and is liable to have his ears abused by wily men, with a monarch permanently sitting on the British throne, and handing down his power to his children? There is no analogy. This House is the real governing power in this colony. It must hold its powers, and not part with them. Here, also, we have no young, inexperienced, untried men in the Government. On the contrary, we object to them because of their antecedents. I object to the Premier because he has done more harm to the people of New Zealand, by the land laws he has made and administered and availed himself of, than any other man in the country—

Mr. WHITAKER.—I rise to a point of order. Does not the rule apply, Sir, when the adjourn- ment of the House is moved, which applies to special questions, that the no-confidence motion must not be alluded to?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I did not understand the honorable member who was speaking to be refer- ring to the no-confidence motion. Great latitude is allowed to honorable members when speaking on the motion for the adjournment of the House; but honorable members must not allude to any- thing set down on the Order Paper.

Sir G. GREY.—I was justifying the adjourn- ment of the House, and the adjournment of all public business, until this question is settled. These frequent interruptions are unseemly. They embarrass any man in his speech, and drive ideas out of his mind. Those who dislike to hear some things said have recourse to these inter- ruptions; but it is hardly fair. Well, Sir, I was showing that there is no analogy between untried Mr. Pitt and those tried gentlemen; and that there was no analogy between a Governor who comes to a country and people he knows nothing of, and stays here from day to day—who may pass away at any moment—and an hereditary monarch sitting upon his throne and training young statesmen to administer the government, and guided by constant intercourse with the greatest minds of the day. There is no analogy whatever. Mr. Pitt created his own precedent. It was new at that time. It is now quoted as something great, and something that, under like circumstances, might be followed. We, Sir, will create our own precedent on this occasion. We have new circumstances. We are the founders of this young nation, and we are capable of forming our own precedent. And we will do it. That precedent is, that we will allow no busi- ness to go on as long as those gentlemen occupy those benches. I give in my voice to creating that precedent. It may cause a little delay. That is no harm. Each day the fight is going on some- thing like an auction. "Go on; let the bid be high; do not knock down the goods yet—a higher bid will be given; do not knock down the goods to the first bidders—greater advantages for the people will yet be bidden." I will now pass on to another point, and I may say this: that efforts have been made throughout this part of the Empire to confirm a state of things by which men who have from the public lands gained considerable capital can amass great properties for themselves—to create classes in this country. Some people say I have set class against class. No. They created a class themselves. There were no classes here originally: and now, because we try to get our own, it is said that class rises against class. The honorable member for Grey and Bell said, the other night, "We Liberals in England go upon this principle. We rob nothing from any one; we take nothing from any one; we bestow upon all." Why, Sir, who has taken from us—from the public of New Zealand? Who but those who passed such laws as the odious land law which was passed by Canterbury members, giving leases to runholders for ten years longer, and thereby committing a great injustice upon the large masses of the people? We do not try to take anything from them, but what we endeavour to do is to prevent more being taken from us. We take our stand there. No more shall be taken from us, because, Sir, those large landed estates carry great rights with them. Look, for instance, at this statement we had the other night concerning the County of Cheviot. Only three great landowners in that county. What does it do? It gives one honorable gentleman a seat in the Legislative Council. That arises from owning land. And it gives them, with a ridiculously small constituency, the return of a member to this House. That arises from land again. Why, it is land which gives everything here. That is what we object to. That is the unfairness we object to. Last night, when I was stating that land was such a valuable commodity, and that its value was increasing year by year, in my mind there ran the thought, Truly it is a most valuable commodity! Why, it is one which gives seats in the Legislative Council—£200 a year, and the title of "Honorable." Then I thought, in my own mind, Surely that land which gives such things will bring a great price ultimately in the market. Now, follow this out. Enormous changes have been made in all these colonies. In my youth the Governors were bound by the same law as Cæsar. They dared not pass the Rubicon—that is, the boundary of their province. That was put into their Commission. Now the Governors are allowed to pass from colony to colony; they are allowed to meet; and they are allowed to come to decisions such as, "We Governors will not grant a dissolution until we have exhausted the House." Why, this is to create a great and a new power in these colonies which ought not to exist. I say that no Governor ought to be allowed to move out of his own colony; nor ought Governors to be allowed to advise one another as to what they will do in their respective colonies. It is absolutely wrong, altogether wrong. Look at another thing. I heard many people express pleasure when Lord Carnarvon arranged that his cousin, Mr. Herbert, should be taken into the Colonial Office and made Principal Under Secretary of State. Now, the Principal Under Secretary of State is virtually the Governor of the British Colonies, because he directs all the Governors. It was said that it would be an immense advantage to the colonies that a colonial statesman from Queensland should be taken in that way into the Colonial Department. I regretted it as a great misfortune, and as one step in the wrong direction I am speaking of. Why, he was, and long had been, the representative of the great landed aristocracy of Queensland, and he was put into the Colonial Office virtually to carry out that landed system. Now, I say it would have been infinitely better for us if a man of great ability and of great probity had been taken who knew nothing whatever of these colonies, who would not work with any party in the colonial possessions of the Crown, and who would let the colonists rule and govern themselves, and depend upon themselves. Then, look at all those new titles which have been granted. They are all in the same direction. Was such a thing ever heard of before as that an exterior governing power should interfere in the internal affairs of a community such as this? Virtually it is the Agent-General or some such person who at the present moment confers orders of knighthood upon people in New Zealand for public services rendered here, without Ministers being consulted; and the Governor and Secretary of State correspond directly with the gentlemen to whom those honors are to be given, without the Advisers of the Crown knowing that such correspondence has taken place except through the newspapers. It is all a march in the same direction—a march hateful to my mind in itself, and pernicious in the extreme to the interests of this country. I have been so forcibly impressed with the idea that lately this thought has come to my mind: that, in 1853, in having the Constitution Act prepared, I took care it was so prepared that the inhabitants of New Zealand might at any time make a law for themselves in which they might determine in what manner their own Governor is to be chosen. For a long time it was doubted and contested whether that was the effect of the law or not; but I was certain that it was so from the care with which I had drawn the words. Now, the Home Government admit that I am right—that the people of New Zealand have the power of making a law determining the way in which their own Governor is to be chosen; and, having had this confession unwillingly extorted from them, they add that I am to be told that the Queen has the power of disallowing the Act if she does not like it. Why, of course we know that the Crown can disallow any law; but we equally know that the Queen could never disallow such a law if made here. It is not the custom of monarchy in modern times that such a thing should be done. I believe I shall yet live to receive from the people of New Zealand thanks that I was so careful so many years ago as to have secured a privilege for them which the necessities of the time and what has now taken place will call upon them to exercise. I contend that every one of the reasons I have urged shows the necessity for our following the course which the honorable member for Port Chalmers has said will be taken. I am now one of the rank-and-file of the party.

I will stand by him to the last in that determination. I am sure that we shall triumph in the course we are entering upon. I am certain that the end we aim at is judicious and right, and I am satisfied that no single member of the great Liberal party which has arisen in this House will flinch in the contest which is coming. I have seen that Liberal party grow from three or four members to become a great power in the country. I have seen it increase until it is now a majority of this House, and until those honorable gentlemen on the Government benches strive to prove their Liberalism to retain power. That is the case now with the honorable gentleman who says "No," and hides himself in a corner, whence a voice comes out—a voice we well know, but little heed. Now, Sir, the question is this: Are we the representatives of the people of New Zealand? Shall we allow any person to dictate to us as to who our Prime Minister is to be? Shall we allow any interference on the part of another Chamber in sending their members here? I say we ought to make a stand against that. I say a law should be introduced which would prevent such a thing being ever repeated again as has been now done a second time in this colony. One such occurrence might be forgiven, because it might be concluded that an honorable gentleman leaving the Legislative Council once had really abandoned it, and had no intention of returning; but I say that a man who twice contracts with his Sovereign, "I accept from you the office for life," binds the Queen to maintain him there for life. If he resigns in this manner, there is no mutuality of contract between them; and I say it is unfair. Considered by every rule of right, to do such a thing twice is a wrong act, which should call a blush to the man's cheek who has done it. I say it is an absolute breach of contract with the Sovereign, which ought not to be allowed. Now, what chance have we if such things can be done, assuming that a Governor chooses to take an interest in some special side in the country, and with a nominated Upper House absolutely opposed to us? We have very few friends in it: they could all be numbered on the fingers of one hand. That House mixes up with us in our lobbies and other rooms, with the power of interfering and lobbying, and using various means to draw members to their side. Then, besides those two exterior forces acting against the great party which is a majority of this House, we have here a strong minority to contend against. Nothing but perfect unanimity upon our part can give us the victory, or can secure that the measures necessary for this country will really be carried to completion. Although, as I have said in this House, there can be no halting now, and that the measures must be of the most liberal kind, who can tell what will befall them in another Chamber? Who can foretell that? I say that nothing but a determination on our part to fight every force that we may find opposed to us—a determination to conquer or perish in the struggle—can yet lead us triumphantly through. I have heard to-day many rumours which I really think are not without foundation. It is said that, after the Imprest Supply Bill is passed to-morrow, a dissolution will be given.

Sir G. Grey

Honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House may laugh, but I am certain that has been considered. I am certain, from what I have heard, that it has been considered. What decision may have been come to I cannot say; but I would not trust the honorable gentlemen with the money. I say it would be a cruel thing to New Zealand to allow a dissolution. We have those honorable gentlemen's noses to the grindstone, and we must keep them there. There must be no escape now—no room to get away from the promises given—the democratic measures they have promised. We must take care that the means of obtaining a dissolution are not intrusted to them now, until the measures we have at heart are absolutely passed. If we do this, we shall triumph. If we do this, we shall see voting for these measures the very gentlemen who have for years voted against them. I see one—the honorable member for Aron, I believe—who has voted against the Triennial Parliaments Bill always. I should be sorry to make a mistake, but I have looked into Hansard, and find what I say is the case. I find that other members have done the same thing.

An Hon. MEMBER.—The honorable member for Port Chalmers.

Mr. MACANDREW.—That was five years ago.

Sir G. GREY.—I was going to say I should be glad to see them come into the House clad in white sheets, as penitents. I am sure the honorable member for Port Chalmers would look well in that attire. I should like to see them as penitents, clad in white, going into the lobbies. This I am quite certain of: that now we shall get those measures in a more liberal form than I ever hoped to see. I can feel satisfied that I have rebutted one of the slanders I have heard uttered in this House. I heard an honorable gentleman say, with regard to myself, the other evening, and with regard to a measure, that "it was just such a Bill as he would have expected to have emanated from Sir George Grey." The honorable gentleman says "Hear, hear;" but I have given a complete and triumphant answer to that. I had once the power of legislating myself. I had once the power so far to legislate that I could recommend to the British Parliament an Act to pass. And what was passed? A Constitution Act. There was read out the other night an admission of the Secretary of State that in all respects but one that measure was passed as it came framed from my hand; and that one alteration was a blot upon it. I can say this, in reply to the cruel taunt that was made the other night: "There! look! I once had the power of making a law, and there it is." Here I have been trammelled and thwarted in every possible way and could not freely introduce Bills; but without unduly boasting I can say, with regard to that Act, "Exegi monumentum aere perennius."

Mr. ROLLESTON.—Sir, I am very sorry the honorable gentleman who has just sat down has on this occasion, as on many others, watched very carefully, so that a more able speaker whom he was going to attack had lost the chance of replying before he himself got up to attack him. I regret very much that my honorable colleague the Premier was not able to answer the speech which the honorable gentleman has just made. I feel very strongly, as any honorable member must feel, that it requires a remarkably good speaker to do justice to himself when following the honorable gentleman. There was a time when I listened with pleasure to that honorable gentleman; there was a time when I thought that there was a true ring in his voice; there was a time when I thought that he had the interests of the people at heart—that he had sympathy with the wrongs and sufferings of humanity: and, although I thought he talked a little too much about them, yet I felt at one time that he was a man we might be proud to have among us. I confess that my opinion has undergone an entire change. I am satisfied, from the way the House sat and listened to the declamatory speech we have just heard, that the House has come to the same conclusion as myself. I am sure, from what I have seen in the country, that the people are tired of the cant that falls from that honorable member on every occasion he gets up to speak. We have been accustomed, from the position he has held in the colony, from respect for his years, from respect for his abilities—which are great—I say we have been accustomed to sit and listen to what would not be tolerated from any other member of this House. We have been told that we who sit on these benches are yearning for place and power; that we have no desire beyond that. I think the House of Representatives, which has placed us here, will resent such a statement as an insult to itself. Are members who, after a division in this House, take up the position of Ministers of the Crown—are they to be told, almost before they have got on these benches, that they are yearning for pelf and power? It is an insult to the position that any man in this country ought to look up to with laudable ambition, and which ought to be only held by men who respect the position, and who respect themselves. Are we to be told that we are tied to the chariot-wheels of the honorable gentleman? He gave a very significant intimation to this House of what will happen if he gets his wicked way in respect to the present political crisis. He is going to form a flying column—he is going to dictate to the Ministry that may be in power the policy of the country. There is going to be a third party—a power without responsibility, without place, and without respect for the will of the people as represented by a majority in this House. We shall have that honorable gentleman, without place or responsibility, influencing most prejudicially our deliberations. He tells us that he will move an address from the House to His Excellency the Governor, asking him to remove his friends from these benches. I appeal to this House to consider what that means. We who sit on these benches will defend the honor of the Crown while we remain here. We will not do as the honorable gentleman has done during the past two years—drag the representative of the Crown on the floor of this House; we will not do as he has done—bring an absent gentleman on to the floor of this House, and talk disparagingly of him behind his back, after being sworn to defend him. If we happen to differ from the Governor, we know our constitutional position to be this: It is to resign when we differ, and when that difference is thoroughly established. That is the constitutional position of Ministers: nobody knows that better than the honorable gentleman himself. He knows that when responsible government was first introduced here, much against his will, and with the very greatest difficulty, the first duty of the Ministers was to insist on obtaining in writing from him an assurance of the course that he, as Governor, would take. A Minister came down and told this House: We will not hold our seats on these benches and differ from the Governor of the colony; we are quite sure that, sooner or later, pressure will be brought to bear upon a Governor who ventures to disregard the popular will. Well, that was the position of that honorable gentleman. We are quite sure that the popular pressure that will be brought to bear upon a Governor who neglects the popular will, can only be properly brought to bear by Ministers resigning from time to time. If they continue to do that, sooner or later the Governor will be beaten. What have we had here? We have had that honorable gentleman, sworn to advise the Crown, sworn to deal loyally by its representative—we have had him flinging the name of the Governor before us, and subjecting him to contumely and insults in the presence of the representatives of the people. The honorable gentleman has done more in the past two years to make responsible government, upon which the liberties of the people at large depend, hateful and distasteful in the eyes of the colonists generally than I could have believed possible to have been done in so short a time. He knows perfectly well that according to all constitutional practice it is an improper thing for a Minister of the Crown, or for one who has recently held that position, to refer to what has passed between him and the Governor in his constitutional relations. Yet he has come down here and has made an attack upon the Governor, and has said that he has done things that neither the Governor nor the House has any opportunity of forming any judgment upon. The honorable member went on to speak of the constitutional position. He said what he has said before, and what, it appears to me, he will state a great many times again, to be rebutted as often. He said that when my honorable friend carried the resolution which he did carry in this House—"That this House had no confidence in the Ministry as at present constituted"—he was bound to reconstruct the existing Ministry or to tender his resignation to the Governor. Now, it is well known that there were a certain number of honorable members in the party at the time—not many—who believed that a reconstruction was necessary, and that that was the most feasible course to be taken. It was in deference to their wishes that the resolution was so framed. But, as is ordinarily the case, a party working together has to sink its individual opinions when it becomes impossible to carry out those opinions. Well, what was the position of the case? My honorable friend brought down his resolution. The honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) was then on the benches here; and he distinctly stated from these benches, in unmistakable terms, that they would accept no terms—accept of no coalition whatever—accept of no reconstruction. Every honorable member in this House who voted for that resolution did so with his eyes open to the fact that no coalition or reconstruction would be permitted. Sir, they knew that thoroughly, and it is simply misleading to say that is not the case. Well, Sir, I come to what the honorable gentleman says this Government has been formed for. It has been formed, he says, to promote particular views; it has been formed to create a great landed aristocracy; it has been formed to continue a body of men in power who have made it the business of their lives to grasp the public lands. And then, he adds to this declaration—as he does when he makes any proposition more monstrous than he has made before: he says, “That is the case, Sir.” Well, Sir, I say it is not the case. Who are the members of the present Government? Am I one of the landed aristocracy? Have I no popular sympathies? I should like to see the honorable gentleman come down and contest an election with me among my own people. The honorable member here—in this House—challenged me to go and meet him before my own people. I did so. I went into a very great crush, at the imminent risk of my life—it was very doubtful whether I should ever come out alive again—ou purpose to give him an opportunity of attacking me. He dared not do it before my own people. That was at Christchurch. I met him the next day, and told him I was going to another meeting of his, to give him an opportunity of meeting me before my own people. This was at Lyttelton. I went there. I waited to see him there. He knew I was present. I went in the train with him, and was desirous of giving him an opportunity of attacking me. He knew perfectly well that the moment he attacked me he would have the whole meeting down upon him, and he dared not do it. Well, Sir, in an ill-advised moment some injudicious gentleman, who thought he was promoting the great Liberal cause, ventured to bring me up to the meeting and to demand that I should be heard. I was heard; and what did the honorable gentleman say? He said, “I have a great respect for my friend. I always had a great respect for him. I wish he was working on my side. When I find him supporting my measures, he will have no better or stronger friend than I am.” Sir, here we are. We have brought these Bills down. I claim his promise. They are not only far more liberal than his Bills, but they are plain and comprehensible. They are better Bills altogether; and, what is more, they will pass. We do not want the honorable member to be dragging semi-liberal and pseudo-liberal measures before the people, and holding them up as a class cry for the future. We want to see this question disposed of; and disposed of it shall be. We shall deprive the honorable gentleman of that pleasure which he derives from slandering his neighbours and raising class cries throughout the country. We shall pass these liberal measures. He has told us—and I think this House lies under a very grave imputation—that this House has members in it who have been pledging themselves to vote on his side on condition that he would support iniquitous grants of land—40,000 acres, I think—as the price of a vote in this House. Let us have that honorable gentleman up here; let us know who he is. I say it is a gross slander, and I dare him to name the honorable gentleman. I say he is bound as a gentleman, he is bound as a member of this House, and he is bound as a man who has any regard for a shred of political reputation such as that which is left to him, to do that. He spoke just now of Cheviot. Who made the County of Cheviot a great sheep-walk? Who signed away those Native lands—the Whakatane grants—16,000 acres of land at threepence an acre? Why, that honorable gentleman's Ministry. I challenge the honorable gentleman to bring that case before me. I hold at present the portfolio of Minister of Lands. There shall be no transaction done that either he or any other member may not see in my office. This Ministry will do no such thing as sign away public lands or lands of Natives in the manner they were signed away by the last Government. Then, Sir, the honorable gentleman went on to attack my honorable colleague the Premier, who I do not suppose cared very much what he said about him. He went on to attack that honorable gentleman on the question of his leaving the Upper House. Really, I feel amazed at that being made a subject of attack. The honorable gentleman has left a comparatively easy position, and has come down here to do his duty as a citizen of this country, and is doing it. I do not think that requires any apology. Is the law against it? What does the Constitution Act—that monumentum aere perennius—say?—

“It shall be lawful for any member of the said Legislative Council, by writing under his hand addressed to the Governor, to resign his seat in the said Council; and, upon such resignation and acceptance thereof by the Governor, the seat of such member shall become vacant.”

Well, Sir, what is the case? The honorable member says my honorable colleague has been doing this twice: that, in the first instance, he resigned his seat in the Council in the year 1867. The honorable gentleman was Governor of the colony then, and he accepted my honorable friend's resignation without a murmur. He never said a syllable about the great wrong that was being done to the Constitution of which he was the author. There was no impropriety in it then.

Sir G. GREY.—I should like to make a personal explanation. I would simply point out that when the honorable gentleman first resigned his seat there was no knowledge that he was to go into the House of Representatives.

Mr. HALL.—I had, one month before I resigned my seat, addressed the electors of Heathcote.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—The honorable gentleman says that the Upper House has sent my honorable friend here. I take it, it is not the Upper House that sent him, but one of the most important constituencies in the colony. There is not a constituency in the colony that would not be proud of him. There is not a constituency in the colony that does not believe him, when he says a thing. I wish I could say the same of the honorable gentleman. The insincerity of the honorable gentleman has become a proverb and a by-word in the country. Take those papers I laid on the table the other day with regard to immigration. I feel ashamed, as a public man, that such a fraud upon the public should have been perpetrated as was committed by the honorable gentleman. What did he tell that great meeting at Christchurch, which I attended at much personal inconvenience? He said that the immigration that was going on was at the dictation of the great landholders, who were pestering him to bring in people, in order to cheapen labour and increase the value of their estates at the expense of the working-man. What was the honorable gentleman doing at that very moment? What sort of conscience, what sort of heart, what sort of head could he have? What had he in his right hand when he was saying that? Sir, I feel ashamed of him, as a public man. I feel ashamed of him in every possible way. He at that time knew not only that the immigration which was then going on ought not to be going on—considering the bad harvest and other circumstances which he ought to have taken into consideration—but that he had sent Home a request that six thousand additional immigrants might be poured in. What can we think of a man who would venture to speak to his fellow-men, and to deceive them in such a gross manner as that? The honorable gentleman's insincerity has become a by-word. There was a time when I respected him. I have no respect for him now.

Sir G. GREY.—May I be allowed to make a personal explanation?

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the member speaking gives way, you may do so; but, if not, you must wait until the honorable gentleman has concluded his speech.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—Sir, I am not an adept at speaking; I must ask the House to indulge me. I should give way, but I have not that power of speech the honorable gentleman has, and I must ask him to reserve any personal explanation he may have to make until afterwards. He tells us that the Governor accepted my honorable colleague's resignation as a member of the Legislative Council without advice. I say he had no right to tell the House that. He knows that it was perfectly unconstitutional to make that statement to the House. Whether it is true or not I do not know. He said, as usual, "That is the case;" and I have my doubts about it. He says the Ministry must represent this House. The Ministry has no reason to suppose, at the present time, that it does not represent the House—no reason whatever; and, until it is shown to the contrary, we are in that position that we have a right to presume that we have the confidence of the House, and we shall act upon that presumption. The honorable gentleman said, "What is it that gives seats in the Legislative Council? Land, Sir"—this "dull, insensate land," he has spoken of to the crowds in his tour. Dull, insensate land gives seats in the Legislative Council! I imagine, Sir, from what we have seen in the Gazettes during the last two years, that the honorable gentleman himself has been giving seats, not land. I do not wish to make any comment on those appointments, but I should like to say this, with regard to the Legislative Council: that I hope the time will not come when any ridiculous cry will lead this House to give up the power that it now has over the constitution of that Council through Responsible Ministers. Then we have this other idea. When we have done with this popular representation—when these Bills are passed which are to enfranchise sixty thousand serfs—when that cry is done, we are going to have, if you please, the cry of "Elective Governors." God forbid, say I. Sir, this country does not want any more of these cries. We have got plenty before us. Whatever may be our fate, we shall certainly respect the deliberate decision of this House when it has had a fair opportunity of forming its judgment upon us. The honorable gentleman says a dissolution has been considered. I do not know anything about a dissolution at all. I know of nothing but that we sit here on these benches, that we are going to show the country that we are in earnest about liberal measures, and we are going to show the country what its true position is. A seat on these benches is no easy place; I cannot think that any man would take one except under a sense of duty; and I say this: that whoever comes here will have a most onerous duty under such a state of things as was revealed last night in regard to our finances and to Native affairs. Those are burning questions. The question of whether my honorable friend ventured to come down from the Upper House to serve his country in the Lower Chamber is not one which will agitate the public mind. The burning questions that are coming on are in consequence of the gross maladministration that has taken place during the past two years. I say that deliberately. I myself have no desire for office any more than my honorable friends who sit near me. We will do our duty, as we have in other times. No Ministry will sit long on these benches in future that does not do its duty in a very different way from the manner in which the duty of government has been performed during the past two years. I say that with some knowledge and experience of public work; and I say it after a week's experience that has failed altogether in overtaking the arrears of work in the offices as they now exist. Now, Sir, with regard to the proposal for stonewalling: We have now got, from the great Proconsul—from this man who would fain lead us to believe that the eyes of the world, as well as of New Zealand, are upon him—the information that he is coming into the House of Parliament to "stone-wall." I ask the country and the House to see what that means. Surely we have had degradation enough, without allowing ourselves to be dragged through the dirt in that way. I hope the good sense of this House, and regard for its true dignity, will determine honorable members upon the adoption of a more dignified course than that. What act was ever done that will meet with more general reprobation than that done by the honorable member for Port Chalmers, who, before my honorable friend the Premier had actually formed his Ministry, announced from his place on these benches his intention to move a vote of want of confidence in the Ministry? That, I think, is one of the most discreditable things that have ever taken place in the history of parliamentary government. I have now nothing more to say. I have only got to assure this House that they have nothing to fear from us in the way of sticking to office. We can handsomely afford to take no notice of such slanders as the tongue of the honorable member for the Thames seems most fitted to utter. We can afford to pass by such slanders as that we are holding these benches for pelf or power. I am here as a member of the House of some years' standing, and I assure the House that we will neither slander members of this House nor degrade the benches we hold by dragging the Crown through the dirt; neither shall we disregard the deliberate opinion of this House, when it has had proper and ample means of forming a judgment upon us.

Mr. REID.—I feel some hesitation in following such able and experienced speakers as those who have preceded me; yet I also feel that some remarks have fallen from the honorable member who has just sat down which should not be allowed to pass unrefuted. The speech which we have just listened to is very similar to a number of speeches delivered in this House during last session, and the present session also, and which consist of nothing but a tirade of abuse upon Sir George Grey. I have had an opportunity of listening to these speeches, and of witnessing the opening of the mud-batteries from the Opposition last session; and now we are to be treated in a similar way by the present Ministry. I rise to support the motion which has been tabled by the honorable member for Port Chalmers, and I think we who are in the Opposition are driven to take this course to prevent the Ministry advancing one step; and the fault lies with themselves. I regret that so much time has been lost, and I feel certain the country is not satisfied with the conduct of this House in wasting so much time; but, as I have just said, it is entirely owing to the action taken by the Ministerial party. Ministers know perfectly well that they have not a majority in this House. They are perfectly conscious of it, and mean to throw every obstacle in the way of our showing that we have the majority of the House against them. I hear the Hon. the Premier laugh, but I challenge him. The Premier—

Mr. HALL.—I did not laugh.

Mr. REID.—I beg the honorable gentleman's pardon. The honorable member who laughed is very near the Premier; but I challenge him or any other member on those benches to come to a division this night. We are prepared to come to a division, and are waiting anxiously for them to say when they are prepared to meet that vote of want of confidence. For several days past the Premier would give no reply, merely stating that he would take that vote at a reasonable time. Now, after being pressed into a corner, he would grant a hearing of this motion on Tuesday next, but not sooner. Now, is it reasonable that we should have to wait here another week talking in this way against time, as it were, for the purpose of giving the Premier an opportunity of searching through those pigeon-holes for some more charges against the late Government? The honorable member for Avon has just disposed, as he imagines, of Sir George Grey. We heard a great deal of abuse of Sir George Grey last session. We hear a little more this session. We who came here to support the Grey Ministry and Liberal measures were stigmatized as young "Grey-hounds." I do not know in what way we are entitled to be so stigmatized, except on the ground that we have hunted the old Fox from the fold, and are now called upon to watch after the rats that are likely to infest it. The honorable member for Napier (Mr. Sutton), I think this afternoon, made a remark which took me somewhat aback. He said that, even if the Opposition turned out the Ministry, he did not think in the Opposition ranks there were members competent to form a new Ministry. Now, the whole of this discussion has come down to a question of men and not measures, and I venture to say that we have in the Opposition men who will as creditably fill the Treasury benches as those who are now seated there. I ask, looking at the old leader of the party, where is the one we can pick out from the other side to put on the same platform with Sir George Grey? He is a gentleman who does not require that any young member should advocate his cause or say one word in his favour. His name is stamped on the colony. He is a man who has been the chosen associate of the greatest and best men this century has produced—a man well versed in science, in literature, in arms, in discovery, in government, in philanthropy; and in his knowledge of the constitutional laws of this country, and his acquaintance with every part and parcel of this land we live in, he stands unequalled by any man in this House. And that is the gentleman whom they are now stigmatizing, and have been stigmatizing for the last six or eight months. Why, the honorable member for Avon challenged Sir George Grey to go and contest the election with him in his small constituency. What did the late Premier do? Did he not go to a larger constituency than was ever represented by the honorable member for Avon?—and there he contested successfully, and was placed at the head of the poll in a large constituency to which he was a perfect stranger. The honorable member for Avon represents some 825 electors altogether, over the age of twenty-one years—a mere pocket-borough as compared with the City of Christchurch. And the late Premier goes to Christchurch, and is returned at the head of the poll; and I venture to say that, if he went to any constituency in New Zealand, he would meet with equal success.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Let him try Cheviot.

Mr. REID.—I do not mean to pick out members from the Opposition ranks and compare them with those on the Ministerial benches, but I think we have in the Opposition gentlemen who have had greater experience—whose lives and experience fit them for a position on those benches in preference to those who are now occupying them. The honorable member who leads the Opposition is a gentleman who has spent his whole lifetime for the benefit of this country, and I think there is no one on those benches who can appear more favourably in the eyes of the country than that gentleman. Now, I will go further and say that the honorable member for Port Chalmers is justified in taking this course, because the Ministers will not give way, and will use every step that they possibly can to stave off the voice of Parliament. They not only do not represent the majority in this House, but never did represent the majority of the country. I have gone to the trouble of taking out the figures from a return recently laid on the table of this House—but it would take too long a time to give all the particulars—showing most distinctly that the Ministerial party have never, even in the late division, represented a majority of the electors in this colony. I will say this much, however: Taking out the total figures represented at the last division, those who voted in favour of the Grey Ministry represented 21,297 electors where elections were contested, while those who were returned unopposed represented 13,259 voters. The Opposition votes represented 19,092 votes where the elections were contested, and 3,175 where the elections were not contested: so that the Grey Government, though in a minority of two, represented 34,556 voters as against 22,267 on the other side.

Mr. Rolleston

HON. MEMBERS.—No, no.

MR. REID.—I have the figures here in detail, and am prepared to give them if necessary. Now we come to the present Ministry, and I ask, are they a fair representation of the people? Why, the Premier did not contest an election at all. He represents a district where there are only 948 electors over twenty-one years of age. The honorable member for Avon did not contest an election at all, and he only represents 825 electors.

MR. HALL.—They could not get anybody to oppose them, though they tried very hard.

MR. REID.—The honorable member for Avon only represents 825 voters—not so many as four members from the West Coast each represent. The Hon. the Minister for Public Works certainly polled more votes than any other member of the Government; but he happened to be second on the poll. Why the first on the poll should be passed over, and the second selected, they can themselves best explain. The Native Minister polled 569 votes, and the Colonial Treasurer the small number of 322 votes. Then, added to the list, comes the honorable member of the Ministry who was called to the Upper House, and who was actually rejected by the constituency he stood for. Sir George Grey was returned for the Thames unopposed, and represented 4,446 electors. He contested the election in Christchurch City, and polled 1,815 votes. There is a comparison! If you compare that list with the list relating to those who voted against the Grey Ministry, you will find that, whether in point of population or by the number of votes recorded for each member, the Ministerial party as it now stands represents a minority of the country. Taking the population, and looking at the success of the late elections, I find that in Taranaki, where there is only a male adult population of 2,500, three members were returned who are supporters of the present Government. It is observable that in all the small places they could get a majority, but in all the large centres of population they were fairly in the back-ground. In Hawke's Bay, with a male adult population of 4,585, they secured three members; in Marlborough, where there is a population of 1,889, they got two members; but when we come to Auckland, with a population of 21,798, and Otago, with a population of 31,551, what do we find there? In Auckland the Grey Ministry got fifteen members against two. In Otago they got twelve members as against nine who are supporting the present Ministry. I will add a word or two with reference to the district I represent, and the reason why we from the West Coast should support those who are likely to be the successors of the present Ministry. I say that the Grey Government have done more for the West Coast in the last two years than the previous Government did in six or eight years before. They have given us water-races and bridges, and they have supported our County Councils, Borough Councils, and hospitals in a manner in which they were never supported before. The West Coast, which contributes largely to the revenue of the colony, has never, until the last three months, had a direct voice in the Ministry of the colony. The necessity of appointing a Minister of Mines has never been recognized until the last few months, and it is the duty of the West Coast to support a Government in which a Minister of Mines is appointed. I am sorry to say that the whole of the West Coast members are not unanimous in opposing the present Government. I regret to find that one member has deserted his party, and voted contrary to the pledges given to his constituents before coming to this House. Enough has been said upon that matter without my saying any more about it; but to those honorable members who gave me a contradictory "No" I would say that, although a great deal has been said about a corrupt Press, I cannot believe that four newspapers, the Grey River Argus, the Greymouth Star, the Inangahua Times, and the Inangahua Herald, have all misrepresented that gentleman. I cannot believe that they have all put words into his mouth and made him say, "I am a supporter of the Grey Ministry." I regret to have to speak in this way of a gentleman I have respected for many years; but it is nevertheless the fact that he has deserted his party, and is now sailing under false colours. He began his canvass as an independent Liberal, as he called himself, but he found the feeling of the people so strong that he most distinctly pledged himself as a Grey supporter. In conclusion, I may say that I heartily indorse the action taken by the honorable member for Port Chalmers. It is a pity that such a course should have to be adopted, but we are driven to it; and I hope that, having unfurled his flag, he will stick to his colours, and carry on the fight every day until the Government consent to discuss the want-of-confidence motion.

Colonel TRIMBLE.—In answer to the remarks of the honorable member for Hokitika (Mr. Reid), perhaps I may be allowed to refer to what took place on a previous occasion, when another honorable member for Hokitika (Mr. Seddon) referred to the action of the honorable member for Grey Valley (Mr. Masters). It was then stated that the honorable gentleman had broken his election pledges; and I appeal to the House to say whether the honorable gentleman did not completely prove by extracts read in our presence that the charges were a perfect mare's-nest. The honorable member for Hokitika (Mr. Reid) also referred to the great statesmanship and world-wide renown of the honorable member for the Thames. Now, I should like to say one word upon that subject—not in disparagement of the honorable member for the Thames, or of the position, high or low, which he has attained in the colonial world; but I would remind the honorable gentleman that there were two Sir George Greys. The one was a great statesman, known throughout the world as a Secretary of State under various Governments of Great Britain, a man respected by all, a man who was a Liberal to the backbone, a man who, from the evil days before the Reform Bill till his death, stood in the foremost ranks of the Liberal party; and there is another Sir George Grey, a member of this House, who is very well known and respected, but who is at the same time not a man of world-wide reputation. At Home he is utterly unknown outside official circles. I say that deliberately, and I will repeat it, in spite of any "Oh, oh," that may be uttered. There is no man in this House who has followed the political world of Great Britain in the general tenor of its progress more closely than I have done, and I venture to say that the name of the honorable gentleman is entirely unknown outside official circles. Therefore, when he is quoted in this House as a great statesman, and when his opinions are referred to as those of a great statesman, I say it is the result of gross ignorance of what is going on in the political world. Then the honorable member for Hokitika referred to some figures to indicate the position of members, as shown by the number of votes cast at the last elections. I, unfortunately, am not prepared to go into that matter in full, but I apprehend that before this debate is over some honorable gentleman will give the true figures, which will show that in this matter he is as much mistaken as he is in other matters. I will take one case he referred to—namely, the votes cast in the Provincial District of Taranaki, where he says there are so many people, and he no doubt gives the sitting members credit for the number of votes they polled. Now, what is the fact in regard to Taranaki? Why, that the Ministerial organs, the Ministerial agents—I do not mean paid or official agents, but persons who were there in the Grey interest—were utterly unable to find any one to contest the seats. The gentleman who opposed me said he was opposed to Sir George Grey personally. But let me mention one or two curious coincidences that happened in one of the constituencies. In the constituency of Egmont there was a prospect of a triangular fight. There were two gentlemen who, from some quarter or another not in the district, were put forward to oppose the honorable gentleman who at present represents the constituency of Egmont. One of them suddenly disappeared from the scene. He went to Wellington, and when he came back he had in his pocket a promise of a loan of £10,000. Another, who had for several years been refused an honor that was much coveted, was made a Justice of the Peace. In addition to that, he has got a contract without tendering for it for supplying the force of the district with rations, and the right of establishing canteens in every district. Now, Sir, it is a curious coincidence that these things occurred to the persons who were put forward to oppose the honorable member for Egmont at the last election. And I would like those honorable gentlemen who are so clever at throwing aspersions on the true Liberals of this House to put these things quietly beside each other and consider their significance. We are told that our friends on the Treasury benches are in a false position—in a position that was never intended—because the resolution that was passed by this House was not of a sufficiently definite nature—that, in fact, it was not a new Ministry that was wanted, but a reconstruction of the old; and it was said that no effort was made by the Prime Minister to carry out the wish of the House. Sir, do the honorable gentlemen forget that these words were used by one of the most trusted Ministers of the party then in power: "If we are beaten, honorable members of the Opposition will be left to select members from their own side: coalition, I say, is not only impossible, but unfair and dishonest"?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable gentleman is not in order in referring to a previous debate.

Colonel TRIMBLE.—Then I will not refer to this speech further than to point out, in general terms, the fact that those honorable gentlemen, one and all, maintained that they would stand or fall together; and therefore my honorable friend the Premier cannot be twitted because he did not go to them, after they had repudiated the idea of coalition, and try and construct a Ministry out of his own friends along with theirs. The honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey) is not always very accurate, as we know, in his reports. Of course, if he would only give the House the exact words used, we might form our own opinion as to their meaning; but when he attempts to paraphrase, as we have lately seen,—and the instance is not by any means new,—we know how matters may be twisted so as not to look like the same thing. He professed to explain what were the duties of members of the Upper House. He says, in regard to what he calls the landed interests of the country, that there is one great advantage attached to their position, and it is this: that £200 a year for life can be given to them—that is a sort of pension that is given to them—and that they have no corresponding duties. I would just remark upon this, first of all, that, if it is desirable to discuss the constitution of the Upper House, I think it ought to be done in a regular way, and not by a side-wind: we ought not to have these side-hits, but the whole question ought to come on for discussion in a fair manner, so that everything might be said and discussed in a fair, full, and clear way. But, supposing it to be true that the honorable gentlemen to whom he referred receive £200 without having any corresponding duties, I would ask, Who, in the history of the country, has passed so many members into that House—who has created so many pensioners at £200 a year for life as the honorable gentleman has done? Was it done to bring that House into contempt? Was it to imperil its existence that he sent so many members into it? Was it in order that he might know for certain the kind of people he was going to attack in this way that he filled the House with his own nominees? Why, very respect for the men he sent there ought to prevent him making attacks upon the character of that House. Then he goes on to refer to the Governor, and, in a strange, indecent way, drags the Governor day after day, time after time, discussion after discussion, upon the floor of this House. I take it that no man who is absent ought to be attacked in this manner; and, at any rate, that it is quite improper to attack the Governor, who is only known to this House by the action and conduct of his Ministry. I say he ought not to be criticised in this way. It is a singular fact that this honorable gentleman, Sir George Grey, quarrels with all Governors; and I apprehend it is not owing to the personal qualities of the men, but to the fact that they hold an office which he wishes to be elective, in the hope that he may be elected to the position himself.—(Oh!)—That is the talk even amongst members on his own side: it is no new thing; and therefore I think I am perfectly justified in inferring that such was the motive which influenced his conduct. Then the honorable gentleman went on to attribute motives for the action of some of the gentlemen who had spoken in the House during this morning's sitting. I at once challenged him, as I was one of the speakers, to say who it was to whom he referred; but no satisfactory answer could be got from him. He had no right to say that 40,000 acres of land had been taken as a bribe, in order that a certain course might be pursued. To impute such conduct as that to any member of this House is to cast an imputation upon that man's honor, and therefore upon the honor of this House, and, if true, such conduct ought to be stigmatized in such a manner that it would never occur again. But the honorable gentleman throws charges broadcast over the country, yet takes no steps to establish them. I do not like to say he knows those charges to be untrue—he may have believed the information given to him—but, in any case, whether they be true or false, he ought to place the individual who has had such an aspersion cast upon his character in such a position that he can either exculpate himself or deny the charge. Now, it has been said we have been quoting precedents which are inapplicable to the condition of this country. It is very true that one precedent which was quoted by an honorable member for one of the Auckland constituencies is of an old date, and does not entirely apply to the case under consideration here; but the cases to which I have referred, and to which you will perhaps allow me to refer again, are of a late date, and are to a certain extent instructive to the House. On one occasion a Ministry at Home was defeated by a majority of five, and at once, feeling that it was not in a position to conduct satisfactorily the affairs of the country, the Government resigned and gave place to their opponents. That opposing party was left to endeavour to form a Ministry. I refer to the year 1839, and the Ministry which resigned was that of the late Lord Melbourne; and Sir Robert Peel was at once sent for. He was unable, owing to the peculiar circumstances, to form a Ministry—it was at the time of the dispute in reference to the right of appointments to the Queen's household—so the preceding Ministry came into power again. There was a dissolution of Parliament owing to the defeat of the Ministry of Lord Melbourne by a majority of one on the 4th of June, 1841; and, when the new Parliament was called into existence and met on the 28th of August, 1841, Lord Melbourne's Ministry was defeated—that is to say, on the Saturday—and on the Monday, at the forenoon sitting, the announcement of the resignation was made to the House. That shows it was then considered absolutely essential that, as soon as it was shown that a Premier had not the confidence of the House, he should at once resign. And in numerous cases, a list of which I hold in my hand, stretching over a hundred years, there is no case where that course was not immediately pursued. Upon some occasions they went so far as this: A Ministry was defeated at two o'clock in the morning, and it was announced at the early sitting of the same day that the Ministry had resigned; and I apprehend that would be the case if constitutional government were honestly and faithfully carried out in a new country. It is a precedent which it would be very good for us to follow. It is a precedent which I believe the late Ministry ought to have followed; but it is a precedent which they did not follow. There was a case in point when Lord Derby came into power in 1866. That was rather a peculiar case. Lord Russell was defeated by the small majority of eleven in a House of 619 members, and then upon a question which was by most of his friends not considered one of principle. The Queen was absent from London at the time, and he at once telegraphed his resignation; but she desired there should be no resignation until she returned to London, and that occupied a week. But from day to day the House adjourned, in order that the Ministry might keep the country au fait as to what was going on. On that occasion, although there was a clear majority against Lord Derby's Government, a majority representing something like two to one, certainly exceeding three to two, yet, owing to the fact that the Russell Ministry was turned out of office by the miserably narrow majority of eleven, it was considered only fair that the Derby Ministry should get a fair and clear hearing; and they went on from that time, June, 1866, until autumn, 1868, when the dissolution came, they in the meantime carrying on the affairs of the country to the satisfaction, in a general way, of the parties concerned; and yet at this time there were questions of the utmost importance coming on for consideration in reference to reform. It was in this Parliament that resolutions in favour of reform were put and carried, that resolutions in favour of the disestablishment of the Irish Church were put and carried; yet it was eighteen months after Lord Derby assumed office that the dissolution which led to the election of the new Parliament took place. What I want to show to the House is this: that the Ministry does not necessarily require a majority, when it comes into office in the peculiar way in which this Ministry came into office, to enable it to put before the country and the House its propositions for the government of the country. After we get these before us, and have full information, we can make our choice—we can accept or reject the Ministry; but in the meantime there is an absolute constitutional right on the part of the Ministry to have a fair trial. And, above all, I say that at the present time it is peculiarly proper that they should have this trial, and upon this ground: I cannot allow that those gentlemen opposite have upon their side all the Liberalism of this House. When I see over there undoubtedly Tory members, gentlemen who within the last two or three years were Tories in England, I cannot recognize their claim to be Liberal leaders in this House.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Name.

Colonel TRIMBLE.—The honorable gentleman will tell you his name himself; there is no necessity for me to do so, because it is no secret. The gentlemen on the Ministerial benches having placed upon the table of the House measures absolutely of a liberal character—much more liberal than the previous occupants of those benches put before the House, and admirably conceived in their provisions—I say it is the duty of the House to give them a fair trial—to at least let them officially put these things upon the table and officially discuss them, and then condemn them if they dare. The peculiar position of the House is this: that the true Liberals will cordially gather round these measures, and whether they are carried to-day, or to-morrow, or next month, it does not matter. I say the true Liberals will be eliminated from the true Tories, and will pass these measures, and will see that proper measures are placed upon the Statute Book. I say again, therefore, that in the peculiar position of parties the Government have a right to a fair trial. When we see honorable gentlemen on the other side coming forward as great reformers, and yet acting as they have done with regard to these measures previously, we can come to no other conclusion than that they make a "bogus" use of them for their own particular purposes. What happened but a short time ago, when a Bill was brought down, and was passed in effect, if not in actual form, exactly as it was introduced into this House, and was passed also by the Upper House? Was not an attempt made to throw it away? And why? Simply because it was a useful thing to dangle before the eyes of the people, and to use in this great cry for reform. An honorable gentleman on the opposite side has said to us that we are like donkeys with a carrot held out before us. I say that that was the political carrot which was held out by the honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey) to the people. I say we must be true to ourselves. We want measures, and we want no mockery, and I will support those gentlemen who are now on the benches, and I say to them, "Whatever the result may be, you must stick to your posts—at all events until you have been afforded a full opportunity for a free discussion of the merits and demerits of your measures." I say to them furthermore that, now another night has been wasted, they should go back from the promise which they made to-day, and decline to take the motion of want of confidence on Tuesday next. They should say to honorable gentlemen opposite, "We have been deprived of another night for getting on with our business, you have not acceded to the proposition we made, and we will now insist upon having full time for the consideration of our measures, and until that time is given we will fix no day for considering the vote of want of confidence."

Mr. MASTERS.—My election speeches having again been referred to, it may perhaps be necessary for me to give a short further explanation. I admit that in my printed address to the electors, which appeared in some of the papers, the language might perhaps be open to the construction which some honorable members on the other side have put upon it, were it not qualified by the statements I have myself made in addressing the electors in the various centres. With reference to the particular matter to which the honorable gentleman who last spoke referred, I may say that I most emphatically and distinctly stated, and, indeed, commenced all my addresses with these words: "I have come before you as an independent candidate." I have received a number of telegrams lately from my constituents, entirely approving of my conduct, and stating also that I have acted quite consistently and have broken no pledges. I regret very much that some portion of my constituents should have a different idea; but I will read a paragraph which appears in the Inangahua Herald, one of the leading papers in the district, which will, I think, show clearly that I determined to hold an independent position:—

"According to the telegraphic news received from Wellington last night, the Chronicle charges Mr. Masters, one of the members for Grey Valley, with a flagrant breach of confidence to his constituents in not joining the Ministerialists. The Inangahua Herald was the only journal in which Mr. Masters's speech was fully reported; and on reference to our issue of the 4th ultimo we find Mr. Masters reported as follows: 'He declined to pledge himself as the supporter of any party in the House, but would leave himself, in the event of return, an independent member, prepared to support any Government that he believed would best give effect to the views he entertained, and upon which he claimed the support of the electors.' Surely nothing can there be construed into a pledge to support the present Administration."

I do not think that I need here add anything more. I conscientiously assure honorable members that when I came to Wellington I considered I was perfectly independent to take whichever side I thought fit, and to exercise my own judgment.

MR. HURSTHOUSE.—Sir, I merely wish to make one or two remarks with regard to what has fallen from two honorable gentlemen during this debate, one of whom, I regret to see, is now carefully leaving the House. I was going to appeal to his sympathies with regard to the youth of New Zealand, and the young members of this House, and I also wished to say something as to the way in which he treated the "No" I said to a statement of his. I was going to say it was a cruel thing for the late Premier of the colony, who is supposed to be the great friend of the youth of New Zealand, and of its future generations, to say he heard a voice he knew well, but cared little for. I am not so old a man as the late Premier. I have yet many years in which to gain the experience, and eloquence, and knowledge that honorable gentleman has gained; but there may be a day when even he and those who follow him will care to hear the voice of the obscure "whip" of the other party. There may be a day when my counsels may be sought after as well as his; and I say it is cruel of any honorable member to attempt to crush a young, and liberal, and, I may say, an honest man, endeavouring to do his duty to his country. I would advise the honorable member for Christchurch and the Thames, the late Premier of the colony, now that he has gained what he has talked so much about, to retire into the obscurity of his home, and there remain and enjoy the fruits of the liberal measures of which he claims to be the father. But my opinion is, that his liberal measures are really nothing more than clap-trap; that they have been of use to him in stumping the country, but that the people do not really want them. I think all the country wants is a simplification of our present laws, and not an increase of what is in many districts detrimental to the inhabitants. The country has been crying for bread, and the late Premier has given it a stone. The country has been demanding a liberal land law, and he has given it triennial Parliaments and proposed a redistribution of seats. He told us himself that he had at one time power to make laws. All I can say is, that it would have been well for this country if he had never been able to make those laws. One of the laws he made many years ago, when he was Governor, without Responsible Advisers, was a law which, at the present moment, is known as the Sir George Grey Land Regulations; and, strange as it may be, in the very instances which he quoted to-night to show that immense tracts of country were obtained by runholders, the lands were acquired under those regulations, and the persons who got them were invited here from another colony by the honorable gentleman himself. And yet he says that that land law has sent one of its representatives to the Legislative Council, and has put another into this House. I deny that Cheviot has returned a member to this House as a representative of land. I say that that district is as large as almost any other in New Zealand. Who was it that caused these large landed properties to be obtained? It was that honorable gentleman himself; for, having reduced the price of our lands, he enabled capitalists to come in and purchase large tracts of country, and thereby deprive the poorer people of the power to obtain places to settle upon in later years. Having in this way picked all the plums out of the pudding, and having allowed all the best land to be sold to men whom he invited here, what did he do? Two years ago he turned round and passed a law called the Waste Lands Sales Act, which has had actually the effect of stopping all settlement, and driving hundreds of people from these shores. After selling the best part of New Zealand by his own autocratic power, he says now, "Having got rid of the best of the land, I will make political capital out of the rest, and make the poor man pay £1 an acre for that which I sold to the large capitalists for 5s. an acre." Let me say to the honorable member for Hokitika (Mr. Reid), Has it come to this, that a man of his ability, a man of his mind, a man of his classical knowledge, can come to this House and acknowledge that he is going to support the great Liberal party, as he calls them? And for what? Because they made water-races on the West Coast. Has it come to this, that a vote in this House is to be bought by a water-race or a railway? I am surprised that the people of New Zealand should have sunk so low, and that any honorable gentleman should make such confessions. Where is his patriotism? Where are those cries that have been echoed from one end of the colony to the other about electoral rights and triennial Parliaments? These, I should think, were the things that men of that great Liberal party would have given their allegiance for, and not for the sake of a water-race or a railway. I maintain that the west coast of the Middle Island—and I know something about it—has been more injured by the land law as it at present exists—which was introduced by Sir George Grey; not the Land Act of 1877, but the Land Sales Act—than by anything else that has been done in the past. That law of itself has done more injury to that part of the country than any benefit which can accrue to it by the construction of water-races, which the colony must pay for, and which the district itself cannot even pay the interest on. I know of hundreds who have been driven away from that part of the country simply from the want of means of settling the land. What does this great man—this great Premier—do to assist the people to settle on the land? When a Land Bill was passed which was good in many respects, although bad in others, he did all in his power to prevent it becoming law. He also passed a measure which placed a minimum price of £1 an acre upon the land, and which has prevented thousands of persons from taking advantage of the deferred-payment system and settling on the land. He has perpetually endeavoured to persuade men that the land laws of this country are bad, and that it is most objectionable that it should be in the power of any single individual to take up large sections of country. I quite agree with him; and whenever he, as Prime Minister, or in any other capacity, introduces measures to enable people of small means to settle on the waste lands of the Crown, I will support him. There is no subject which the great mass of the country constituents are so interested in as that of good land laws. I am prepared to vote with the late Premier for any land laws that will have the effect of destroying large estates, but I differ from him in blaming the people who have acquired those estates. Surely there was nothing wrong or dishonorable in the conduct of the man who, being possessed of capital enough, acquired for himself a hundred thousand acres or so of land, when the laws enabled him to do so. Is such a person to be blamed, or the laws? Certainly the laws, or the law-makers, and there is where we blame the late Premier, for he made the law, and now he objects to the natural result of his own handiwork. The late Premier said that this House must be the real governing body of the colony. I always thought, until his advent here, that it was the real governing body of the colony; but I have seen Sir George Grey, when Premier, doing what no other Premier ever did in this colony. I have seen him overriding decisions of this House, and casting them aside as mere scum, and doing exactly contrary to the expressed wish of the country and the House. What did he do in regard to the Land Bill, and the now notorious Thames-Waikato Railway? He carefully set aside the decision of the House and rode rough-shod over the people's representatives. This is the man who now tells us that this House must be the governing body of the colony. I sincerely hope this Parliament will never have to submit to the degradation it has been subject to during the past few years, when we have seen the Premier overriding the decisions of Parliament and using his own discretion in matters of the greatest importance. I, with many other members of this House, am seriously grieved to see such an immense amount of time wasted in entirely useless discussion. I must say that a spirit of chivalry and fair-play has not actuated the leader of the Opposition and his supporters. Honourable members know that I have never had a very high opinion of the leader of the Opposition since I heard him stand up in his place in this House four years ago and say that, in his opinion, £200,000 was of greater importance to Otago than the unity of the colony. That statement sank into my heart, and has never been effaced. I do not believe he is a man of large soul or of large mind. He has lived, moved, and had his being in the southern part of the colony, and, in coming up here, he has got out of his latitude, and the sooner the honorable gentleman goes peacefully back to political oblivion in Otago the better it will be for New Zealand. I am sure I shall never be able to give my support to a Government of which he is a component part. There are other members of this House who have publicly declared, in answer to questions by leading members of their constituents, that they would never vote for any Ministry of which the new leader of the Opposition was a component part; and yet we have not heard anything said about broken pledges in the case of those honorable gentlemen. I am not going to tell you that it is disgraceful for any honorable member to break his pledges. Let his own conscience be his judge. I deprecate strongly the conduct we have seen in this House with regard to one honorable member dragging before us the action of another honorable member before his constituents because he has seen fit to change his political views, or has been misrepresented in the papers. I take it that every man who comes here is a free agent, and is therefore at liberty to change his opinions if he thinks it right to do so. But it is decidedly objectionable to find an honorable member—pledged distinctly, and returned unopposed upon the distinct understanding, never to vote for any Ministry of which the present leader of the Opposition was a component part—voting steadily with the present Opposition, and the party which is likely to be in opposition for the next three years. We are here with our back up. We will not consent to retire from the position until we have had our say, and until we have done what we wish to do. All this waste of time rests entirely with the Opposition. It is useless to say that they have not obstructed business. There is a great deal of work on the Order Paper which does not require that strong party feeling which often spoils the legislation of this House, and which might be gone through—legislation which the country is desirous to see passed. These measures might have been read a second time if the Opposition had permitted it; but owing to the action of the present leader of the Opposition they will probably not become law this session. I deeply deplore the state in which we find the House at the present time, and I sincerely hope the Opposition will see the error of their ways and repent in sackcloth and ashes.

The House adjourned at eleven o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, 16th October, 1879.

Personal Explanation—J. Jones—"Hannah Mokau"—Timaru County—Public Works Contracts—Otago Harbour—Ashburton Courthouse—Taranaki Volunteers—Mokau Land—Railway Iron and Rolling-Stock—Waikato-Thames Railway—Auckland Native Land Court—Chatham Islands Land-Tax—Pokeno Land and Pukekohe—Bombay Road—Northern Maori District—Auckland Improvement Commissioners' Transfer of Powers Bill—Waiuku Recreation Reserve Bill—Supply.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HALL.—Before proceeding to the business on the Paper, I desire, as a matter of personal explanation, to draw attention to the incorrectness of a report in the New Zealander newspaper of the discussion that took place in the House last evening. Upon the question of my having resigned my seat in the Legislative Council on a former occasion, Sir George Grey is reported to have said, "Sir George Grey asked to give a personal explanation. When the Hon. the Premier resigned his seat, it was not known that he was leaving it to come into that House." It will be in the recollection of honorable members that I then rose, and said that for one month before my resignation was sent in I had been addressing the electors of the Heathcote. I think that was an important contradiction, and, the statement of Sir George Grey having been given in the newspaper I have named, the contradiction ought to have been given also. I call attention to the matter because the statement, being uncontradicted, leaves an entirely incorrect impression of what took place.

Sir G. GREY.—I rise also to make a personal explanation, and I beg to say that I had no knowledge, when the honorable gentleman resigned his seat in the Council, that he had issued an address to his constituents.

J. JONES.

Colonel TRIMBLE asked the Government Was, or is, Mr. Joshua Jones, of New Plymouth or Mokau, an agent of the Government; and, if so, what are, or were, his duties? Have any payments been made to Mr. Jones; and, if so, what are the respective amounts, and for what special service done? Had Mr. Jones the free use of the telegraph wires; and, if so, on what pretext?

Mr. HALL said, with regard to the first two questions, "Was, or is, Mr. Joshua Jones, of New Plymouth or Mokau, an agent of the Government; and, if so, what are, or were, his duties? Have any payments been made to Mr. Jones; and, if so, what are the respective amounts, and for what special service done?" the answer was as follows:—

"Mr. Joshua Jones has been, to some extent, recognized as an agent of the Government, but not as a Government official. There is no correspondence to show the specific nature of the services he has performed. I append a return showing the sums he has received from the Government. The total amount is £390.

Sept. 27 1879.	Gratuity for services	£ s. d. 120 0 0
May 20	For services at Mokau and Kopua Native meeting	20 0 0
Sept. 4	Bonus for services performed for Native Department at Mokau during 1878 and 1879	250 0 0

"Memorandum.

"There are no records in the Native Office showing the specific services performed by Mr. Jones. So far as I am aware, the above amounts have been paid in connection with the opening up of the Mokau District, in which he is said to have exercised considerable influence over the Natives.

"T. W. LEWIS,

"11th Oct., 1879." "Under Secretary.

In regard to the third question, "Had Mr. Jones the free use of the telegraph wires; and, if so, on what pretext?" the answer was, that at the instance of the Native Minister orders were sent by the Postmaster-General that Mr. Jones should be allowed the free use of the telegraph when telegraphing to the Government. That was the whole answer to the question.

Mr. GIBBS moved, That the returns be laid on the table, and printed.

Mr. TURNBULL saw no necessity for printing the returns, as the question and answer would appear on the records of the House.

Mr. HALL said the paper from which he quoted was hardly a return. It was merely a statement read to the House in answer to the question of the honorable member for Grey and Bell. However, if honorable members wished to have it printed and laid on the table, he would offer no objection.

Mr. MOSS thought it would be doing very great injustice to the late Government to print so important a statement unaccompanied by explanation. Why not have the vouchers printed with it? Why not have the whole of the correspondence, showing upon what service Mr. Jones was employed? He happened to know that there was a very bitter feud going on between certain parties at Taranaki.—

Mr. SHEEHAN hoped the honorable gentleman would not insist upon his objection to the printing of these papers. He was not at all afraid of the result, and would be prepared to discuss the subject fully at the proper time, when they came to discuss the Native Affairs Statement.

Mr. MOSS would still state his objection to the printing, on the ground that this was part of a system of dirt-throwing which had been adopted with regard to the late Government and all connected with them. That must be obvious to every honorable member when he looked at the Order Paper and saw the insidious and insulting questions that were put upon it. The honorable member for Waikouaiti had placed a notice on the Paper which he (Mr. Moss) thought would be regretted by every person who had the least regard for the dignity of the House.

Mr. McLEAN.—It is a very proper motion.

Mr. MOSS.—That was a matter of taste and feeling. Now, what were the facts of this case? Mr. Joshua Jones was a settler of Taranaki, who had done good service in opening up the Mokau, who had spent a large sum of money in putting a steamer on that river, and who, from all he had heard, was an energetic and enterprising man, but who had unfortunately come into conflict with the "old identity" element in Taranaki, and the House ought not to be dragged into a petty squabble on that account. That is the interpretation he put on the whole matter, and he would like to see these squabbles fought out at home. As the late Native Minister did not object to the printing of the papers, he would not persevere in his own objection; but, as the inference had been conveyed that there was something discreditable in the negotiations with Mr. Jones, he felt bound to say that Mr. Jones did render very important service in connection with the Native meeting at Te Kopua, as many honorable members knew. Whether he had been paid for that he did not know.

Mr. HALL.—He received £20 for that.

Mr. MOSS was quite sure that that was a service for which he would have been paid much more highly by the honorable gentlemen now on the Government benches. But what he wished to say was this: that the statement made by the honorable gentleman, like the Financial Statement made a few days ago, was not calculated to expedite the public business. It was a garbled report, without any vouchers or details, and it was made by the Premier in a manner that left a great deal to be inferred. It was time that this sort of thing came to an end. They had at the present moment the very unfortunate spectacle of a Government obstructing the business of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the honorable member that he was travelling beyond the question before the House.

Mr. MOSS said he would not further refer to the fact that the Government were obstructing the business of the House; but they had before them a long and probably a protracted and bitter struggle, and he was extremely sorry to find that the good feeling that might preserve the amenities of debate during the struggle was being risked by the course taken in these matters by the honorable gentlemen who now occupied the Government benches.

Colonel TRIMBLE objected to the word "insidious" being used in reference to the questions he put on the Paper. They were put on in good faith. They were put there at the wish of his constituents, and he believed the House would get some information from the answers which would instruct it in the course it ought to take in certain matters. He had nothing further to say in reference to the matter at present. He merely wished to protest against the word "insidious" being used in regard to the questions he put on the Paper.

Mr. HISLOP said, if this question was put on the Order Paper with the object of obtaining information, why was it not put on the Paper when the late Government were on the Ministerial benches? He thought the remarks of the honorable member for Parnell were fully borne out by the manner of the question and the time at which it was put.

Major ATKINSON said that last session he put questions and motions on the Paper asking for information, but got none. They got promises, but nothing was done, and they gave it up as a bad job. They determined to take another course, which was to get rid of a Government which refused to give the public any information except upon such subjects as it chose. As to the documents relative to this matter, the honorable member for Parnell, or any other honorable member, could see any documents connected with it; but the difficulty was, that there were none to produce. All that Mr. Jones appeared to be employed to do was to get a lease of 20,000 acres of land for himself, to have it surveyed at the Government cost, the Government providing the surveyor, and to get a Court to sit to grant the land to him. That appeared to be the only service Mr. Jones had rendered, according to the public documents; but he would undertake to lay before the House every document that could be found. The Government decided that the fullest information connected with the matter should be laid before the House, when the subject could be discussed at a future time. He might add that they would give every possible information to every honorable member who might ask for it, no matter to what side of the House he belonged.

Mr. SHEEHAN might state, by way of explanation, that what the honorable gentleman said was quite correct, but he omitted to state that the Government found a surveyor, or funds to pay the surveyor, in all such cases as this.

Major ATKINSON.—There is no information to that effect in the offices.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—It is in the Taranaki office.

Major ATKINSON.—We have applied to the Taranaki office, and none can be found.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Then it ought to be there.

Mr. WAKEFIELD thought that this was quite a new way of treating questions put by honorable members. This was simply a system of terrorism, which would absolutely prevent honorable members putting questions on the Paper, lest they should be attacked for having done so with some insidious motive. He had several questions on the Paper, and he really feared that when he asked something about the Clitham Islands land-tax he would be at once attacked as having intended to throw out some imputation against the late Government. The honorable gentleman who had asked the question now under consideration had stated that he had done so at the request of his constituents, and yet he was charged with doing so for some insidious motive. The honorable member for Waitaki had no right to make such a charge. The honorable gentleman, instead of speaking as to the completeness or correctness of the answer, attacked the conduct of the gentleman who put the question evidently in perfectly good faith. He knew nothing about this Mr. Jones until he had seen the question; but now he was very glad the matter had been brought forward, and believed that it was to the interest of the public that the whole of the documents on the subject should be printed. But he hoped honorable members on all sides would support others in a perfect freedom to put any questions they thought fit to the Government.

Mr. GISBORNE believed the system of putting questions was very liable to abuse. He did not wish to impute motives to any honorable gentleman of wishing to cast imputations upon others; but that was the effect of such questions as these, and of replies given to such questions, when third parties, against whom imputations appeared to be made, had no chance of making any defence. Very often garbled statements were indirectly made in these questions, and insinuations thrown out against persons who had no opportunity of replying, whereas, if the papers were moved for by a motion in a straightforward and manly way, then correct statements of the whole case could be made. He had seen this system grow up in the House of asking questions which indirectly levelled insinuations against third parties, and of replies being made which could not be answered; and he very much regretted it, because it led to the belief that the persons referred to had committed some great offence, whereas, if the papers had been moved for in the ordinary way, the persons implicated would have had an opportunity, either as members or through members, of defending themselves.

Mr. BOWEN took it that it was the Speaker's duty to see that no improper question was put upon the Order Paper; and he had yet to learn that the representatives of the people were to be restricted from asking the Government any questions as to abuses which they considered might have taken place. It was a matter of notoriety in New Plymouth that there had been great uneasiness as to what this Mr. Jones had been doing at Mokau; and that feeling was not confined to New Plymouth alone. He had no idea, when he read this question on the Order Paper, that it would have given rise to such a storm of indignation and terror on the part of the Opposition. He must say he sympathized with the late Native Minister, who deprecated the opposition to printing the papers. He might well say, "Save me from my friends."

Mr. TURNBULL asked leave to explain that the reason why he opposed the motion of the honorable member for Collingwood for the printing of this paper was that, if the House sanctioned the printing of every paper placed on the table in reply to a question, it would have the effect of turning every question into a subject for debate. That would prevent honorable members obtaining the information they sought for, and which they considered would be useful.

Mr. McLEAN thought the House had obtained some very useful information in regard to this matter, and that it would be well that that information should go forth to the public. The honorable member for Totara said that this system of asking questions had grown up to be a great abuse. He would ask that honorable gentleman to tell him how many of the returns which were asked for or moved for and sanctioned by the House during last session and the session before had been laid on the table. The fact was that, in defiance of the wishes of the House, as shown by the resolutions which had been passed, the late Government had furnished no returns; but now, when they had got people in office who would give some information, it was surely right that honorable members should take the opportunity of getting the information they desired.

As for what the honorable member for Waitaki said, it would be rather a strange thing if honorable members were only allowed to put questions to please other honorable members, and when those honorable gentlemen told them they might do so. Every honorable member had a right to take his own time for putting any question, and for putting it in such a way that he might get the best possible information on the subject. He hoped the papers relating to this now celebrated Mr. Jones would be printed, and circulated throughout the colony, and that, this matter having been unearthed, papers on other subjects of a similar kind might be obtained.

Mr. READER WOOD would be sorry to throw the slightest obstacle in the way of honorable gentlemen getting all the information they desired on any subjects in which they might be interested. In fact, he wished himself to obtain a little additional information to that which had already been furnished on this particular subject. It appeared to him there was some fatality connected with the name of Jones in that House. Some years ago there was a Mr. Jones brought up to the bar of the House, whom the House was going to hang, draw, and quarter without mercy, and yet the whole business ended in an expense to the colony of some thousands of pounds, and nothing more. He feared, if they were going further into the case of the present Mr. Jones, it might cost the colony something the same. Therefore he wished to ask the Government if they would state whether this Mr. Jones was any relation to the other Mr. Jones; and, if so, whether the result of this question was likely to lead the colony into as great an expense as that incurred with regard to the other Mr. Jones.

Mr. GIBBORNE would point out that it was laid down in May that "when a question affects the character of a member, or reflects upon the conduct of other persons, it is more properly the subject of a motion, which can be conveniently debated."

Major ATKINSON said there was no reflection whatever upon the character of any one in the question put by the honorable member for Grey and Bell, as any honorable member could see who would take the trouble of reading it through. The late Native Minister had himself asked the House to consent to the printing of the papers, and no doubt that honorable gentleman would be well able, when the proper time came, to defend himself, if any charges were made against him. He submitted also that there was no imputation in the papers themselves; and all the Government had done was to answer the question put to them by bringing the papers down.

Mr. SPEAKER saw nothing irregular in the question put by the honorable member for Grey and Bell. He must say, however, that an irregularity had been growing up for years in the House, and that was, seeking to obtain returns by means of questions. He thought returns should not be obtained except by motion.

Motion agreed to.

"HANNAH MOKAU."

Colonel TRIMBLE asked the Government,

If it has, or ever had, any pecuniary interest or liability in regard to the steamship "Hannah Mokau;" if so, under what circumstances did the Government acquire such interest? and has Government received any dividend or interest upon its shares or mortgage or advance upon the said "Hannah Mokau"? Has Government paid for the share or other interest in said ship held in the name of Rewi, Te Wetera, or other Native; if so, what amount has Government thus paid, and what security is held for repayment?

Mr. BRYCE replied,—1. Pecuniary interest: The Government hold a mortgage over the vessel for £864. 2. Liability: A subsidy at the rate of £300 a year has been promised while service to Mokau is satisfactorily performed. Subsidy for past eight months has been withheld on account of irregularity of service. 3. Circumstances under which interest was acquired: The steamer was seized by parties to whom she had been assigned as security for money left owing on her construction; and as Rewi and others held shares in her, and it being considered of political importance she should be kept in the trade, it was decided that the money should be paid, and the assignment taken over by the Government, which was done. 4. The Government have received no dividend or interest. 5. £100 each has been paid on account of Rewi and Wetera for shares held in the steamer.

Mr. SHEEHAN said that was a perfectly fair and straightforward account of the transaction. He would move that the honorable gentleman's answer be printed.

Motion agreed to.

TIMARU COUNTY.

Mr. WAKEFIELD asked the Government, Whether they have received a petition from electors within the proposed County of Timaru, praying that the county may not be constituted; and, if so, whether they will lay a copy of it before this House?

Mr. HALL replied that the Government had not received the petition described in the question. A petition was presented, asking for the constitution of part of the County of Geraldine into a separate county, to be called the Timaru County. That included the Riding of Timaru and a portion of the adjoining Riding of Mount Cook. The Government had received no direct petition that the County of Timaru might not be constituted; but they had received a petition from the residents of the part of the adjoining Riding of Mount Cook, asking that they might not be included in that county.

PUBLIC WORKS CONTRACTS.

Mr. MACANDREW asked the Minister for Public Works, If he will lay before this House a return showing the whole of the colonial public works under his department at present contracted for within each provincial district, the name of the contractor and date of contract in each case, the time for completion, amount of tender, and progress-payment to date; also, the number and date of appropriation by Parliament, or other authority by virtue of which such contract or engagement has been entered into?

Mr. OLIVER replied that the return would be put in hand at once. It embraced the whole of the public works, and would take some little time to prepare.

OTAGO HARBOUR.

Mr. MACANDREW asked the Premier, What action, if any, the Government propose to take on the subject of a petition from the inhabitants of Port Chalmers and surrounding districts, praying for inquiry into the present condition of Otago Harbour, which petition has been referred by His Excellency the Governor to his Responsible Advisers?

Mr. HALL replied that the general question of the state of the harbour had been already referred to Sir John Coode. The Government, when they sent to Sir John Coode the further information which he asked for in reference to Otago Harbour, would also refer this petition to him.

ASHBURTON COURTHOUSE.

Mr. WRIGHT asked the Minister of Justice, If he will cause a sum of money to be placed on the estimates for building a Courthouse at Ashburton? In 1878, £300 was put on the estimates for building a Courthouse at Ashburton, or, rather, for fitting up an old building worth about half that sum. The residents protested against this course being taken, and last session the Government promised to sanction the expenditure of £500, but up to this time nothing had been done. Ashburton was the centre of a large and increasing population. There were no fewer than six lawyers practising in the borough, and the accommodation was altogether inadequate for the business. He hoped the Minister would see his way to put a substantial sum on the estimates for a suitable building.

Mr. ROLLESTON replied that he had looked into this question, and he was personally aware of the circumstances stated by the honorable member. The Government recognized the importance of the work, and would place a sum of money on the estimates for the purpose.

TARANAKI VOLUNTEERS.

Colonel TRIMBLE asked the Defence Minister, Whether he is aware that the great bulk of the Taranaki Volunteers are armed with antiquated muzzle-loading rifles, many of them of inferior quality even of their kind; and when the Taranaki Volunteers will be armed with breech-loading rifles?

Mr. HALL replied that, out of 970 Volunteers in the Taranaki District, 618 were armed with muzzle-loaders. Two thousand stand of Sniders had been ordered from England, and should be on their way out at the present time. The present Government had given directions for the remainder of the short Sniders in store in Wellington, amounting to about 320, to be issued to the Volunteers of Taranaki.

MOKAU LAND.

Colonel TRIMBLE asked the Premier, Whether the Government has authorized or assisted Mr. Joshua Jones, or other person, to lease or purchase a tract of land to the extent of about 30,000 acres from the Natives, north-east of the Mokau River; and whether the surveyors now engaged in defining the boundaries of the said land are in the pay of the Government, or have been instructed in any way as to their procedure by the Government?

Mr. BRYCE replied that this question also appeared to be connected with the famous name of Jones; but he hoped that on this occasion it would not cause much discussion. It appeared that the late Native Minister did inform Mr. Jones that the Government would not interfere with him in acquiring a block of land of considerable extent, but the exact acreage of which he (Mr. Bryce) did not know. That promise appeared only to have been made with respect to the leasing of the block. It did not refer to the purchase of the land. The promise was supplemented by an assurance that the Government would assist him so far as it could in acquiring that leasehold from the Natives. With respect to the survey of the block, it was now being taken by surveyors in the employment of the Government. He had endeavoured to ascertain whether any bond or other form of security existed for the repayment of the cost of survey, and had found no trace of it; but he was not prepared to say that the statement of the late Native Minister with reference to the matter was not correct. It might possibly be in some office in Taranaki.

Mr. SHEEHAN said that, for the sake of being able to say a few words, he would move, That the answer be laid on the table. He would not go into this transaction just now, but he was prepared to say that the honorable gentleman had explained very fairly that the late Government had allowed a lease of this land to be got. The reason was, that the land lay alongside the King-country, and they thought it was a favourable opportunity for breaking down the border. The facts were perfectly well known in Taranaki, and the Government gave no assistance beyond what the law required. The moment he gave his consent to the survey being taken the matter passed into another department, and therefore, if the usual bond had not been taken, he could not help it.

RAILWAY IRON AND ROLLING-STOCK.

Mr. SUTTON asked the Minister for Public Works,—(1.) What amount has been paid since 1st July last to Messrs. Guthrie and Larnach for the supply of railway iron and railway rolling-stock, and what amount is still owing on the same account? (2.) Whether the arrangement was a private one, or was it open to public competition? (3.) Whether they will lay before this House all correspondence between the Government, the Agent-General or any other officer, and Messrs. Guthrie and Larnach, in reference to the supply by that company of railway material?

Mr. OLIVER replied that he had had a return prepared showing the state of the account. The sum already paid was £12,450 17s. 6d., and the return would show what balance remained unpaid, and what portion of the contract still remained unfulfilled. He would lay that return on the table. With regard to the second part of the question, he had to say that the contract was open to public competition. It was advertised in the usual manner, and certain tenders were received, of which Messrs. Guthrie and Larnach's appeared to be the lowest. The Government would have no objection to lay the whole correspondence on the table.

WAIKATO-THAMES RAILWAY.

Mr. McLEAN asked the Minister for Public Works, If he will lay before this House a copy of the plan, and estimate, and certificate of the Engineer in Charge of the North Island in connection with the railway from Waikato to the Thames: also, a distinctively-coloured map, showing the surveys that have been made of the country between Grahamstown and Te Aroha, and those parts which have not been surveyed; also showing how far the surveys of the line between Grahamstown and Te Aroha have been completed, and the place where the Natives stepped in and prevented the surveyors going any further, and the place where the man Williams was shot, near Ohinemuri?

Mr. OLIVER replied that he had instructed the District Engineer to furnish as soon as possible the plans and maps asked for. Plans and estimates were laid upon the table on the 9th of August last. The other information required would be supplied as soon as possible.

Mr. SHEEHAN said that, if the honorable gentleman wished the House to understand that the man was shot on the railway survey, he was mistaken. He was shot at another place.

AUCKLAND NATIVE LAND COURT.

Mr. ANDREWS asked the Government, If they will lay before this House a return showing the annual cost of conducting and maintaining the head office of the Native Land Court at Auckland?

Mr. BRYCE said the return asked for was in course of preparation, and would be ready in a very few days.

CHATHAM ISLANDS LAND-TAX.

Mr. WAKEFIELD asked the Government, Whether they have received any communication from the inhabitants of the Chatham Islands relative to the enforcement of a land-tax on that territory; and, if so, whether they will lay a copy of it before this House?

Major ATKINSON replied that the Government had received a communication from the inhabitants of the Chatham Islands, a copy of which he would now lay on the table of the House.

POKENO LAND AND PUKEKOHE-BOMBAY ROAD.

Major HARRIS asked the Government, If they will lay before this House a copy of all correspondence between the Rev. S. Norrie, Rev. D. Bruce, and others, with the Government, in reference to a claim to Lot 784, Queen's Redoubt, Pokeno? Also, if the settlers through whose land a road has been taken between Pukekohe and the Bombay Settlement have signed a deed dedicating said road? If so, have they been compensated, as agreed upon; or, if not compensated, when they will be?

Mr. ROLLESTON said the papers asked for were very voluminous, and contained a good deal of conflicting information. If the honorable gentleman wished it, he would be very glad to lay either the whole or any of them on the table of the House. He would suggest to the honorable gentleman to call at the office and make a selection from the papers. With regard to the latter part of the question, he found that cheques for compensation had been issued from the Treasury on the 24th September and 8th October respectively.

NORTHERN MAORI DISTRICT.

Mr. BEETHAM rose to draw the attention of the House, as a question of privilege, to the allegations contained in the petition of Hirini Rawiri Taiwhanga, and then to move the appointment of a Select Committee to report on the same. Such Committee to consist of Mr. Brandon, Mr. De Lautour, Sir George Grey, Mr. Hislop, Mr. Murray, Mr. Ormond, Mr. Rolleston, and the mover; five to form a quorum. To report within a week.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR wished to raise the question whether or not this motion was in order. By the rules of the House, if objection were not taken at once, it could not afterwards be raised, when the question was once put. He observed that this motion had been put upon the Order Paper with, he presumed, the concurrence of the Speaker. It had been on the Order Paper for some days as a notice of motion. Now, so far as he could find, the rule was that motions of privilege could take precedence if they were of urgency and relative to a matter which arose suddenly. In this case, however, the cause arose before the session commenced, and Parliament had now been sitting nearly a month. During the whole of that time it was open to the honorable member to give notice of his intended motion in the ordinary course. On the previous day there was an opportunity for the honorable member to move. His notice of motion was on the Paper, and he would have been in order in at once raising the question. What he (Mr. De Lautour) wished to draw particular attention to was the inconvenience that would arise if this practice were allowed, except in cases where a question of privilege arose suddenly, and was a matter of urgency. Suppose, in the interest of party on either side of the House, honorable members packed the Order Paper, as he believed had been done, with notices of motion for party purposes. Suppose that these motions assumed the form of questions of privilege, and suppose honorable members watched their opportunity and brought them on suddenly on any day whenever it suited the interests of their party to do so, it would impede all business being done. Such an engine of party warfare would be quite new in this House. At present they had arrived at a state of things when one vote either way was a substantial advantage. They had arrived at a position when a motion of want of confidence was absolutely before the House. A supporter of one side, after a month's opportunity, during which period no action was taken, and after this notice of motion had been on the Order Paper several days, now suddenly interrupted the business by bringing on a question affecting the seat of a member of this House. By the rule laid down, this question, not having been brought up as a matter of urgency, not having been brought before the House, although on the Order Paper, should be dealt with as an adjourned question. In the Imperial Parliament, a question relating to the Bridport election appeared to have been brought up suddenly, and the Speaker said,—

"I will remind the House of the relative strictness with which the rule as to privilege is enforced. If a debate on a question of undoubted privilege be adjourned, on its renewal it is not entitled to precedence. . . . It appears to me that the House ought not to allow subjects to be introduced as of privilege, of which notice for a future day can without inconvenience be given."

An opportunity had been given to the honorable gentleman to bring this motion before the House since he placed the notice on the Order Paper.

Mr. SPEAKER understood the honorable gentleman to say that this was an adjourned debate. In what way had it been adjourned?

Mr. DE LAUTOUR said it stood in the position of an adjourned debate, because an opportunity had been given to the honorable gentleman to bring the motion forward since the matter to which it referred occurred and was within his knowledge and that of the House. Therefore it was not a question of urgency, and the rule dealing with adjourned debates was applicable to this case. The rule undoubtedly was, that matter brought forward suddenly to intercept business must have arisen suddenly, and be a matter of urgency. Having failed for several days to bring the question forward, it could not be taken to be a question of such urgency as to intercept the ordinary business. He submitted this view more in the interest of the practice of this House, not at all doubting the Speaker's care over the interests of this House. If the proposed course were allowed it could be used as an engine of party warfare. There would be nothing to prevent honorable members on either side of the House from loading the Order Paper with motions of privilege, and raising them day after day, as suited their party leaders. It had been so in this case. He ventured to suggest that such a course ought not to be allowed unless it could be shown that the question was one of urgency. The question could not be considered as such, inasmuch as it had not arisen suddenly. He submitted that the objections he had raised were applicable to the present case. If the proposed course were allowed they would be establishing a new departure in their practice.

Mr. SPEAKER said he had looked very carefully into the matter, and he found that anything that affected the right of a gentleman to a seat in this House was a matter of privilege, and as such was entitled to be considered the first thing on the Paper. He did not find among the authorities he had consulted one instance in which a matter affecting an election was not considered as one of privilege. The honorable gentleman was quite right in saying that he (Mr. Speaker) would not allow any irregular procedure on the score of privilege to be adopted and used as a means of party warfare in this House. He would take special care that the claim of privilege should not be extended to any notice of motion which did not strictly relate to a matter of privilege.

Mr. TOLE would like to ask the ruling of Mr. Speaker as to whether this motion could be considered—raising a question of privilege based upon a petition which was not actually before the House. The basis of the honorable gentleman's motion was in regard to certain allegations contained in a petition. Honorable members had a right to see that petition. If they looked at it, they would see that it was in the nature of an election petition; and for that reason it should have been presented to the House within a certain number of days, and should comply with the provisions of the Election Petitions Act. In no single particular did it comply with the provisions of that Act. With all respect to the opinion of Mr. Speaker, he would submit that this was a question of privilege based on an informal petition not before the House, and could not be brought forward by the honorable member. He would also submit that the petition came within the meaning of the 276th Standing Order: "Petitions in the nature of election petitions will not be received unless the forms required by the Election Petitions Act have been complied with, the same being certified by the proper officer." He had seen the petition, and he was aware that it had not been certified to by the proper officer. If the honorable gentleman had raised the question of privilege on his own mere motion, and from his own knowledge that a gentleman sitting in this House had no right to be in the House, the House would rule that he was perfectly in order in raising it as a question of privilege; but, inasmuch as the present question of privilege was based upon allegations contained in a document which was informal, and therefore not before the House, he would submit that the honorable gentleman was not in order in going on with the question.

Mr. SPEAKER found the law clearly laid down that—

"Whenever any question is raised affecting the seat of a member, and involving matters of doubt either in law or fact, it is customary to refer it to the consideration of a Committee."

He thought the arguments just used were such as ought to be addressed to such a body as the Committee appointed to try the merits of an election petition, and which had to try the question whether or not the sitting member was disqualified.

Major ATKINSON said the 285th Standing Order entirely disposed of the honorable gentleman's objection. This was a petition from a person of the Native race, and the rules of the House did not apply to such petitions.

Mr. SPEAKER said the provisions of the Election Petitions Acts applied equally to petitions coming from the Native race. The provisions of those Acts had to be conformed to, as in the case of the late Karaitiana when a petitioner.

Mr. BEETHAM deprecated any idea whatever of using this motion in any way as an engine for party warfare. Such was not at all the case. If the honorable member for Mount Ida had inquired into the facts he would have found that it was on the 10th of October he presented a petition from Hirini Rawiri Taiwhanga to this House. He then gave notice that he should on a certain day move for a Committee to inquire into the allegations contained in that petition. And as he then mentioned that it was a question of privilege, the honorable member must know that he must have alluded to that part of the petition which referred to the disqualification of Hone Mohi Tawhai. He (Mr. Beetham) was well aware that an election petition would not have been in order if he had presented it in the way he did. He was well aware that an election petition had to go through certain forms. But this referred to a question of disqualification, and, as such, he gave notice that he should move for the appointment of a Committee to examine and report upon the allegations contained in the petition of Hirini Taiwhanga. It was necessary that he should read the two charges contained in the petition of Hirini Taiwhanga. The petition began in the usual form, and then went on to say,—

"The undersigned, your petitioner and second highest candidate that polled among the number voted for for the election of a Maori member to Parliament for the Northern Maori Electoral District, sheweth—

"That the election of Hone Mohi Tawhai, as Maori representative in Parliament for this electoral district, is altogether illegal under 'The Disqualification Act, 1878;' but that I, Hirini Taiwhanga, according to this Act, am the legal candidate to be returned to Parliament as member.

"The grounds upon which I lay this claim are the same as those which are contained in the protest I laid before and explained to Mr. Kemp, Returning Officer, on the day of the official declaration of the poll.

"HIRINI RAWIRI TAIWHANGA."

These were the grounds of protest directed to Mr. Kemp, the Returning Officer:—

"Kaikohe, Bay of Islands,

"15th September, 1879.

"SIR,—I, the undersigned, beg to inform you that Hone Mohi Tawhai is not at all the proper person to be returned as member for this Maori electoral district in Parliament, neither is Timoti Puhipi (that is, if he is elected), but that I am the proper person to be returned as member.

"The grounds of protest are—firstly, That the said Hone Mohi Tawhai and Timoti Puhipi are Assessors, and they did not send in their resignations before the day of nomination. Because, if that is allowable according to the Act, why, all Government servants holding salaries from £20 to £700 per annum can stand to be elected to Parliament. Now, when he (Mobi) saw (and the Native Minister saw) that he headed the poll, a telegram was immediately sent by the Native Minister—that is, the Government—warning Hone Mohi Tawhai and Timoti Puhipi to quickly resign their appointments before the hour of the official declaration of the poll: that probably one of them might be elected, or even if they were not they had nothing to fear, because they would be reinstated to their offices by the Government. If the law allows this, it will be causing a great injustice to those not holding Government offices.

The petition then went on to state that certain acts of bribery were committed during that election; but he did not think he should be in order at the present time in referring to this. What he had now to do was to move that a Committee be appointed, to whom should be referred this question of disqualification. Of course, if the Committee wished to go into the question they could make a representation, if they pleased, on this point of bribery and corruption; but this was a matter he would leave in the hands of the Committee. It had been said by the honorable member for Mount Ida that he (Mr. Beetham) did not take advantage when he had an opportunity of bringing this question of privilege before the House. When he presented the petition on the 10th October he gave notice that on Tuesday last he should move that this Committee should be appointed. He gave full notice of it—

Mr. SHEEHAN.—In writing?

Mr. BEETHAM.—I gave notice to the Clerk of the House—

Mr. SHEEHAN.—In writing?

Mr. BEETHAM said he gave notice of motion in the usual form that he should, on Tuesday last, move for the appointment of a Committee. He did not ask Mr. Speaker to allow him to put a question of privilege, but waited until the usual time should arrive when notices of motion should be gone on with; but it was well known the House never got there, and when the morning sitting closed on the following day he found his motion was in the same position as before, not through any fault of his. His motion had gone down in the Order Paper, and at Wednesday's evening sitting he asked Mr. Speaker, as a point of order, whether he could then bring on this question of privilege before the House. Some honorable members objected that they did not hear his remarks on that point. Possibly, if the honorable member for Mount Ida had heard them, he would have known it was not his (Mr. Beetham's) fault that this question was not before the House yesterday. He was not merely going on the allegations contained in this petition. He had considered it his duty, as he had given notice for the appointment of a Committee, to inquire into the truth or otherwise of the allegations contained in that petition, and he found that the nomination for the Northern Maori District took place on the 1st September, that the election took place on the 8th September, and that the resignation of Hone Mohi Tawhai, as

Assessor, took place on the 10th September. He thought this showed quite clearly that there was a very good case to go to a Committee, and he could not understand why any objection could be taken to that course being adopted. He merely wished that this question should be fairly considered; and, in giving notice of certain names which he should propose on the Committee, he had carefully taken members from both sides of the House, to insure that the inquiry should be a full and impartial one. An honorable member had referred to a question which had previously been raised in regard to a late member for Auckland City West, and it might be as well that he should inform the House that a Committee was granted in that case. He felt doubtful where to take precedents from—whether to go to the Old Country, or to take the precedents that had arisen here. He had heard it stated that they should not go for precedents to the Old Country. He did not believe in that at all—he did not believe they could do better than in most cases to follow the precedents laid down by the British Parliament; but in this case they had precedents of their own to guide them. The late Mr. John Williamson, after the election for Auckland City West had taken place, wrote to the then Speaker (Sir F. Dillon Bell), stating that when he was elected he held the office of Commissioner of Crown Lands, and that the validity of his election had been called in question. The Speaker read this letter to the House. Mr. Fox then moved, “That a respectful address be presented to His Excellency the Governor, praying him to issue a new writ for the election of a member for Auckland City West.” There was a certain discussion, in which Mr. O'Neill and Mr. Gisborne and others took part. Mr. Gisborne thought the proper course to adopt would be to move the appointment of a Committee:—

“If Mr. Williamson had addressed a letter announcing his resignation to the Speaker, the case would have been analogous to a case referred to in May's Parliamentary Practice, and the House could have issued a new writ. As, however, the question was one of very great importance, it should not be decided on the spur of the moment. He therefore thought that, in order to establish a precedent, it would be advisable to appoint a Committee to search for precedents, and to inform the House of the result of their investigations. . . . He would therefore move, as an amendment, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the practice of this House and the law on points arising in connection with the elections, and especially with regard to the election for Auckland City West. The Committee to consist of Mr. Speaker, Mr. Brandon, Mr. Eves, Mr. Fox, Sir D. Monro, Mr. O'Rorke, Mr. Stafford, Mr. Bunny, and the mover.”

This was carried on the 15th August. One day after that, Mr. Fox brought up the report of the Committee on the Auckland City West Election. The report was read, as follows:—

“The Select Committee, to whom was referred by your honorable House to inquire into the practice of this House and the law on all points arising in connection with the election for Auckland City

Mr. Beetham

West, have, in obedience to the order of your honorable House, searched for precedents, and ascertained the practice of and the law of Parliament bearing on the subject; and have come to the following resolutions:—

"1. That the return of Mr. John Williamson for Auckland City West was null and void, he holding, at the time of his return, an office of emolument by appointment of the Governor of New Zealand.

"2. That the Committee do recommend that the House do direct Mr. Speaker to forthwith issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Writs, to make out a new writ to supply the vacancy.

"Which resolutions the Committee have directed me to report to the House."

It was ordered that the report lie on the table. On the motion of Mr. Fox, it was ordered,—

"That Mr. Speaker be directed to issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Writs to make out a new writ for electing a member of this House for the District of Auckland City West, in the room of John Williamson, Esquire, whose election is declared null and void."

He did not think it necessary to go further into the question of precedent; but he thought he had shown that if the allegations contained in the petition of Hirini Taiwhanga could be sustained—and he considered that they were sustained by the information with which he had made himself acquainted—this was a case which should be inquired into without delay. He might say in conclusion that, if the House should deem that the Committee he had mentioned was not a fair one, he was quite prepared, with the permission of the House, to amend his motion by introducing any new names that might be thought satisfactory to honorable members generally. He only wished that this question should be fairly, honestly, and straightforwardly considered, in order that if Hone Mohi Tawhai was disqualified he might not sit in that House subject to a penalty of £50 per diem. He did not think it necessary that he should quote from the Disqualification Act. The provisions of that Act were, of course, well known to members of that House. It would be for the Committee, when it met, to say whether or not Hone Mohi Tawhai was disqualified to sit as a member of that House.

Mr. STEWART said he would like to be informed whether this Disqualification Act had ever been translated into the Maori language, because it seemed to him that it would be a gross injustice on the part of the House to make subject to to the Act men who were entirely ignorant of its provisions.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Oh!

Mr. STEWART.—Some honorable gentleman said "Oh!" He could not congratulate that honorable gentleman on his sense of justice. He conceived it to be one of the fundamental rules of legislation that those to be affected by laws should have an opportunity of understanding the laws which governed them; and if it was to be suggested that the House was to be guilty of an act of injustice towards one of the Maori race by making him subject to an Act which had never been translated to him and a knowledge of which he had had no opportunity of acquiring, and that because he had unconsciously transgressed a technical Act, he was very sorry for those who brought forward such a proposition. He appealed to all who had any sense of honor and justice to say whether, in this case, at all events, a Maori member of the House should be sacrificed to technical legislation, of which he could have had no knowledge. It was clearly the intention of the House, in bringing into operation the existing code of Standing Orders, that all legislation affecting the Maori race should be translated into the Maori language, so that they should have an opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of the law. Standing Order 355 provided,—

"Speeches addressed to the House by His Excellency the Governor, and Bills introduced into the House specially affecting the Maoris, are translated and printed in the Maori tongue for the information of Her Majesty's subjects of that race."

This Disqualification Act specially affected the Maoris.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—No.

Mr. STEWART.—The honorable member for Geraldine said "No;" but, if it did not, why was it sought to make them subject to it?

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—Not specially.

Mr. STEWART.—Yes, specially. It would be a gross violation of justice to say that a Bill which so specially affected Maoris as this did, but which was not translated even when brought into force, should be held to apply to Maoris. The honorable member for Geraldine did not seem to agree with him; but he quite appreciated that honorable gentleman's high sense of justice in relation to this as well as to other matters. However, the point he wished to bring before the Speaker was one which would commend itself to the judgment of every independent member of the House, and that was, whether, if these Standing Orders had not been complied with, it would be fair or just, the House having transgressed its own rules, to set that Act in motion against a Maori member. He would like to know whether the Act ever had been translated into the Maori language.

Mr. SPEAKER said he had no information on the subject.

Mr. SHEEHAN thought this was the most extraordinary motion that had been brought forward for some time past. The gentleman who brought this petition forward had been spoken of very contemptuously a few months ago by his friends on that side of the House—he himself had heard that gentleman spoken of in the lobbies in a very slighting manner; but times had changed and men had changed, and now honorable members were invited, at the instance of that gentleman, to discuss a proposition to deprive the House of one of the best-behaved Maori chiefs in the whole colony, on a purely technical point. The honorable member for Wairarapa (Mr. Beetham) told the House that he had carefully picked out the Committee; and he (Mr. Sheehan) quite agreed with him. There was plenty of evidence as to the care shown by the honorable member, in the fact that on the Committee there were to be five members from the Government side of the House and three from the Opposition. For a young member—not young in years, but young in taking part in these debates—he had shown wonderful discrimination; and he (Mr. Sheehan) should think such care would in time bring him to the front in his party. Now, what did the speech the House had just heard mean? This was the interpretation: “Hone Mohi Tawhai, we have discovered a technical flaw in your election: if you had come to our side, and had voted with us, we should never have raised a finger against you, but as you have gone over to the other side we are going to put the law in operation against you. Do not come into the House, or you will have to suffer a penalty of £50 a day. Hone Mohi Tawhai, please clear out until this division is over.” Now, that honorable gentleman had spoken in the House during the want-of-confidence debate, and said that he was a chief, and was going to vote like a chief; and he (Mr. Sheehan) now said he was a chief, and that he would vote like a chief. What were the facts? Until 1878 the Disqualification Act did not apply to the Maori members at all, and many who held seats in the House, and voted with the Government which existed before 1878, drew salaries while they were members, and when they left the House their salaries were converted into pensions. Dozens of cases could be cited to show that. He might mention the case of Tairaroa, who, while he remained a member of the House, drew a salary of £100 a year. Indeed, but for the fact of that being discovered just before he was called to the Upper House, he would have been disqualified. It was the “continuous Ministry” who set the example of paying salaries to members of the House; and, when the law was so altered as to prevent that state of things, there was not a single Maori who knew of the change. He confessed that, although a member of the Legislature which had passed the law, he had forgotten the change, and should not have remembered it had not Major Te Wheoro found it out just in time, and telegraphed announcing his resignation. The Act had never been translated into Maori, and the Natives were quite ignorant of it. As to the petition which had been referred to by the honorable member for Wairarapa, he (Mr. Sheehan) had intended to call attention to it himself, because it alleged he had sent certain telegrams to Hone Mohi Tawhai, which statements he had no hesitation in characterizing as absolutely untrue, as absolute falsehoods; and he defied the honorable member or any member of that House to produce a telegram of the kind.

MR. BEETHAM.—I did not say the telegram had been sent.

MR. SHEEHAN.—No; but the honorable gentleman made himself the vehicle for conveying that impression to the House.

MR. BEETHAM.—I merely quoted from the petition, but did not say the statements were true.

MR. SHEEHAN said, if a petition were given to him reflecting upon the conduct of another honorable member, he would have made inquiry as to the truth of its allegations before he brought that petition before the House. Supposing a charge of forgery, or any such grave crime, were made in a petition, would it not be the duty of an honorable member, before calling attention to that charge, to get some evidence as to the truth of the statement—to get some evidence to show that there was at least a prima facie case? Certainly, the honorable member ought to have taken some such step before bringing this matter before the House, because the statement was absolutely untrue. He defied the production of a telegram of the kind. So far as he (Mr. Sheehan) was concerned, he would give the honorable gentleman leave to go to the telegraph office and search it. Although asked to assist in the election, he refused point-blank to interfere, and so in other cases. They had had a number of cases cited; but let the House go back awhile and look at the case of Karaitiana. They had heard talk about the Government influencing elections; but let the House look at the facts connected with that election. An honorable gentleman in the House had acted with him on that occasion who no doubt would oppose him in this instance; but he would nevertheless remember the facts. Witnesses came before the Committee which tried the allegations in that case, and said that they thought they were acting as “Returning Officers for the Government candidate;” and they actually went about the country getting persons’ names in a book, so as to save those persons the trouble of attending the poll to vote. There had been four Maori elections during the last six months, and he defied the honorable gentlemen opposite to produce one single instance in which the Government had influenced an election, although, as a matter of fact, they were entitled, as a party, to do all they possibly could. There had been a great deal of talk about using the “Hinemoa” for political purposes in the Government interest; but what had been done? He had taken the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District, and some of his supporters, in the “Hinemoa,” and landed them where they wished to be landed, for the purpose of carrying on their election. He had been asked to interfere in these elections, but had refused. The honorable gentleman ought not to have given currency to such statements until he had made inquiries, or without first coming to him and saying, “Here, Mr. Sheehan, are certain statements affecting you, to which I shall have to refer. You had better read them, so that you may be able to answer them if you choose.” That would have been gentlemanly conduct. No doubt, however, it was nothing more than an indiscretion on the part of the honorable gentleman, because, though he was an intense party man, he would not have wilfully taken an unfair advantage of an opponent. Still, it was to be regretted that he had not taken the course indicated. In the case of Karaitiana, it was also proved that in two instances no poll had been taken; yet the House held that, under the peculiar franchise of the Maoris, and seeing that there were thirty or forty polling-places, a small matter like that should not be allowed to interfere with the return. But what was the fact in this case? A man who represented in his person the highest Maori blood of the country—and he stated that advisedly—a man who had been a public officer for many years, receiving the enormous salary of £50 per year, was to be rejected upon a mere technicality. Let the House go back for awhile. He had seen members of the House under the late Government getting £800 to £1,000 a year, and there was no discussion about it; yet this Maori, who knew nothing of the law—because he had not resigned his assessorship until after the election, though he did resign before the poll was declared—was to be made to suffer. The law had practically never been known to the Maoris, because the Act had never been rendered into the Maori language. And, indeed, as he said before, although he was a member of the House at the time, the provision would have been unknown to him except for the telegram he received from Te Wheoro. He might add it would be found that he had advised Te Wheoro not to give up his office at a good salary to come into the House; but he would not accept that advice. Unless the honorable gentleman would accept a reconstruction of the Committee, so as to make it a fair and impartial Committee, the Opposition would oppose the motion, and oppose it, as he believed, successfully. But, even if the Committee were appointed, and brought up a report adverse to the sitting member, he should move. That in the opinion of this House it would be a fair thing to bring in a Bill to remove the effects of this technical measure so far as Hone Mohi Tawhai was concerned. He would appeal to their sense of fair-play, and felt perfectly certain that unless the proposed Committee were reconstructed the motion of the honorable member for Wairarapa would not be passed. He said further that, even if they asked the House to disqualify Hone Mohi Tawhai on that special ground, he felt sure the House would direct them to bring in a Bill to make his election good. He trusted the honorable gentleman would reconstitute the Committee; otherwise he would oppose it tooth and nail.

Mr. WAKEFIELD must say that he was very much surprised at the tone adopted by the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) on an occasion of this kind. Until the honorable gentleman rose—or, rather, until the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stewart) rose—he had no idea that there was any party heat connected with this matter. He knew nothing about this matter, except that he had heard that one of the Native members was an Assessor at the time he was elected, and that consequently he was liable to a penalty for every day he sat in the House, and was absolutely disqualified by law. He repeated the assertion that until the honorable member for Dunedin City rose he had no idea that this was being made a party question in any way, and he was very much astonished when the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) showed so much heat in connection with a matter which ought not to be dealt with from a party point of view. Surely, the question of whether disqualification should be strictly considered was much more important to the House than the question of whether this party or the other should gain a temporary advantage in the House. This was not in the least a question of fair-play. It was simply a question of what was the law and what was the practice of the House. If the honorable member was disqualified it was absolutely necessary that some step should be taken in order that he might be removed from the House, or that the necessary means should be adopted to purge him of the disqualification by an amending Act. The contention of the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stewart), that this matter could not be gone on with because the Statute of 1868 had not been translated into the Maori language, was simply a ridiculous one. He had always observed that when a lawyer got up in that House to give them cheap law he always gave them very bad law. He was sure the honorable gentleman would never be at the head of his profession—as he boasted he was—if he dealt out such bad law to his clients as he had dealt out to the House. His opinion was not only not worth six-and-eightpence, but it was not worth three farthings. The fundamental basis of the law was, that everybody who was subject to the law was assumed to be cognizant of it. The honorable gentleman went on the understanding that no one was subject to the law unless he was acquainted with it. That was his argument—that the honorable member could not be made subject to the Disqualification Act because at the time when he became an offender under that Act he was not aware of the existence or of the provisions of the Act. Why, the honorable gentleman flew in the face of the fundamental principle of that particular branch of the law of which he himself professed to be the exponent. This Act was not an Act specially affecting the Maori race. It was quite obvious that the meaning of the word “special” was this: that the Act should affect the Maori race and not others. Now, this Act affected all classes of subjects, including members of the Maori race; and it was therefore a general Act, generally affecting the Maori race, but not specially affecting them as dividing them from their fellow-subjects in the country. He did not speak on this subject in the least in the position of an advocate—not the least in the world. All that he said was this: that it was the duty of the House at once, without any delay, to remove any person from the position of being liable to a penalty under the Disqualification Act. He thought it a most improper threat to the House for an honorable gentleman to say that, if the honorable member for the Northern Maori District were disqualified, he would prevent the disqualification taking place, and would prevent the report of the Disqualification Committee being carried out, and that he would by some motion or other, which he did not specify, absolutely keep in that House, in defiance of the law, a person who was not qualified by law to sit there. The honorable gentleman had no right whatever to make such a statement. He (Mr. Wakefield) felt quite confident that, let party feeling be as it might, that House would put its foot on any attempt the honorable gentleman might make to set aside the law of disqualification in respect to members. The honorable gentleman might have seen also that, if he were able—as he (Mr. Wakefield) was convinced he was not able—to command a majority in the House in the direction of doing so wrong a thing as to obstruct the operation of the Disqualification Act, yet any person, no matter who, could issue a writ against the honorable member Hone Mohi Tawhai, and could recover £50 a day for every day he had sat in the House during this session, or for every day he might continue to sit; and the honorable member for the Thames would have no power over that person, who would be placed in the position of a suitor before the Courts by this Act. Why, the honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey) did actually issue writs in 1876 against the then Ministry. He declared that they were disqualified; and, although no attempt was made on the occasion to lay aside the Disqualification Act, the honorable gentleman did not trouble himself about a Disqualification Committee, but immediately went and issued writs against them, and put them to an enormous expense. That was in the memory of every honorable gentleman in the House; and the same course would be adopted in this case if any attempt were made by the honorable gentlemen opposite, from party motives, to prevent the operation of a law which was established, not for the benefit of any individuals, but for the good conduct and due dignity of that House as a legislative assembly. The honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) spoke in very strong and entirely uncalled-for terms of the action of the honorable member for Wairarapa (Mr. Beetham), with reference to a telegram which he was alleged to have sent to Hone Mohi Tawhai about the time of the election. The honorable member for Wairarapa never accused the honorable gentleman of sending any telegrams. He merely quoted from the report of Hirini Rawiri Taiwhanga, who stated that such a telegram had been sent, and mentioned it in connection with the retention of office by Hone Tawhai. The honorable member for the Thames declared that that was an insinuation against his character, and so forth. Why, he (Mr. Wakefield) should say it was quite a proper thing for the Native Minister to have done—to have sent a telegram to Hone Tawhai, warning him that he was an officer of the Government, and that he was therefore disqualified for standing for Parliament. It would have been a most proper thing to have done; and, so far from being an insinuation against his character, it was paying the honorable gentleman a very great compliment to suppose that he had had the good sense to send such a telegram to Hone Mohi Tawhai. If the statements which had been made in the petition of Hirini Rawiri Taiwhanga—and which had been repeated by the honorable member for Wairarapa—proved to be correct, it was quite clear to his mind that Hone Mohi Tawhai was disqualified from holding a seat in that House. Honorable gentlemen said, “Oh! but in the case of a Native!” In the case of a Native the law was just as strict, and properly so, as in the case of a European. What was done in the case of the first Maori election that was ever made to that House? Mete Kingi

Paetahi was elected for the Western Maori District in 1868. It was ascertained as soon as he came to Wellington that he was an Assessor at the time of his election, drawing a salary of exactly the same amount as that which Hone Mohi Tawhai was drawing. What did the late Sir Donald McLean do on that occasion? Did he come down and bounce the House, and rage at honorable members across the House, and tell them that, whatever the Disqualification Committee might say, he would see that the honorable member would retain his seat? Did he do anything so improper? Not at all. He came down to the House, and said, “Mete Kingi Paetahi is clearly disqualified by law from being elected to the House. He has not taken his seat; I have advised him not to take his seat; and I ask the House to pass an Indemnity Bill to meet his case.” The very first Act that was passed in the session of 1868 was the Mete Kingi Paetahi Election Indemnity Act; and the reason the late Sir Donald McLean then gave for asking that such a step should be taken was, that it was the first election of a Maori, and that it was unadvisable that it should be upset, no matter on how serious a ground. He made the Act a temporary Act, terminating at the close of that Parliament, and it was fully explained at that time that it was not to be made a precedent, but on the contrary was to deal with that particular case, because it was the first occasion when the Maori Representation Act was brought into force. Let honorable gentlemen look back to those facts, and then let them say whether the disqualification of a Native member should be made a party question or a question of mere sentiment. The honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Sheehan) had no business to bring personal qualifications into the case at all. It was not a question of whether Hone Mohi Tawhai was a highly-respected and worthy chief—as he (Mr. Wakefield) believed him to be. He might have been the most disreputable and unworthy chief in the country—his case should have received the same consideration at the hands of the House. It was not a matter of personal sympathy with him (Mr. Wakefield). It was simply a matter of the interpretation of the Disqualification Act by that House. He hoped honorable gentlemen would not be led away by any ideas such as those suggested by his honorable friend, but that they would proceed to the appointment of the Committee, and allow the matter to be gone on with in the ordinary way. And he would say this: that if it could be shown to be right and desirable, no matter on what ground, that a short Indemnity Bill should be passed qualifying the honorable member Hone Mohi Tawhai for his seat, he would be the very first to assist in the passage of such a measure. He had no desire whatever to deal with this question in a party manner; and any honorable member who attributed any such motive to him made a statement he had no business to make. He hoped they would look to the future, and remember that at any time a question of disqualification might arise, and that, if they acted on this occasion from the mere party feeling of the moment, they would be sorry for it, and find themselves placed in a difficulty from which they might save themselves by acting strictly in accordance with law and precedent on the present occasion.

Mr. HISLOP said he would move, by way of amendment, that the names of Mr. Stewart, Mr. Tole, Mr. Swanson, and Mr. Pitt be added to the Committee. He would say, with regard to the remarks of the honorable member for Geraldine, that, before that honorable gentleman took upon himself to correct the law laid down by any honorable member of that House, he ought to be sure that he himself was in a position to give a fair exposition of what the law was. He (Mr. Hislop) always understood that Bills which specially affected any particular individuals included Bills which took away from those individuals peculiar rights which they had under the law then existing. The Disqualification Act of 1876 contained a clause which specially exempted the Natives from the main provisions of the Act, but that section was repealed by the Act of 1878, which placed disabilities upon the Natives which had not previously existed; and he thought that, in accordance with the Standing Orders of the House, such a Bill ought to have been distributed amongst the Native people. He did not understand the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stewart) to say that the provisions of the Act ought not to extend to the Maori people; he had merely urged that, on account of this omission, the motion before the House ought to be specially treated. The honorable member for Geraldine was quite right in stating that in 1868 a Bill was passed to indemnify a Maori member of the House, but that Bill was not only passed for the purpose of allowing an Assessor to be a member of the House, but to entitle him to continue to hold the office of Assessor which he then held. He regretted that the late Native Minister had spoken so warmly upon the subject, but he was justified on account of what was said by the honorable member for Wairarapa (Mr. Beetham). He was quite sure that the course suggested—namely, that the petition should be referred to a Select Committee, who should report upon the circumstances of the case, and also have power to report whether another election should take place—was the proper course to pursue. They knew very well that where there had been no intentional infringement of the law—where the infringement was merely technical—the best course was to cure the defect by passing an Indemnity Act. That had always been admitted by the House. If the honorable member for Wairarapa would accept the amendment he proposed, he would have much pleasure in supporting him.

Mr. TAINUI said he thought it was the duty of the Returning Officer, who was acquainted with the law, to have informed the candidates of the proper course to be adopted. Had the honorable member (Mohi Tawhai) understood the nature of the Act, he would have taken steps to put himself in a proper position by resigning the office of Assessor; but he had only recently learned that his election had been petitioned against. The Maoris were not yet thoroughly acquainted with the laws affecting elections.

Had these Acts been translated into the Maori language in the first instance, as pointed out by the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stewart) this mistake would not have occurred. He agreed with the remark of the honorable member for Waitaki (Mr. Hislop) that the non-compliance with the Act in this case should be overlooked because the return of the honorable member for the Northern Maori District was petitioned against on two grounds—namely, because he did not send in his resignation at the proper time, and because he had been guilty of bribery: two conditions incomprehensible to the Maori under the circumstances. He might inform the House that the petitioner in this case had stood for the district on three different occasions, and had not been elected. Perhaps the petitioner felt aggrieved on that ground, and had sent in the petition. He had been twice defeated when Wi Katene was elected, and now by Mohi Tawhai. If the election of Mohi Tawhai was declared null and void, and there was to be another election, he could safely say that Mohi Tawhai would again be elected, because he was a man who was thought a good deal of by the Northern people. There was another thing: Natives in the employ of the Government were generally appointed by the Maoris to conduct matters in their interest. That was why he considered it only fair that Acts relating to such matters as this should be translated into the Maori language. It would place a knowledge of the technicalities of the law within their grasp, and serve to avoid cases of this description arising in future elections. He blamed the Returning Officer in this case, because he knew that Mohi Tawhai was an officer of the Government. He would leave it to the House to consider whether it was fair to have this case decided according to the Act, or whether some leniency should not be shown towards Mohi Tawhai. He saw that during this session there were a number of petitions presented against the election of members—not only against the Maori members, but also against the European members.

Mr. MONTGOMERY wished to call attention to one point connected with the motion, which he thought was of considerable importance. The motion referred to "the allegations contained in the petition of Hirini Rawiri Taiwhanga," and he understood that one of the allegations was bribery. Could the Committee, when the petition had been presented in the usual form, inquire into that? Because, if it could not, then he held that the motion should be more specific.

Mr. SPEAKER thought that, if the petitioner endeavoured to establish bribery, it ought to be established in terms of the Act. The Committee could only inquire into the question of the sitting member being disqualified under the Disqualification Act through being a Native Assessor.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said he thought the motion should be amended. He did not know whether the honorable member for Wairarapa had consented to the addition of the names suggested by the honorable member for Waitaki.

Mr. HALL said he thought some arrangement would be come to.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, in order to make the motion more specific, moved the insertion of the following words: "That the allegation contained in the petition respecting the infringement of the Disqualification Act be inquired into." He did not dissent from the ruling of Mr. Speaker, but he thought it would be a very dangerous precedent to establish that during the session, and after the time had expired for presenting a petition against the return of a member upon the ground of bribery, any member should, upon a question of privilege, bring in a motion stating that a member had infringed the Disqualification Act, and that he had also been guilty of bribery; because, if it was proved that he had not infringed the Disqualification Act, he might be tried for bribery.

Mr. ACTON ADAMS thought that in discussing a question of this kind it was desirable that a clear view of the actual state of the law should be realized by honorable members. In this particular matter the House appeared to be not only the makers but the administrators of the law; and therefore, in both capacities, honorable members were bound, so far as they could, to endeavour to apply the law properly. The honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stewart) said it was one of the fundamental rules of legislation that persons accused must be shown to possess a knowledge of the law. He was very much surprised at the honorable gentleman laying down the law in that way. No doubt the honorable gentleman had an infinitely greater knowledge of the law than he (Mr. Acton Adams) had. But he had always been taught that the guiding principle of the law on this point was, Ignorantia legis neminem excusat. He had never heard that ignorance of the law was a good excuse on the part of a person who had committed a breach of the law. Although in this nineteenth century he was not going to justify a principle which had been laid down as a part of our law for many hundred years, yet it was very easy to see the reason why this principle was laid down. Honorable members would recognize at once that it was impossible to interrogate the accused as to whether he was acquainted with the law or not. Although that could be done in France, still it was contrary to English law to interrogate an accused person. The honorable member for Dunedin City talked about its being a mere technical defect. If so, he, for one, would be most willing to pass any measure to overrule such a defect. But what was a technical defect? It was when the letter of the law was contravened, and not the spirit of it. The spirit of the Disqualification Act was this: It was intitled, "An Act to provide for the Purity of Parliament." That was the spirit of the Act—the sentiment of obtaining purity in our Parliament. Then the Act went on to say that persons in the employ of the Crown, and receiving a salary from the Crown, should not be qualified to become members of the House. That was a very broad principle, and the breach of it could not be considered a merely technical defect. There was no question in this case of the accused having been caught by any narrow or technical interpretation of particular words.

Mr. Hall

He thought that on no occasion more than the present should the House maintain the reasonableness and justice of the principle laid down, that the Crown and its servants should not be candidates for seats in this House. And he would go even further, and say that they should merely record their votes at elections, and not interfere in any way with those elections. That was an extension of the principle of the present law, which would be well understood as being, at all events, a truly moral one. The honorable member for Dunedin City appealed to the sense of justice of honorable members in this case. He (Mr. Acton Adams) thought honorable members' sense of justice would see that this particular principle was an equitable and moral one, and one which was thoroughly understood wherever a British Constitution existed—namely, that there ought to be equal laws for all subjects. That principle had, more than any other perhaps, gained a response from the inhabitants of this colony. Very many people had been, and were, contending that the laws should be the same for both Europeans and Maoris, and he certainly was one of those who believed in that principle. He also thought that if Maoris came into that House, and took part in legislation, and received honoraria as Europeans did, they should qualify themselves to the extent, at all events, of understanding the mode of getting into the House, and of conducting the business when there. Their presence there would be worse than useless if it led to discussion and delay in consequence of the Maoris not being acquainted with the laws. The honorable member for Dunedin City also cited the 355th Standing Order, which provided that Bills specially affecting the Maoris should be translated into the Maori language. Now, the word "specially" must mean something. It qualified the word "affecting." It was clear that this Act of 1870 did not specially affect the Maoris, as contradistinguished from Europeans. All classes of people, both white and brown, came under its provisions upon the same basis. There was no special reference to the Maoris so far as this particular matter was concerned, although he believed there was some reference to their holding seats in the Legislative Council. The Act laid down the principle that Civil servants and contractors of the Crown in the colony should not be eligible for election as members of the House, and there was nothing "specially affecting" the Maoris in that provision. That was the broad principle which the Statute disclosed, and he was surprised that an honorable gentleman belonging to the profession to which he (Mr. Acton Adams) had also the honor to belong should attempt to persuade the House that the meaning given by the honorable gentleman to this particular law was anything like the true meaning. It was urged also by the late Native Minister, as an excuse for the transgression of this law, that until 1878 the Act did not apply to Maoris. He would like to know how long that excuse was to last. In his opinion, the fact that the law had been lately passed and was fresh in their memories was the very reason why it should apply to the Maoris and why they should not be excused from coming under its provisions. The honorable member petitioned against said that the petitioner had been three times a defeated candidate. That only proved that, when a Maori showed so much determination to get into the House, he would be a very good member when he got there. He believed Mr. Disraeli was defeated two or three times before he succeeded in obtaining a seat in the House of Commons, and his career since he obtained that seat fully justified what he (Mr. Acton Adams) said with regard to this petitioner. The honorable member for Akaroa raised the question of the petition containing an allegation of bribery, and urged that therefore it should be treated in the same way as ordinary election petitions, and not be received except under certain formalities. The answer to that was, simply, that the petition had been received. That also was a complete answer to the technical objections of the honorable member for Waitaki (Mr. Hislop). As to the question of whether the Committee could investigate the allegation of bribery, he would point out that the Committee had simply to report upon the matter. The Committee had not to decide as to whether the present sitting member had a right to sit in the House or not. That was a matter which would have to be decided afterwards. If the Committee were to report that because of bribery the sitting member was disqualified, the report would, no doubt, not be supported by the House. The honorable member for Akaroa was quite right in saying that accusations of bribery could not be brought before the House except in the usual way, by election petition. The honorable gentleman was right, too, in keeping the matter within the Disqualification Act, but it was not likely that there would have been any departure from that. It had only to be pointed out to the members of the Committee, and they would have done their duty as members of the House and exponents of the law by only going into the question of whether, when this member was elected, he was a Civil servant. The Committee need not sit for more than five minutes to determine that point, because there were only two dates to be fixed—the date on which the member was elected to the House, and the date on which he ceased to be a Civil servant. If the latter was subsequent to the former, the honorable member was clearly disqualified. He trusted no party spirit would be shown in this matter. He was sorry to see that the honorable member for the Thames, and also the honorable member for Geraldine, had thrown so much party spirit into the question. It was merely a technical question affecting the privileges of the House, and as to whether one honorable member had a right to sit in the House. He would be no party to excluding any honorable member simply because he sat and voted on an opposite side; and he was sure the good sense of honorable members would lead them to agree with him in that view.

Mr. MOSS had only to remark that he differed from the last honorable gentleman who had spoken in his view of the case. No doubt the honorable gentleman's law was good; but this was not merely a legal question. There was another principle of law which must be borne in mind when considering the matter, and that was, not only whether the offence was committed, but whether it was committed knowingly and wittingly. There were very few cases in which the law did not take that question into consideration. This was not an offence against any of the moral laws recognized throughout the civilized world. It rested on a pure technicality. At all events, it was unquestionably an offence committed in ignorance of the law, and without the slightest evil intent. However little that idea might weigh with lawyers, with laymen it would have considerable weight. They would not at once declare that a man was guilty of breaking the law and should be punished, unless it could be shown that there was some knowledge and wilfulness in his doing so. He did not care to go into the merits of the case; but he believed the decision of the House would be come to on broad principles of equity, and after full and impartial consideration. They would not be tied down to any mere narrow interpretation of the law, and would not come to a decision on a merely technical point.

Mr. STEWART wished to explain that the honorable member for Nelson City had slightly misapprehended what he said. He did not dispute that the law held ignorance to be no excuse, but there should be an opportunity given of knowing it, and the Roman jurists told them that there should be actual publication. In theory, the law was published in England, and, once published, no one was excused. His remarks were specially applicable to the Maoris here, where it was intended that there should be a translation. It was a mere quibble to take advantage of any general statement.

Mr. READER WOOD said that formerly, in the English House of Commons, when election petitions were presented, the only thing that a party required to know was the constitution of the Committee which was to try the case of the person petitioned against. As soon as ever they knew the constitution of the Committee, they knew perfectly well what the result would be. Now, if they applied the same principle to the constitution of this Committee, they also knew perfectly well what the result would be. There were five on one side, and three on the other. Votes at the present time were exceedingly scarce, and there was not the slightest doubt that five would preponderate over three, and out the honorable gentleman would have to go, law or no law, justice or no justice. This was precisely the line of argument pursued by the honorable member for Nelson City (Mr. Acton Adams). That honorable member said that they were to have here equal laws for the Europeans and Maoris, and that ignorance of the law was no excuse for any breach of the law. But if they were to have equal laws they must also have, he supposed, equal administration of those laws. He would ask the House to consider for a moment what course they had been in the habit of taking when questions of this kind cropped up; and they frequently had cropped up, for those Disqualification Acts from the very beginning had been regarded as, and had been, in fact, so many traps set to catch members.

They had seen lawyers in that House differing as to the meaning of certain clauses in those Acts, and they had seen a lawyer as eminent as Mr. Whitaker, the present Attorney-General, advising members who were in the Executive that they had committed no breach of the Disqualification Act, and yet they had after that to pass a Bill indemnifying them because they had committed a breach of the Disqualification Act in accepting offices to which certain fees were attached. Now, what did they do on that occasion? There was not the slightest difficulty in the House at all. The Indemnity Bill was passed, and, as the honorable member for Geraldine the other night stated that he (Mr. Wood) referred to that Act—

Mr. WAKEFIELD rose to a point of order. The honorable gentleman was referring to a previous debate, and it would be exceedingly inconvenient if he (Mr. Wakefield) were not allowed to reply.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honorable member could not refer to a previous debate.

Mr. READER WOOD was not referring to a previous debate. He was referring to a simple fact.

Mr. WAKEFIELD said the words used were "as stated by the honorable member for Geraldine the other night." The honorable member was trying to remove the impression he (Mr. Wakefield) then made, and it would be very unjust if he could not reply.

Mr. SPEAKER said he had already cautioned the honorable member for Waitemata against referring to a previous debate. No doubt that would be sufficient.

Mr. READER WOOD had no desire to refer to a previous debate. It was a matter of very slight consequence indeed. The honorable member for Geraldine prided himself upon his law, and always came before the House as a great lawyer; but he must say that the honorable gentleman was generally wrong in his law and wrong in his facts. The question was, How had the House usually treated this subject? First, with regard to the disqualification incurred by the honorable gentlemen who sat on the Government benches on the occasion to which the honorable member referred, there was no desire on the part of the House in any way to press the matter against them. The Bill of Indemnity was passed without the slightest difficulty, and there was not the rigour applied to them which the honorable member for Nelson proposed now to apply to this unfortunate Native who had got himself into this difficulty upon a purely technical point. If the honorable gentleman were receiving a salary at the present time, it was perfectly undisputable that there might be some strong feeling against him. The House would strongly object to his holding his seat for a single moment under those circumstances. But he believed the honorable gentleman had actually, verbally, resigned his appointment before he offered himself as a candidate, and the difficulty simply arose through his not resigning in writing. There had been other cases in the House where it was supposed that honorable members had infringed these Disqualification Acts inadvertently, he believed. What did the House then do? Why, in 1875 it passed an Act the title of which was—"An Act to amend 'The Disqualification Act, 1878,' and to indemnify certain Members of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives from Disabilities and Penalties they may have incurred under that Act." That Act was the Act to which he had referred on a former occasion; and, if any one said that it was passed as a matter of course during a single sitting, he would reply that the first reading of that Bill was taken on the 8th October, the second reading on the 18th October, and the Act became law on the 21st October. There was very considerable debate on the subject, and the Act indemnified those gentlemen from any penalty that they might have incurred under the former Act. He would simply ask the House to deal out the same measure of justice to the Native member who had infringed, or was supposed to have infringed, the Disqualification Act of 1878 as it had done on all those previous occasions to other honorable gentlemen who had found themselves in this difficulty, and as, no doubt, it would do to other honorable members who might yet find themselves in the same position. It was quite true that the present Disqualification Act was by no means so stringent as former ones, and it was just possible members would escape; but it was hardly likely that they would. It was not at all unlikely that, on some future occasion, the same question would come under consideration with reference to themselves. He would be exceedingly sorry to see anything done now in a party spirit, for the mere sake of securing or preventing a vote in the House, drawn into a precedent, which might be used in a manner not now apparent.

Mr. HALL was very sorry to have heard so many allusions during the present debate to party spirit and action. It was a matter of extreme regret that, when an honorable member undertook the somewhat invidious task of bringing under the notice of the House the disqualification of another member—and it must always be an unpleasant and invidious task—he did not receive credit for good, upright, and honorable motives in doing so. He (Mr. Hall) asked the House generally not to deal with the question in a party spirit, but to rise above party spirit—to see what the facts of the case were, and decide upon them without any reference to party considerations. He assured honorable gentlemen that if they could find disqualification on the part of any honorable member on his side of the House, that side would not deal with it in a party spirit. The honorable member for Waitemata had followed in the wake of previous speakers by attempting to lead the House to believe that this case was on a par with many others which had been dealt with by the House. The honorable member referred to the Act of Indemnity passed to relieve Ministers in 1875, and the Act passed to relieve Mr. Harper. That gentleman was a solicitor in practice in Christchurch, and happened to hold the office of Revising Barrister to Friendly Societies. He was called upon to look over some rules once or twice in two years, for which he received a fee of a guinea or two guineas; and he had forgotten that he held such an office. The House, he thought wisely, said that that was not a case in which the honorable member ought to be expected to be fully aware of his disqualification, and that he ought not to be declared disqualified. Then, with regard to the case of Ministers, he denied the assertion of the honorable member for Waitemata that there was an absolute need for indemnity. To the present day the Attorney-General, Mr. Whitaker, maintained that there was no necessity for that indemnity. It was not a clear case of disqualification, but it was based on a very abstruse point which had never been raised before. There was no kind of analogy between the two cases. It was quite true that they had passed several Acts of Indemnity, and they had passed them because they felt that the Disqualification Acts in force at the time were not clear, not easily intelligible, and not sufficiently stringent. In order to avoid the necessity for repeating such an undesirable proceeding as passing Indemnity Acts, they amended the Disqualification Act, making it short, clear, and not too stringent. It was made so that every person could easily understand it. What did the present law say? It said that any officer drawing a salary from the Government was disqualified. It was the bounden duty of every person, and especially the bounden duty of every public officer who aspired to a seat in the House, to make himself acquainted with the law on this subject. So far as he could see, this was a case of clear, palpable disqualification, without any mitigating circumstances. The proposal before the House was merely that a Committee should be appointed, and honorable gentlemen who were objecting to that proposal were practically admitting the disqualification before the Committee had sat or considered the case. If such a case was not to be inquired into, they had better put the Disqualification Act into the fire, for it would be a miserable mockery, a delusion, and a snare. With regard to the Act itself, it had been contended that it specially affected the Maori race. One or two other contentions raised by the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stewart) had been so fully and entirely disposed of by the honorable member for Nelson City that he need not go into them. It was quite true that there was a speciality in the Act, but it was in favour of the Maoris. It was not correct to say that attention had not been called to that clause in the Act. He knew that in the other branch of the Legislature it was fully discussed, and it actually formed the subject of discussion at a Conference between the two branches of the Legislature. It was fully considered as to how it was to apply to Maori members. Was it wise or expedient to exempt an honorable member because he belonged to the Native race? He did not mean anything disrespectful of the Natives—indeed, he was only stating that with which he believed those who had a very great regard for them would agree—when he said that they had not any keen sense of the impropriety of receiving increases of salary from the Government when they ought not to receive them; and that, therefore, it was more necessary to be careful with regard to members of the Maori race than with regard to European members. The honorable member for Parnell said they ought not to enforce the provisions of the Act—that they ought not to be made applicable—unless the offences were knowingly and wilfully committed. The Act stated broadly that, if an individual, being a salaried officer of the Government, was elected a member of this House, he was disqualified. If, moreover, he sat and voted knowingly and wilfully, he rendered himself liable to a penalty of £50. Whatever the decision of the House might be, until this Act was repealed, if the honorable member knowingly and wilfully broke the law by sitting and voting in this House, he was liable to a penalty of £50 a day, at the suit of any person who might proceed against him. He did not say this in the way of a threat, but it was only fair that the honorable member should have the fullest warning. He would repeat his hope that the House would not deal with this question in a party spirit. If they were to have a Disqualification Act at all, it should not be a shadow, but a substance. If they did not mean to insist upon carrying out the Disqualification Act in so clear and palpable a case as this, they should put an end to the farce of passing Disqualification Acts, and wipe them out of the Statute Book altogether. He could not see any reason in the present case why the House should refuse the appointment of a Committee. The subject would come before the House again upon the consideration of the report. He understood the mover had made some arrangement with honorable gentlemen opposite as to the constitution of the Committee, and he presumed that there would be no objection to the motion.

Mr. DICK said it was with a feeling of disappointment and regret that he heard the honorable gentleman who spoke previously to the Premier express himself in the way he did. It seemed to him that the honorable gentleman's opinion of the House was very low indeed when he said that, law or no law, justice or no justice, the parties who were fighting on this subject would fight it to the end, or something to that effect. He would ask honorable members to consider this matter entirely without party feeling. He did not see why they should consider it as a party question at all. There were occasions when the House should rise above party altogether. When a question of privilege—a question affecting the House as to its privileges, its rights, and its regulations—came before them, they should forget that there were any parties, and merely consider what was fair and just in carrying out the law in connection with the House. This was an occasion on which they should adopt that course, and he, for one, did not care two straws whether the honorable member who was petitioned against was on the side of the House with which he himself was connected or on the other side. If the honorable gentleman sitting were on the same side of the House as himself he would just as readily support the consideration of the petition as if the honorable gentleman sat with the Opposition. Honorable members should feel that this was a matter affecting the privileges of the whole House, and should not entertain the idea that they were fighting as parties upon it. He did not think the present was the time for fighting the question: the proper time would be when the report of the Committee on the petition came before them. It was perfectly right and reasonable that this question should be referred to a Select Committee. He did not think that any Committee appointed would deal with it as a party question. He believed that honorable gentlemen would take their position in that Committee considering that they were called upon to inquire into the privileges of this House, and would report honestly and fairly in the matter. He believed the Committee would do justice to the subject brought before them, and would bring the matter before the House in a fair and clear manner. Under these circumstances he did not see why they should continue debating this question, as it would come before the House again when the Committee submitted their report.

Mr. McLEAN had taken considerable interest in the Disqualification Act, and had assisted in getting an Act passed which would deal with all honorable members of the House alike. If the honorable member for Waitemata had his way he was afraid the justice that would be meted out to honorable members on the side of the House not supported by the honorable gentleman would be scant. They would be served as he (Mr. McLean) had himself been served when he had to pay costs on a writ served on him at the instance of the honorable member for Christchurch City (Sir G. Grey). The honorable gentleman said that the present Attorney-General had given it as his opinion that an Indemnity Act was necessary in that case. The present Attorney-General had never advised that an Indemnity Act was necessary. The honorable gentleman was of opinion that they were not disqualified in any way, and he held the same opinion still. It was said that there was no difficulty in passing the Indemnity Act. The honorable member for Parnell seemed to forget that they sat up all night endeavouring to prevent the passing of the Act. The honorable member for Dunedin City, who, no doubt, was disappointed at not obtaining the Attorney-Generalship, had shown them the kind of law he would give if the matter of disqualification were placed in his hands as Attorney-General. He (Mr. McLean) had simply to say that so far as he was concerned the Disqualification Act should apply to all alike, without any distinction whatever. He wished to see the law carried out. He would be quite satisfied with the decision at which the Committee arrived.

Mr. GISBORNE would like to consider the question in a spirit quite devoid of party feeling; but he must say that the speeches of the Premier and the honorable member who had just spoken were not calculated to conduce to such a spirit. There was a speciality in this case which he hoped the Committee, if appointed, would consider. When the Disqualification Act of last

The hour of half-past five o'clock having arrived, Mr. SPEAKER left the chair.

HOUSE RESUMED.

On the House resuming,

Mr. SPEAKER directed the Clerk to call on the Orders of the day.

Mr. BEETHAM said he should like the ruling of Mr. Speaker as to whether the question of privilege which had been discussed during the afternoon should not be gone on with now, instead of the Orders of the day. That was his understanding of the course of procedure. He was not then in a position to quote precedents in support of his view; but, to the best of his recollection, during the session of 1877, when a debate on a question of privilege was commenced, and was not finished when the hour of half-past five arrived, it was continued at the evening sitting.

Mr. SPEAKER thought it very much depended on whether the question of privilege involved a matter of immediate urgency. He did not think there was pressing urgency in the present case; but, next day being a Government day, the Government would be able to allow it to stand as the first business, if they thought it necessary, or else allow it to come on after the Orders of the day had been disposed of to-day. He regarded the two hours' interval as an adjournment, and thought this question of privilege might be adjourned from day to day; and with regard to its being entitled to precedence, it had been held, in some cases of privilege of a less urgent character, that adjourned debates were not entitled to precedence.

Mr. HALL said that if the matter could either be gone on with as the first business next day, or at any other time, it might not be a matter of urgency; but otherwise he took it that, as it was a matter which affected the right of a member to sit and vote, it was a matter of urgency; and, to his mind, it was highly inexpedient that a question of such importance should be allowed to stand over. Perhaps that view had not suggested itself to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. READER WOOD said he agreed entirely with the ruling of Mr. Speaker that this was simply an ordinary notice of motion, and that, when the hour of half-past five was past, the House must proceed to the Orders of the day. The Premier seemed to think it was a matter of inconvenience, even if in accordance with the rules of the House; but inconvenience sometimes had to be suffered in consequence of the rules of the House. For instance, there was a want-of-confidence motion which could not be gone on with at all. What was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander. He believed that Mr. Speaker had adopted the proper course.

Mr. McLEAN would like to bring to the recollection of Mr. Speaker the course of procedure adopted when a question of privilege was raised in consequence of a dispute between the House and the Government in reference to the appointment of Mr. Wilson to the Legislative Council. His recollection of what occurred on that occasion was that, when the hour of half-past seven arrived, the matter having been discussed in the afternoon, it was ruled by the Speaker that the debate must continue. There was no matter of urgency involved in that. It could have stood over for several days. But this was a matter of urgency, because it must affect the seat of an honorable member of this House. It affected very seriously that member, because by sitting and voting here he subjected himself to a certain penalty for every day he so sat and voted, and of this fact he had got notice. Therefore he regarded this question as a matter of urgency.

Mr. SHEEHAN would point out that the question of privilege referred to by the honorable member for Waitemata was a dispute between this House and one of the other estates of the realm. That was a matter of urgency; but the same could scarcely be said of this case. This petition had been lying on the table for several days, and had the honorable member for Wairarapa chosen he could have moved in the matter earlier. He submitted that the ruling of Mr. Speaker was perfectly correct.

Mr. SPEAKER said that the 51st Standing Order provided, "If, on the days on which motions have precedence, all motions shall not have been disposed of when the House rises at half after five o'clock, the debate on any motion under discussion is adjourned by Mr. Speaker, and the House on resuming at half after seven o'clock proceeds to the Orders of the day." Of course, if he were empowered to set aside that Standing Order, this motion could be gone on with; but he believed both sides of the House expected him, in the present circumstances of business, to administer the Standing Orders rigidly, and he intended to do so.

Mr. ROLLESTON presumed that, in the event of the adjourned debate not being resumed after the Orders of the day have been disposed of, it would devolve upon the Government to fix what position the motion should occupy upon the Order Paper of the next day. It was a question affecting the privileges of the House, not the privileges of the Government, and it would be putting the Government in an invidious position to leave to them the question of deciding when the matter should again come up for discussion.

Mr. GISBORNE said the Premier was leader of the House as well as leader of the Government; and to him the privileges of the House should be as much a matter of concern as the convenience of the Government. His own idea of what was right must guide him as to what course he should adopt.

Mr. BRANDON thought the point as to urgency was of very little importance, because, so long as the honorable member sat and voted, he rendered himself subject to a penalty of £50 per day.

Mr. MURRAY pointed out that the 86th Standing Order provided that, "An urgent motion, directly concerning privileges of the House, will take precedence of other motions, as well as of Orders of the day." He thought, therefore, that this matter should take precedence of the Orders of the day according to that Standing Order, because the privileges of the House were undoubtedly affected. Suppose there were half a dozen or twenty members sitting in the House who had no right to sit there, the proper decision of the House on important subjects might be very seriously affected. In this instance it might determine whether one party or another was to rule the House. Therefore the matter ought to be considered carefully, in view of the principle at stake. It was to be hoped, in view of the principle at issue, that honorable members would divest themselves of party feeling in considering the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER, before calling on the Orders of the day, said that of course the matter might be gone on with at once if there was no objection on the part of honorable members in charge of the Orders of the day, and the House generally, to those Orders being postponed. He was quite in the hands of honorable members, and had no personal feeling in the matter.

AUCKLAND IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS TRANSFER OF POWERS.

Mr. W. J. HURST, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he would explain as briefly as possible the necessity for the Bill. In 1875 a body termed the Improvement Commissioners was created in the City of Auckland to administer a certain trust—a large and valuable property within the City of Auckland; in fact, it has been a body exercising a sort of imperium in imperio in the middle of a large city. The Improvement Commissioners had certain large definite powers, which they endeavoured to carry out. It had been found, however, that, instead of being in a position to carry out those powers, the revenues were considerably short of the expenditure. In 1877 he endeavoured, when Mayor of the City of Auckland, to induce the Commissioners—of whom he was one at that time in virtue of his office—to transfer the trust. He pointed out to the Commissioners their inability to fulfil the trust conferred upon them; but at that time the city was indisposed to take over the property with such a burden as appeared to be attached to it. Since then a large majority of the Commissioners had seen the inutility of further endeavouring to carry out the objects of the trust, and the result was, that the City of Auckland had agreed to have this Bill brought before the House, in order that they might take over the responsibilities now in the hands of the Commissioners. He might mention that there was no question of principle involved in the Bill. It was simply a transfer of administration to a responsible body—the Corporation of the City of Auckland. There was, however, one circumstance connected with this measure which he thought it wise at once to mention, and that was, that the Provincial Council of Auckland, at that time trusting to the advancement of the colony and believing in the great value of this property, passed a Bill reserving the residuary interest, after the Commissioners had fulfilled their trust, for the purposes of education. The Education Board of Auckland, having regard to that residuary interest, had petitioned the House on the subject, which petition was now under the consideration of the Public Petitions Committee. Therefore that question would be considered by the Committee, and in another form would come up before the House. He dared to say that due weight would be attached to the decision of that Committee, and that the Committee would enter into the full details of the matter. The whole question involved between the Education Board—acting, no doubt, in the interest of education, and, he believed, on behalf of the Government,—and the City Corporation was simply as to the property the Board was to have handed over to it. The present position of the matter was this: that the Improvement Commissioners could not carry on. They had now an indebtedness of £25,000, and were paying a large sum in the shape of interest. They had placed in the hands of a monetary institution debentures which they were unable to float at a higher value than £65. The Education Board, of course anxious to have as much as they could get, had made a demand on the City Council which the Council were not prepared to accede to; and, on the other hand, the City Council made certain offers which the Education Board virtually declined to accept. Therefore it was submitted to the House to some extent to settle the dispute between these two bodies. The Petitions Committee would, of course, go into the whole details on this part of the question, and place their recommendation on the table of the House. Therefore it became more a matter of formality than principle to go on with the second reading of the Bill. He would then move its committal—possibly a week hence; and, if the Committee had not sent in their report on the petition by that time, he would undertake to the House to further postpone the committal of the Bill. He would not trouble the House with any further remarks. There was no principle whatever involved—simply a change of the trust from one body to another. In his opinion, it would have been wise if this trust had been handed over to the city in the first instance. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. ROLLESTON would like to know if this Bill would be referred to the Waste Lands Committee. He had only just seen the Bill. There was no doubt that a measure of this kind should be examined carefully. Honorable members generally, he thought, had only just had the Bill placed in their hands. The Bill was one involving interests of so large a character that he thought it should be submitted to an inquiry which would satisfy the House generally as to its provisions. He should be very glad to give his attention to it.

Mr. KELLY said the petition referred to by the honorable member for Auckland City West was at present under the consideration of the Public Petitions Committee, and no doubt that Committee would make full inquiry, and inform the House exactly as to how the matter stood. He would support the motion for second reading now, on the understanding that the Bill should not be committed until after the Committee had brought up its report.

Mr. HAMLIN would like to state that, although he did not oppose the Bill on the present occasion, he did not wish it to be understood that he swallowed the Bill holus-bolus. Some honorable members, including himself, had received letters urging them to oppose this Bill. He would not oppose the second reading; but he wished the honorable member for Auckland City West to understand that, unless he was fully satisfied with it, he should take every opportunity of opposing its third reading.

Mr. MOSS wished to say, as the member intrusted with the petition from the Education Board, that he should not oppose the second reading of the Bill, but it was on the distinct understanding that it would not be pushed on in Committee for some time to come. Honorable members should have ample time to look into it, and care must be taken that the interests of education did not suffer. That was the only object of the petition, and the only object which the Education Board had in view.

Mr. HURST, in reply, regretted that he had failed to make himself understood by the Minister of Lands. He said most distinctly that there was no principle involved in the Bill, that the petition of the Education Board was already in the hands of the Petitions Committee, and that he would not move the committal of the Bill until Wednesday next, and not then if the Committee had not reported on the question. He did not think the House could ask him to say anything more than what he had already explained. He regretted that the honorable member for Franklin should have made the observations he did, because he was quite satisfied that the Board of Education was not opposed to the Bill itself.

Mr. HAMLIN said it was from a member of the Board of Education that he received his information on the subject, and he held a letter in his hand urging him to oppose the Bill.

Mr. HURST said it was useless taking up the time of the House, which, he had no doubt, would be greatly influenced by the Government on the one part, and the decision of the Petitions Committee. It was a matter of dispute and difference of opinion between the two bodies of so trivial a character that the House and the Committee would be able to deal with it in a proper manner. He would now simply content himself with moving the second reading of the Bill.

WAIUKU RECREATION RESERVE BILL.

Mr. HAMLIN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, explained that its main feature was to vest this reserve in a body of trustees, who would improve and manage it. Honorable members would recollect that a portion of this ground was reserved by the late Provincial Government, and had been granted to the people of Waiuku as a drill-ground. Since then several acres had been added to it as a reserve; but up to the present time no trustees had been appointed for the purpose of managing it. They had been in the habit of holding cattle shows and annual races there; and they were anxious that the whole affair should be vested in a body of trustees, and that they should have the privilege, on annual show and race days, to impose an entrance fee on people who might wish to go on the ground. Further than that, the trustees would simply be there as a Board to improve this reserve. The greatest portion of it was fern and tea-tree, with the exception of the course and show-ground. In order to retain the ground as a drill-ground, most of the trustees were members of the local Volunteers, so that no danger need be anticipated by the House or the Government that their right would in any way be set aside. He thought honorable members would find that this Bill was in accordance with most measures of this character. They had in years gone by passed several of these measures, and he trusted the House would allow this Bill to be read a second time.

Mr. HALL said it was no doubt very desirable that a property of this kind should be vested in local trustees, but, in consequence of the numerous applications that were made to Parliament for special Acts vesting reserves in local trustees, the Legislature made provision in "The Public Reserves Act, 1878," by which the Governor was enabled by Order in Council to vest land of this kind in local trustees. Perhaps the honorable gentleman would state why the vesting in the present case could not be done under that Act. If there was any special reason why it could not be so done, no doubt the House would be glad to entertain the present proposal; but, if it could be done, it would be a bad precedent to disregard the Act passed for the special purpose of relieving the Legislature of work of this kind. He would not oppose the second reading on the present occasion, but he hoped the honorable gentleman, before they went further, would be able to show why it was necessary to pass by the Public Reserves Act and introduce a special measure.

Mr. MURRAY submitted that the Bill should be allowed to be read a second time. If the Public Reserves Act made provision for this case, the Bill need not be proceeded with further.

Mr. KELLY was under the impression that the Government, under the Public Reserves Act, only had power to deal with land that had been reserved for a certain purpose named in the schedule of the Act, and vest it in local governing bodies. This land might not be in that position: it might be land reserved from sale for other public purposes, and might therefore not come under the Act of 1878, but be required to be dealt with by special Act.

Mr. ANDREWS did not intend to enter into the particulars of this Bill, but there was one point to which he desired to allude, and that was the constitution of the proposed Board. As a member of that House he would always strenuously oppose the appointment of Boards of this description. He thought it was a move in a backward rather than in a forward direction. It would not, in his opinion, satisfy the members of the House, nor be acceptable to the people who were affected. He would take that opportunity of informing the House that he would oppose the appointment of this Board, as he would every Board nominated in the same way. He wished in all things to see the power put in the hands of the people, who should themselves be able to elect trustees to take charge of land intended for their welfare.

Mr. HAMLIN said the Bill was introduced on the advice of persons who were supposed to know all about the matter—the Waste Lands Department, and other people in Auckland—who stated that the object could not be attained except by having a separate Bill passed through Parliament. With reference to the remarks of the honorable member for Christchurch City (Mr. Andrews), who appeared to be so greatly alarmed at the names of the trustees being mentioned in the Bill as to lead to the supposition that they had been pitchforked into the clause, or quietly selected in some hole-and-corner fashion, he could assure the honorable gentleman that the names of the proposed trustees were inserted at the desire of the people of the district. They were gentlemen who had taken the liveliest interest in all matters connected with the district; and the inhabitants in the neighbourhood had every confidence that, if this measure were passed, the ground would be taken care of, all rights properly conserved, and everything done for the benefit of the place.

SUPPLY.

Major ATKINSON.—Understanding from you, Sir, that I shall now be in order in doing so, I desire to ask the House to suspend the Standing Orders for the purpose of passing a Supply Bill through all its stages, and passing a resolution in Committee of Supply to enable the Government to issue the extra £200,000 worth of deficiency bills which were authorized by the Act passed the other day. I have communicated with my honorable friends opposite to know whether they would take advantage of our going into Committee of Supply to bring forward a motion which I understand you to rule that, notwithstanding the suspension of the Standing Orders, they would have the power of submitting to the consideration of the House. That being your ruling, Sir, of course it will be open to any honorable gentleman, on the question being put that you do leave the chair for the purpose of going into Committee of Supply, to move any amendment he may think right. If that is the case, and my honorable friends are not prepared to assure me that they will not take advantage of that position, I shall, of course, be unable to proceed with the motion of which I gave notice, because the object for which I gave notice would be defeated—namely, the passing of a Supply Bill this evening without further discussion; because it is quite certain that the motion which those honorable gentlemen would submit would be of a character, considering the present state of parties in the House, which would necessitate probably many days' discussion. Therefore it would only be anticipating the motion that we now have on the Paper; and my honorable friends on these benches do not think it would be advisable to anticipate business that is on the Paper in that way. But, as this money is imperatively required in the interests of the country—as it will be impossible to make any further payments if both these measures are not passed this evening, for there is now at the credit of the Consolidated Fund only £40,000—as this money is imperatively required for the public service, and also for paying the subsidies, for which I am very much pressed by the whole of the counties and Road Boards, I trust honorable gentlemen will accede to the proposition which I have made, and agree that we shall proceed to the consideration of these Bills on the distinct understanding that no motion will be moved upon the question that you leave the chair. If the honorable gentlemen are not prepared to give me that assurance, then the responsibility of refusing supplies must rest upon them.—(No, no.)—At any rate, it must rest upon some shoulders—the public will have to decide upon whose. No doubt the honorable gentlemen opposite will say it rests upon our shoulders. Well, we are prepared to take the blame, if it does; and if it rests on their shoulders they must take the blame. At any rate, we are not going to be led into a trap by the honorable gentlemen. We intend to carry out what we have already stated to this House. So soon as we have had proper time to submit our measures to Parliament we shall be prepared to discuss this motion of no-confidence; but we shall not be prepared to give the honorable gentlemen a special opportunity this evening for that purpose. I have stated the reason why I want these two measures: it is to enable me to carry on the public service, and to pay the subsidies which are now being demanded from all round the country. So far as I know, it has been the invariable custom of honorable gentlemen, on both sides, whatever might be the state of the House, to facilitate the passage of Supply Bills through this House. On a late occasion, the members of the present Government, when in opposition, gave every such facility, and I trust and believe that the honorable gentlemen opposite will do the same on the present occasion; but, if not, as I said before, I will not trouble the House with any further remarks on the subject.

Mr. MACANDREW.—There is no intention whatever on this side of the House to obstruct the granting of supplies. We are quite ready to grant any reasonable supply at once. At the same time, unless the honorable member gives an assurance that my motion, No. 20, will be allowed to come on to-morrow, it is my intention to propose or to state a grievance, at all events, on going into Committee of Supply. We do not intend to have any discussion upon it, but to go into Committee of Supply at once. But I decline to accept the responsibility for any consequences that may result from not going into Supply to-night. If any evil consequences result, the responsibility must be entirely on the shoulders of the honorable member and his colleagues. I repeat, that we are prepared at once to grant supplies, but, unless we get an assurance that the no-confidence motion will be allowed to come on some time to-morrow, it will be my duty to make a short statement in the way of a grievance when the question is put that you do leave the chair. I hope the honorable gentleman will accept that assurance as satisfactory.

Major ATKINSON.—I am obliged to the

House for having heard what I had to say. Of course, after what has fallen from the honorable gentleman, I should not think of proceeding with the motion for the suspension of the Standing Orders.

Mr. HISLOP.—Might I be allowed to make a motion? In order that there may be no imputation against this side of the House, I propose the suspension of the Standing Orders, so that the Colonial Treasurer may have an opportunity of introducing his measures.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think it is competent for the honorable member to take that course, which would imply his undertaking charge of Government business.

Mr. MACANDREW.—It is perfectly clear now, Sir, that the sooner we adjourn the better. If the Government is not in a position to control the House and go on with its business, I do not see why we should stay longer. I beg to move, That this House do now adjourn. I am very sorry to have to do so, but I wish it to be distinctly understood, and iterated and reiterated, that the Opposition does not desire to block supplies. We are prepared to grant them at once, and on those gentlemen's heads will rest the responsibility of any evils that may result from supplies not being granted.

Major ATKINSON.—I would merely remark, in regard to what has fallen from the honorable gentleman, that the block comes entirely from the other side.—(No.)—The honorable gentlemen know perfectly well that, if they move any motion which will be of any service to them at all, it will be a motion which is condemnatory of the Government. Well, Sir, that being the case, it is perfectly certain that the Government will desire to place its case before the country. It will take us several days to do that. It will take the honorable gentlemen opposite several days to show our iniquities. Therefore it is absurd for those honorable gentlemen to say they are prepared to grant supplies. They are prepared to seize this opportunity of discussing the fitness of the Government to sit on these benches. Well, Sir, the House has decided, and the mismanagement of those honorable gentlemen has decided, that that motion shall not come on at present. When we shall feel it our duty to bring it on now, after the conduct of the honorable gentleman, of course is a matter for our consideration; but I can assure honorable gentlemen that that obstruction will not move us a bit. We have laid down lines for ourselves, and we shall follow them, so long as we see that we are receiving the support of the party who have put us in power, and who demand that we shall commit to this House and to the country the measures which we have been intrusted by His Excellency to prepare.

Mr. TURNBULL.—So far as I understand the remarks of the honorable member for Port Chalmers there is no refusal to grant supplies. I think the honorable gentleman made that very clear. There was certainly a condition attached to his observations, and that was, that the Premier should give him an opportunity to bring on his want-of-confidence motion to-morrow. Honorable members are perfectly well aware that if a member has a grievance he has a perfect right to bring it on for discussion on the motion for going into Committee of Supply; and really I do not see why a majority of the members of this House should sit here at the will of the minority, and have the business impeded. The honorable member for Port Chalmers has stated distinctly that, if the Government will give him an assurance that the want-of-confidence motion shall come on tomorrow, supplies will immediately be granted; so that, if there is any obstruction, they are themselves to blame for it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I hope it will be clearly understood by this House and the country that there is not a single member of the Opposition who would refuse to grant supplies. I can say for myself that I would not allow any party tactics to induce me to vote against supplies being granted. The honorable member for Port Chalmers has stated, as he has a perfect right to state, that he has a grievance, and surely it is the right of every member, on the motion for going into Committee of Supply, to ask to have that grievance redressed. The nature of that grievance may be stated in a few words; but the Colonial Treasurer will not himself move that the Standing Orders be suspended, because he fears that that grievance will be stated. I trust it will be clearly understood that the Opposition are willing to grant supplies without hesitation.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable gentleman is rather contradictory. He first states that he will be no party to refusing supplies, and he then proceeds to say that he will block supplies.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I did not say that we would block supplies. I said that we would grant supplies, but that we should state our grievance first.
